"If a nation is obliged to preserve itself, it is no less obliged carefully to preserve all its members. The nation owes this to itself, since the loss even of one of its members weakens it and is injurious to its preservation. It owes this also to the members in particular in consequence of the very act of association; for those who compose a nation are united for their defense and common advantage, and none can justly be deprived of this union and of the advantages he expects to derive from it while he on his side fulfills the conditions."

And the same author on the same page further says:

"The body of a nation cannot, then, abandon a province, a town, or even a single individual who is a part of it, unless compelled to it by necessity, or indispensably obliged to it by the strongest reasons founded on the public safety."

It cannot be denied that East Tennessee had during the rebellion a large number of loyal citizens. Mr. Lincoln, in his message to Congress on the 8d day of December, 1861, stated:

"I deem it important that the large region of East Tennessee and western North Carolina be connected with Kentucky and other faithful parts of the Union by railroad."

On the 4th of May, 1864, the House passed a bill authorizing the President to appoint in each State in rebellion a provisional governor, with the pay and emoluments of a brigadier general, to be charged with the civil administration until a State government therein shall be recognized, and prior to that time, to wit, on the 20th of January, 1864, President Lincoln ordered an election to be held in Arkansas for Governor, &c.; thus showing that neither the action of Congress nor President Lincoln had any tendency to treat the rebel States as out of the Union or annihilated as States, but on the contrary shows the very opposite.

President Johnson, in his annual message of the 4th of December last, says:

"The perpetuity of the Constitution brings with it perpetuity of the States; thus mutual relations make us what we are; and in our political system their connection is indissoluble. The whole cannot exist without the parts, nor the parts without the whole. So long as the Constitution of the United States endures the States will endure; the destruction of one is the destruction of the other; the preservation of one is the preservation of the other."

But it is said by my colleague [Mr. STEVENS] that "on the ground of estoppel the United States have a clear right to elect to adjudge them out of the Union;" that "they are estopped both by matter of record and matter in pais."

And my able colleague, [Mr. BROOMALL,] in his speech of the 26th of January, says, in speaking of the rebel States:

"Having set up an independent government and waged war as a nation, they are estopped from pleading the right of citizenship to defeat the right of conquest."

If the latter gentleman's doctrine is tenable, then those residing in what are denominated the rebel States are no longer citizens of the United States, and consequently not amenable to her laws, and in that event all laws of Congress passed to punish rebels would be nugatory.

But how do the records stand in regard to estoppel? It is true that the so-called southern confederacy adopted a constitution and passed laws, claiming to be independent of the United States, and at the same time the United States Congress passed stringent laws which denied that those States were separated from the United States, and inflicted upon them severe penalties for their treason. So as regards matter of record the United States would be estopped from treating these States as out of the Union, as well as the rebel States would be by having asserted they were out. Then as to matter in pais. The United States asserted that those rebel States had not dissolved their connection with the Union, while the rebels on the other hand asserted they had. So as to matter in pais, they would be equally estopped.

Finally, the contest was by wager of battle decided against the rebels. In 7 Casey's Pennsylvania Reports, 334, Hill et al. vs. Eply, it is laid down:

"If no one be misled to his hurt he will not be estopped."

Also, in 12 Casey, 522, Brubaker vs. Oakes, it is ruled that—

"It is essential to an estoppel by matter in pais, that he who sets it up is bound to show that he has been misled to his hurt."

And in 3 Hill, 215, Dezell vs. Odel, it is laid down that to make an estoppel effectual it must show that the party made an admission clearly inconsistent with the evidence proposed to be given, and that the other party has acted upon that admission. The United States were not misled, for the actions of the rebels were well known, and both parties acted with full knowledge, and as already indicated, were on an equality as to matter of record. So that upon no legal principle are the rules of estoppel applicable as contended by my two colleagues.

Mr. Speaker, it has been said that if the States lately in rebellion were only put in abeyance during the war, then at its termination they were restored to all the rights they possessed prior to the rebellion, and the President had no right to direct provisional governors to call a convention to amend or form a constitution different from the mode designated in the constitution in force at the breaking out of the war. And the honorable gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHELLABARGER] refers to the actions of the President in regard to North Carolina, and recites the clause in the old constitution pointing out a mode for altering or amending the same.

Now, owing to the rebellion, great changes had taken place. As a war necessity, slaves had by proclamation been declared to be freed, and the fourth section of the fourth article of the Constitution of the United States requires that the United States shall guaranty to every State in the Union a republican form of government, and in order to carry out that injunction it was indispensable that a change of the constitution should be made, and the Government had a right to demand it in order that the civil laws, which had to give way to the military, could be revived. And as to the mode of altering the constitution, though the old one points out a method by which amendments or alterations may be made, still that does not prevent the calling of a convention to adopt a new constitution or change the former, subject to the ratification of the legal voters. That is a right which the sovereign people of each State never parted with, and hence may as often as they choose, by convention, change their constitution so as not to be incompatible with that of the United States. The Legislature, without a convention, can make alterations only in the way prescribed by the constitution; but as I have already said, that is no bar to a change made through a convention, subject to the ratification of the voters; and for this procedure we have a case directly in point in regard to the State of Missouri. Article twelve of the constitution of the 10th of July, 1820—under which it became a State—provides that—"The General Assembly may at any time prepare such amendments to this constitution as two thirds of each House shall deem expedient, which shall be published in all the newspapers printed in the State three several times, at least twelve months before the next general election, and if, at the first session of the General Assembly after such general election, two thirds of each House shall by yeas and nays ratify such proposed amendments, they shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of this constitution: Provided, That such proposed amendments shall be read on three several days in each House as well when the same are proposed as when they are finally ratified."

Yet, notwithstanding this prescribed mode of amendment, the Legislature of that State passed, in the year 1865, a law calling a convention which continued in session a few weeks and adopted a constitution which was submitted to the people for ratification, (the disloyal portion of the community being prohibited from voting,) and under that constitution the present members of Congress from that State were elected and now have seats in this House. Tennessee also adopted a constitution in a similar manner. But it has been said that the citizens did not all vote on these questions, that some of them were not allowed that right.

If they committed such acts as to deprive themselves of the right of suffrage it was a fault of their own, or if those who had a right neglected to vote it would not invalidate a constitution which had a majority of those who did vote. All that is required when a matter is submitted to the people for their ratification is a majority of the votes polled. The Constitution of the United States provides that in order to make an amendment thereto valid it must pass Congress by a vote of two thirds of both Houses, and be ratified by the Legislatures of three fourths of the several States, or by convention in three fourths thereof, so that in such an important amendment as that abolishing the system of slavery we cannot afford to theorize as to States being out of the Union or losing their status as States, for there is no telling what the United States Supreme Court, as now or shall hereafter be constituted, may decide in regard to the States lately in rebellion, and if there should not be a ratification by three fourths of the entire number of States, (including those lately in rebellion,) and it should be determined that in consequence thereof the amendment abolishing slavery was invalid, then all the lives and treasure sacrificed to eradicate from this Republic that accursed system which brought upon the nation so much misery would be of no avail. But the Secretary of State, that far-seeing statesman, (Mr. Seward,) who through the four years of terrible conflict managed the affairs of state so ably and kept us out of foreign wars, provided for the contingency so as to avoid all cavil. That gentleman, in his published certificate in form of proclamation of the 18th of December, 1865, recites the amendments, to wit:

"Sec. 1. Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States or any place subject to their jurisdiction."

"Sec. 2. Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation."

And then proceeds as follows:

"And whereas it appears from official documents on file in this Department that the amendment to the Constitution of the United States, proposed as aforesaid, has been ratified by the Legislatures of the States of Illinois, Rhode Island, Michigan, Maryland, New York, West Virginia, Maine, Kansas, Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, Virginia, Ohio, Missouri, Nevada, Indiana, Louisiana, Minnesota, Wisconsin, Vermont, Tennessee, Arkansas, Connecticut, New Hampshire, South Carolina, Alabama, North Carolina, and Georgia, in all twenty-seven States; and whereas the whole number of States in the United States is thirty-six; and whereas the before-specially named States whose Legislatures have ratified the said proposed amendment constitute three fourths of the whole number of States in the United States: Now, therefore, be it known that I, William H. Seward, Secretary of State, by virtue and in pursuance of the second section of the act of Congress, approved the 20th of April, 1818, entitled 'An act to provide for the publication of the laws of the United States, and for other purposes,' do hereby certify that the amendment aforesaid has become valid to all intents and purposes as a part of the Constitution of the United States."

It will be seen, Mr. Speaker, that seven of the above-named States that ratified said amendment had been with what was called the "southern confederacy." Surely it would not do for us now to say that the States so ratifying the amendment are not States within the Union. I might add that the Legislatures of California and New Jersey have since also ratified the amendment, while those of Kentucky and Delaware persistently refuse.

Mr. Speaker, we have heard on this floor, portrayed with zeal and eloquence, the barbarities committed by the rebels upon the Union soldiers, and the desecration of our dead, yea, even the murder of our venerable President. Now, sir, if it would restore to us again our much-esteemed President; to the bereaved parents, their sons; to the widow, her husband; to the orphan children, their fathers and protectors who fell in defense of this Republic; to the maimed their amputated limbs, and restore to health the shattered constitutions of our surviving soldiers, I would be willing—if the Constitution would allow it—to see the rebel States annihilated.

But that restoration cannot be had; our noble dead must sleep until the sound of Gabriel's trumpet. Though there are no marks to designate the resting-place of some, yet their noble deeds will be engraven upon the hearts of a grateful nation; while those who fell fighting to destroy our free institutions, if not totally forgotten, will only be remembered as rebels and traitors, and not as the honorable gentleman from New York [Mr. RAYMOND] said, in comparing them to our dead, "The dead of the contending hosts sleep beneath the soil of a common country under the common flag; their hostilities are hushed, and they are the dead of the nation forevermore." Sir, those who were trying to take the heart's blood of the nation deserve no such eulogy. Again, it has been asked, "How long may this nation survive with Senators elected by rebel Legislatures, or by treaties made by Senators chosen by rebel States?"

This, Mr. Speaker, is rather a patriotic appeal; but if the Senate and House of Representatives stand firm there will be no danger of such getting seats in either branch.

The sixth section of the third article of the Constitution of the United States provides that—

"Each House shall be the judge of the election, returns, and qualifications of its members."

We must not look at those questions as an advocate employed for his client, nor let our feelings betray our judgment, but view them as statesmen.

Mr. Speaker, we have been repeatedly told on this floor that we ought to be cautious about admitting Representatives from the States lately in rebellion, but no particular plan for their admission has been clearly defined.

It seems to me that if Congress would submit to the respective States a few important amendments to the Constitution of the United States, they would be ratified, and all this complication avoided. It would have been better if this course had been pursued immediately after the assembling of the present Congress.

The framers of the Constitution contemplated that the time might arrive when amendments would be necessary, and therefore provided a method for its accomplishment. It would be strange if, after a period of upward of seventy years in this progressive age, amendments would not be found necessary; though I think they ought to be as few as practicable.

Yet I do not agree with the honorable gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. RAYMOND], who, in speaking of the Constitution, says he "looks upon all propositions for its amendment with hesitation and distrust." How any statesman can "hesitate and distrust" about the practicability of amending the Constitution to correspond with the times and circumstances I cannot imagine. Then, Mr. Speaker, I would propose: first, that the Representatives in Congress shall be apportioned among the several States according to the number of qualified voters in each State. Secondly, that neither of the States of the Union shall ever assume or pay any part of the debt of the so-called confederate States of America, or of any State contracted in carrying on war against the United States; and, thirdly, that the Constitution be amended by striking out that clause which says:

"No tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any State."

According to the estimate of my colleague, [Mr. STEVENS,] a small tax on exportation of cotton alone would amount to $100,000,000 annually—a sum which would do much toward paying off our war debt. It is not likely it would be laid on any other product. These are all the amendments I deem necessary.

There can be no doubt that under the Constitution each State has a right to regulate the qualifications of its own electors, and Congress has no right to assume that authority. In the District of Columbia Congress has exclusive jurisdiction, and may there regulate the right of suffrage, which is of very little practical importance, as none but municipal officers are elective in the District. According to the constitution of Pennsylvania, none but "white freemen of the age of twenty-one years, having resided in the State one year," &c., are entitled to the right of suffrage, and before that can be changed there must be an alteration in the constitution of that State. As to the freedmen, the amendment already adopted gives Congress sufficient authority to legislate for their protection. I consider, Mr. Speaker, that the most important amendment needed is that of representation according to the vote; for while it must be conceded that each State has a right to regulate the right of suffrage, yet if the colored man is deprived of a vote he should not be counted in the representation; to simplify it, no other one ought to vote for him. If these three amendments were adopted, and especially the first, and the States lately in rebellion should send loyal men as representatives, they ought to be admitted; and if this arrangement could be made, I see no difficulty in regard to representation from those States. But Congress ought never to admit to a seat any man who has voluntarily borne arms against the United States, and of their qualification each House is the judge. President Johnson, in his annual message, says:

"It is for you, fellow-citizens of the House of Representatives to judge, each of you for yourselves, of the election, returns, and qualifications of your own members."

I have not time to review all the arguments from the Democratic side of this House, but if the gentlemen from New Jersey [Mr. ROGERS] and the late member from Indiana (Mr. Voorhees) express the views of their party, they would be willing to admit to seats on this floor rebels whose hands have been stained with the blood of our Union soldiers.

If we were to determine that the States lately in rebellion could only be admitted as new States, after presenting an acceptable constitution, and upon that basis receive them back, what would prevent them immediately after from changing their constitution in any way they saw fit, provided it was not inconsistent with that of the United States? So that the only safeguard is the amending of the Constitution of the United States, which will be a sufficient barrier against all innovations; and if those States are sincere as to their returned loyalty they will have no hesitation through their Legislatures to join in ratifying the material amendments, and especially that of representation.

It is true a bitter feeling has prevailed against some of the rebel States for their treasonable course, and especially South Carolina, and that is not to be wondered at when we take into consideration the unparalleled misery they have brought upon the country; but it is hoped they have repented in sackcloth and ashes, and, as some evidence of that, we find even South Carolina ratifying the amendment abolishing their favorite institution of slavery, while Kentucky and Delaware, professing to be loyal States, refuse. I trust, Mr. Speaker, that the two Houses of Congress will see the vast importance of having the requisite amendments to the Constitution speedily passed and submitted to the States for ratification. Then, after being ratified by the Legislatures of three fourths of the States, without fear of not being able to carry out the injunction of guarantying to every State in this Union a republican form of government, Representatives from those States lately in rebellion who can take the oath prescribed by existing laws can be admitted to seats in Congress; and it is due to such men as Maynard, Colonel Stokes, Colonel Hawkins, Arnell, Fowler, and others, who, in the nation's struggle, stood up for right and freedom, to be cared for. It was easy to be a Union man in the loyal States, surrounded by friends of the Republic, (and even there I am sorry to have to say that some were to be found sympathizing with treason,) but in the rebellious States it required the nerve of a Socrates to be loyal to his country where his personal liberty, life, property, and all that is dear to man were in peril. Even Alexander H. Stephens, who for a time so eloquently raised his voice against treason and clung to the horns of the altar of liberty, was, in the hour of trial and temptation, induced by the offer of a vice presidency in the so-called southern confederacy to let go that which he professed to love and revere, and turned his back against his country.

When war was raging it was necessary, for the preservation of the Union and to weaken the hands of the enemies of the Republic, to devastate the country in possession of the insurgents; but as the rebellion is now ended, it is the duty of the nation to foster and build it up; and by proper encouragement, with the blessings of free labor, evidenced by true loyalty, those States will exhibit in a few years one of the brightest spots in this Republic. My distinguished colleague, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] in speaking of the States lately in rebellion, says:

"Eleven of the columnar supports of our political edifice are now lying around us, like the grand columns of Tadmor and Palmyra, with shaft and capital and architrave alike shattered by the mighty convulsion that has laid them all in ruins."

And asks:

"Where is the hand that is to lift these columns to their place?"

Mr. Speaker, though the metaphor is beautiful, I do not agree with the honorable gentleman that eleven of the States of this Union are lying around "like the grand columns of Tadmor and Palmyra." The shock, it is true, was great, but they stood erect in the storm like the mighty oak of the forest, but came out somewhat scarred. But the leaders who caused this terrible conflict deserve condign punishment. The Government officials deserve great credit for causing the arrest, trial, and execution of Wirz, who was proved to be a monster, and for his barbarities to the Union prisoners deserved no better fate than that which was meted out to him; still he was but a subordinate, and it is not right that the chief officers should escape punishment. I agree with what was said by an eminent judge in my State, that "the greater the man, the greater the example."

Treason ought to be made odious, and there should be no procrastination in the trial of such offenders; the leading spirits should be the first brought to justice, and it is hoped that that part of the last annual message of President Johnson, in which he says—

"It is manifest that treason, most flagrant in character, has been committed. Persons who are charged with its commission should have fair and impartial trials in the highest civil tribunals of the country, in order that the Constitution and the laws may be fully vindicated; the truth clearly established and affirmed that treason is a crime, that traitors should be punished, and the offense made odious"— may be speedily carried into effect, though I cannot well see why the leading traitors in the rebellion could not have been tried by a military commission as well as Wirz. I look upon John C. Breckinridge as one of the vilest traitors, and I trust an effort will be made to have him arrested, tried, and punished; and I might say that officers who held high military positions under the United States, and with the knowledge acquired as to the position of affairs, turned traitors and joined the rebel army, ought not to be permitted to stalk about the country.

Now, Mr. Speaker, though I differ somewhat with some of our leading members of the Republican party in this House as to the status of the States lately in rebellion, I agree with them that none but true, loyal Representatives ought to be admitted to seats from those States, and that we should have, as a safeguard, proper amendments to the Constitution of the United States.

It is hoped that the joint committee on reconstruction may mature some acceptable plan, which will meet the approbation of both branches of Congress and of the President, for the speedy adjustment of the perplexed questions that now agitate the country. I do not agree with the honorable gentleman from New York, [Mr. RAYMOND,] that we do not get much information from that committee. It is composed of gentlemen of strict integrity, and experienced statesmen, who have been laboring assiduously to procure all the information possible to lay before Congress, and, when a full report is made, will no doubt give us definite information as to the situation of affairs in the States lately in rebellion, and be of great importance to the whole country. I would here remark that the honorable chairman of the committee, (my colleague,) who has already passed the period of life usually assigned to man, for his devotion to and toil in behalf of his country deserves great credit; and I pray that his life may be spared until the great questions that now so much interest the nation may be adjusted so that all the States can be represented in the councils of the nation.

If, Mr. Speaker, this great Republic, now extending from the St. Lawrence to the Gulf of Mexico, and from the Atlantic to the Pacific ocean, and from which the dark stain of slavery has been eradicated, and the Gospel, education, and civil rights extended to all classes, with a Constitution which, according to the language of Chief Justice Marshall, in Cohens vs. Virginia, (6 Wheaton, 387,) is formed for ages to come, and is designed to approach immortality as near as human institutions can approach it; and if the citizens are true and loyal, and put their trust in Him who holds in His hands the destinies of nations, this Republic will endure as a shining light until the end of time, showing to the world that man is capable of self-government, and that this is truly "the land of the free and home of the brave."

Mr. J. L. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, the great question of reconstruction and the collateral issues properly belonging to it have been agitating this country in some form or another since the first session of the Thirty-Eighth Congress.

The rebellion which has been so gloriously crushed out has devolved upon us the solemn duty of dealing with its results in such a manner as that a permanent peace shall be secured and a lasting adjustment of all the irritating causes that produced it, shall be forever put at rest. I, for one, have made up my mind what course I shall pursue, and "with malice toward none, with charity for all, with determination to do the right as God giveth me to see the right"—to advocate and support such principles as will reconstruct the States lately in rebellion on a sure and loyal foundation, and that treason will never again lift its bloody hand to strike down the bulwarks of the Constitution.

Differences have arisen among us as to how this can best be done. Loyal, patriotic, honest men have spoken on the subject, and while some of them differ as to the details, and others as to mere abstract questions and theoretic views of "State suicide," we all agree on one point, and that is, that no rebellious State shall be represented on this floor until her people show such unmistakable proofs of repentance and loyalty for the future as will warrant us in believing that "the Republic can receive no detriment" at the hands of its former assailants.

The committee on reconstruction, to whom this House, by the unanimous vote of the majority, intrusted the investigation of the condition of the rebel States, have not as yet reported that any of them are in a condition to be represented here, with the exception of the State of Tennessee. That committee, composed as it is of some of the best and most patriotic members of this body, is entitled to our highest consideration and respect, and would not, I am sure, abuse the trust that has been placed in their hands. The fact that they have not yet reported that any of these States, except the State of Tennessee, are in a condition to be represented is a strong argument to my mind why we should not be precipitate in our action. And however much that committee may have been abused by the whole copperhead press of the country, and arraigned by the President as an "irresponsible directory," I can see nothing either in the material of which it is formed or the duties which have been assigned them by the Senate and the House that detracts either from the conclusions at which they arrive or the right they have in exercising the powers allotted to them. Acting on behalf of the Senate and the House, they act as any other committee, clothed with such powers only as the Senate and the House see fit to give them. Their conclusions, and the facts upon which their judgment is based, must be submitted to the Congress for its ratification or rejection. How it can be looked upon or called "irresponsible," when it must render an account to the country for its conduct, is hard for me to comprehend. That it can be likened to a "directory," when it has no power of its own, and when its resolutions are feeble and lifeless except they receive the assent of Congress, is still more difficult for me to understand.

The joint resolution empowering that committee to act was passed on the 4th day of December last, and received the support and the vote of some of the very men whom we find to-day denouncing it as a usurpation. When it went out to the world no one saw in it anything but a legitimate exercise of the powers of Congress, and the President himself, so far as I am aware, did not say a word in opposition to it.

The Constitution says that "each House shall be the judge of the election, qualification, and returns of its own members." It nowhere says that each House shall separately, for itself, do this, nor that it shall not be done by the concurrent action of each House. Each House can act separately for itself, and in all questions touching the elections, &c., of the members of each House, the practice heretofore in ordinary cases has been for each House to act without the concurrence of the other.

But the question involved in the admission of the Senators and Representatives of the lately rebellious States was and is not a mere question of qualification, election, and return of its members, but goes to the fundamental principles of the status and organization of the people and the State governments of the States asking for the admission of their Senators and Representatives.

The Constitution says that "each House may determine the rules of its own proceedings." (Article one, section five.) Does this prevent the Congress from making joint rules, to be binding on both? On the contrary, has it not been the practice for each House, by concurrent action, to make joint rules, not only to facilitate public business, but to make their action uniform and harmonious? And if there ever was a case presented where neither House should act without the concurrence of the other it is in the mode and manner of dealing with the representation from these States. If each House should act for itself we might have the strange anomaly of the people being represented in one branch and the States unrepresented in another, or vice versa.

Again, the Constitution says that—

"The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States, and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for the electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature."—Art. I, Sec. 2.

Will any one tell me that the House has not the power to inquire and ascertain whether a man sent here to represent the people was in fact elected by the electors having the qualifications requisite for the most numerous branch of the State Legislatures? Suppose a man should present himself with his credentials, bearing the broad seal of his State, certifying that he was duly elected, and it should turn out that he was not elected by the qualified electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature, but by a portion of the people not qualified as such an elector—a negro population, for example—will any one affirm that we would not have the power to ascertain who and what these electors were; and if they were not what the Constitution says they shall be, to refuse to admit them? And the same may be said as to the power of the Senate in relation to the States.

And yet when Congress passes a joint resolution appointing a joint committee whose duty is to inquire into the condition of eleven States, the majority of whose people have for the past four years been in armed and wicked rebellion against the Government, and to report whether any of these States are entitled to be represented because of their treason, it is denounced as a crime, and held up to the world as a monstrous outrage and a vile usurpation.

Sir, if it be an outrage for me to refuse to admit to my house a man coming from a locality infected with some loathsome, contagious disease until I am satisfied I can do it without running any risks or hazards of my life, or to the life of the inmates of my house, then it is monstrous in me to refuse men admission here, coming from disloyal constituencies, until I am satisfied their admission will not endanger the life of the Republic. This unseemly haste on the part of these States to come back into Congress on their terms is only equalled by their precipitate action in leaving these Halls in 1861 to join in breaking up by force of arms what they would tear down to-morrow by political trickery if you but give them the opportunity and the power.

While I am as desirous as any man that the States unrepresented should have their delegates participate with us in our deliberations, I am at the same time sensible of a duty that I owe to my country and to such of the loyal masses of the South as stood true to the Union in its hour of peril, that is paramount to any courtesy that I might be willing to extend to them.

Sir, the smoke of the great revolution through which we have just emerged has not yet sufficiently passed away to allow us to discern clearly the prospects or hopes of the future. For myself, as I never entertained a doubt during the long and dreary night that for nearly five years hung like a death-pall over our country, that the rebellion would be finally crushed out, and traitors made to feel the enormity of their guilt, so to-day, if I feel a sad disappointment that they have not met that doom that their treason entitled them to receive, I have an abiding confidence in the devotion and patriotism of the loyal masses of the people that they will never allow these rebels, who have forfeited everything by their rebellion, to dictate the terms upon which they shall resume their relationship to the Government. They are either to be consulted as to what conditions will best please them, or we are to make known to them upon what terms we please to receive them. We are either to consent that such men as they select shall be our peers in this House, or we are to tell them what character of peers they shall send here. We are either to exact no guarantees for future security, or we are to impose such guarantees as Congress in its wisdom may deem best for the public good.

I hold that treason is the same, whether it be committed by an aggregate of individuals, or by but one individual. It is levying war against the United States; giving aid and comfort to its enemies. When an aggregate of individuals commit treason, they are as liable to pay its penalty as any single individual would be. If any person in a State commits treason, and you have the power to prescribe the conditions upon which he shall be pardoned, (which the President has done, both by his amnesty proclamation and the thousands of pardons he has granted,) then you have the power as a Congress to say to these same men, "Before you shall be allowed to exercise your functions as States, you shall first comply with certain conditions, which we deem to be necessary before we can allow you to resume all your rights as members of a State."

The Constitution says the United States shall guaranty to each State a republican form of government. At the end of the rebellion we found that the insurgents had erected insurrectionary governments that were in the hands of traitors, and that were not only not republican, but that were usurpations and tyrannies. We found that the rebels in arms had seized hold of the political machinery of the States, and had not only carried them into rebellion, but had linked their fortunes to a pretended and revolutionary confederacy, which they acknowledged, and to which they had all sworn allegiance.

We found that men who were true in their loyalty to this Government were hunted down like dogs and treated like beasts; their property confiscated, their homesteads desolated, their wives and children forced away from them because of their loyalty. We found all this, and more which I shall not stop to recount, and which history will blush to record.

This being the case, the question is, not whether the States that went into rebellion were ever out of the Union, not whether by their ordinances of secession they succeeded in doing what their ordinances proclaimed to the world, but whether the State governments we found in existence at the time the combined armies of the confederacy surrendered to Grant were the legitimate State governments recognized by the Constitution, and republican in form, or were usurpations, presided over by traitors to their country.

It cannot be contended for a moment that the State governments found in existence in April, 1865, were the same State governments that existed prior to 1861. Not only is this not so, in relation to the functionaries representing these State governments, such as Governors, judges, and members of the Legislature, but in many, if not all of them, their State constitutions had been changed in order to meet the new obligations which they had contracted in attaching themselves to the rebel usurpation. Were these State governments legal or illegal; were they constitutional or unconstitutional; were they republican or anti-republican? If they are legal, constitutional, and republican, then were their ordinances of secession legal, constitutional, and republican? If, on the other hand, their ordinances of secession are and were void, then their State governments made under their ordinances of secession are void. The one follows as the necessary consequence of the other. This being the case, their secession ordinances being void, and all their State governments in existence during the rebellion being in like manner void and usurpations, we are forced to come to one of two conclusions, either that the State governments in existence in 1861 and prior to the rebellion, are in existence now, unchanged, with all of their rights and immunities, in as full and ample a manner as they possessed them at that time, or the rebel usurpations which continued in these States for four years, and which have been overthrown by force of arms, are still in existence, or the new State governments, created by provisional governors appointed by the President, are in existence.

If the first be the case—that is, if these State Governments have had an existence all through the rebellion just as though no rebellion had happened—then there is no obligation, no condition that either Congress or the Executive, either as a war measure or in any other respect, can impose upon these States. Then neither Congress nor the Executive have any right to say, you shall first adopt the amendment to abolish slavery, and repudiate the doctrine of secession, and as a condition-precedent before their admission to representation in Congress. Then neither the President nor Congress has any right to say that before any of their Representatives shall be admitted here they shall first be loyal, and then take an oath of loyalty.

If this be true, then neither Mr. Lincoln nor Mr. Johnson had any right to appoint provisional governors of States whose machinery of government was already in existence, and which the rebellion did not and could not destroy. Then all the acts done by these provisional governors are illegal and void, and without warrant of law, either under the Constitution or the laws of nations.

It appears to me, sir, that a strange confusion of ideas has taken place in the discussion of this question. A State is confounded with the government of the State. A State cannot go out of the Union unless by successful revolution it succeeds in a separate, independent nationality, acknowledged as such by the world. Secession ordinances cannot carry a State out of the Union, because if they could, every State that attempted to secede would to-day be out of the Union. But the government of a State can become usurped and so utterly destroyed as to require not only remodeling but an entire new frame work.

Suppose, sir, for illustration, that the rebels in my own State had succeeded in 1861 in passing an ordinance of secession and forcing the loyal Governor of Maryland either to leave the State or to vacate the functions of his office; suppose, in place of the State government then in existence, they had elected another Governor, Legislature, and judiciary—all of them sworn to support the upstart and usurping confederacy; suppose this State government so organized had waged war against the United States for four years, and at the end of that time was compelled by force of arms to submit to the power against whom it had rebelled, in what condition would my State have been, and what would have been the duty and the obligations of this Government to the loyal Union men of Maryland who refused to take part in the usurpation, and who never yielded a voluntary support to the confederacy?

To be sure the boundaries of the State would have remained the same as they do now. Its geography would not have been changed, and possibly its name would have been allowed to exist. But suppose one portion of the people, acting under the constitution of the State as it existed prior to 1861, had elected Representatives and Senators, and suppose another portion of the people had elected Senators and Representatives in accordance with the laws made during the four years it was in rebellion, and that still another portion had elected Senators and Representatives in accordance with a constitution and laws made and enacted under and by virtue of a convention called into being by a provisional governor appointed by the President as Commander-in-Chief of the Army, which State government would you recognize, and which set of Representatives would you admit, and where would the power reside as to which was the State government and who its Representatives? If you say you would recognize the State governments in existence prior to 1861, then how can you reconcile the fact that the State governments organized in all of the lately rebellious States are to-day the creatures and creations of the conjoint action of the President of the United States by the appointment of provisional governors, on the one part, and the people of these States, acting by permission of the provisional governors, on the other.

If it be said that this cannot be done, that the State governments as they existed in 1860 were usurped, then I want to know if you intend to acknowledge the rebel usurpations carried on for over four years in spite of the Constitution, and in spite of the armies and the Navy of the United States which finally ground them to powder. If you will not, as you cannot and dare not, acknowledge the rebel usurpations, then the question is presented, are the State governments as at present organized in the lately rebellious States, so organized on such principles of justice and loyalty as to warrant the people of the United States to reinvest them with all the rights and privileges of States in as full and ample a manner as they were possessed by them prior to the time when they went into rebellion?

In the discussion of this question, Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to allow myself to be drawn into a consideration of abstract questions, which when fully exhausted and finally answered bring us no nearer to the point we are trying to reach than when we started.

For this reason I do not intend to assume, as many have who have preceded me, either the right of a State to secede, or whether the rebel States did secede, or whether they have ever been out of the Union, or whether they are Territories. It is enough for me to know that they have been in rebellion; that during that rebellion their State governments ceased to have any relations (except as enemies) with the people of the United States; that certain consequences followed from their rebellion—one the subversion or overthrow of their State governments, the other a suspension of the representation in Congress.

I claim, sir, that it is for Congress to decide not only whether these State governments having been once subverted, have been again reconstructed, but to examine and see how they have been reconstructed, and whether they have been so reconstructed as to entitle them to representation here. In the language of the lamented Lincoln—

“Let us all join in doing the acts necessary to restoring the proper practical relations between these States and the Union, and each forever after innocently indulge his own opinion whether, in doing the acts, he brought the States from without into the Union, or only gave them proper assistance, they never having been out of it.”

That we are all desirous of doing this I am satisfied. That it ought to be done quickly, but with a view to secure future peace and security, both to them and to us, I am persuaded. So far as the constitutional power of Congress over this whole matter is concerned, I am convinced it is ample and exclusive.

The President, as Commander-in-Chief of the Army and the Navy, has the power to erect military provisional governments as temporary expedients for peace and quiet. But these provisional governments only proved two things: first, that the old State governments had been subverted or destroyed; and second, that having been destroyed, some expedient must be resorted to to make a new one. The power of Congress commenced where that of the President ceased. His power ceased when he withdrew his provisional governors. The power of Congress commenced when called upon to recognize the Senators and Representatives of the newly-reconstructed State governments.

That this power is in Congress, and exclusively in Congress, I shall read a short passage from the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Luther vs. Borden, reported in 7 Howard's Supreme Court Reports, at page 10. Say the court:

“The fourth section of the fourth article of the Constitution of the United States provides that Congress shall guaranty to every State in the Union a republican form of government.”

“Under this article of the Constitution it rests with Congress to decide what government is established one in a State. For as the United States guaranty to every State a republican government, Congress must necessarily decide what government is established in a State before it can determine whether it is republican or not.”

“And when the Senators and Representatives of a State are admitted”—

I desire gentlemen to pay their particular attention to this—

“into the councils of the Union, the authority of the government under which they are appointed, as well as its republican character, is recognized by the proper constitutional authority.”

What stronger authority could you have, as to the meaning of the guarantee clause and of the duties and powers of Congress under it than this? And what better vindication could we desire, as to our refusal to admit these Senators and Representatives from the rebel States until their condition has been inquired into and the form of government they have made has been ascertained, than the announcement made in this case, that when the Senators and Representatives are admitted into the councils of the Union the authority under which they are appointed is not only recognized, but the republican character of their State governments is at once and forever acknowledged?

Acting on this theory, at the first session of the Thirty-Eighth Congress a joint resolution was passed declaring that no State declared to be in rebellion by the proclamation of the President shall be entitled to appoint electors for President and Vice President until both Houses of Congress by concurrent action shall have recognized a State government in such State.

This theory of reconstruction is not therefore a new one, made by this Congress to keep the rebellious States from participating in legislation, but has been solemnly decided by the Supreme Court of the United States as a power vested exclusively in Congress, and one that no coordinate branch of this Government has the right to interfere with.

And, sir, the world will be surprised to know that both Mr. Seward and the President held to this doctrine, and so instructed some of the provisional governors of the so-called reconstructed States.

In answer to a letter from Governor Marvin, provisional governor of Florida, Mr. Seward, on the 12th of September, 1865, thus speaks:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
WASHINGTON, September 12, 1865.

SIR: Your Excellency's letter of the 29th ultimo, with the accompanying proclamation, has been received and submitted to the President. The steps to which it refers toward reorganizing the government of Florida seem to be in the main judicious, and good results from them may be hoped for. The presumption to which the proclamation refers, however, in favor of insurgents who may wish to vote and who may have applied for but not received their pardons, is not exactly approved. All applications for pardon will be duly considered and will be disposed of as soon as may be practicable. It must, however, be distinctly understood that the restoration to which your proclamation refers will be subject to the decision of Congress.

I have the honor to be your Excellency's obedient servant,

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

What did the Secretary mean, when he said that the restoration to which the Governor's proclamation referred "will be subject to the decision of Congress," if it was not that to Congress attached the duty, the power, and the responsibility of deciding how and when that restoration was complete, final, and satisfactory?

Again, in a dispatch dated July 24, 1865, Mr. Seward, by order of the President, sends the following telegram to Governor Sharkey, of Mississippi:

WASHINGTON, July 24, 1865.

W. L. SHARKEY, Provisional Governor of Mississippi:

Your telegram of the 21st has been received. The President sees no reason to interfere with General Slocum's proceedings. The government of the State will be provisional only until the civil authorities shall be restored with the approval of Congress. Meanwhile military authority cannot be withdrawn.

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

Has Congress said any more? Could Congress say any more? Which of the civil authorities of any of these States has been restored with the approval of Congress? And yet Mr. Seward undertakes to unite with those who denounce the action of Congress as revolutionary because Congress assumes to do what he says cannot be done except with the approval of Congress. If Congress has not the constitutional power to inquire into and determine the fact whether the governments of these States lately in rebellion have been properly reorganized, I want to know who has that power? Has the President? If he has, where does he find his power? It is clearly not in the Constitution, and it is equally as clear that it is not to be found either in the laws of Congress or in any military power that he possesses as Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy. Has the Supreme Court the power to determine this question? It certainly cannot have, since all of its powers are well defined, and, as I have before stated, that tribunal has decided that Congress has the power.

We are driven, then, to one of two conclusions: that there is no power anywhere, in any of the coordinate branches of this Government to judge of or determine upon the reconstruction of these States, or that power belongs to and resides in the Congress of the United States. By assuming the first, the States that went into rebellion would have the right to build up any kind of a government as a State organization, and provided it owed allegiance to the Constitution of the United States it would be entitled to be recognized as such and to have its representation in this House. More than this, the States that went into rebellion not only did not need any provisional or military governments to aid them in building up new governments after the fall of the confederacy, but by simply surrendering, after they were compelled to surrender, and yielding obedience to the laws of the United States, after they were forced to do so, they had the right eo instanti to resume their former position in the Union, and to have all the original rights exercised by them before they went into rebellion.

I, for one, cannot agree to any such a doctrine, but hold to the only safe rule for the reconstruction of these States, that the power is in Congress to determine when these States shall be entitled to exercise all their proper functions in the Union, and how and on what terms it shall be done. Ay, sir, and that until these terms are complied with they shall remain where they have remained for the last four years, in the Union to be sure, because they had not the power to get out of it; but in the Union, divested of their representation in Congress until the Union masses of this land have so hedged them in by proper guarantees and safeguards for future protection as that they can be safely invested with all the powers of loyal States.

The question then occurs, have the State governments of any of the rebellious States been reconstructed in such a manner as to entitle them to be not only represented in Congress, but to receive all the powers and privileges of loyal States?

In answering this question we should consider, first, the status of the people of these States as to their loyalty to the Government; and second, the nature or kind of State governments they have organized, and which we are called upon to recognize.

I take it that no true, devoted friend of his country could wish that any of these States should again aid in controlling the destinies of this nation until the people of the States have shown themselves to be loyal to the Government which they are in part to control. When I use the word loyal in this connection, I do not mean that sturdy, bold, and defiant patriot who, through four years of blood and slaughter, maintained that no State had the right to rebel, and who refused to give a voluntary support to the rebel usurpation; but I take it in its new and amended sense, as a man who did go into rebellion, but who, having taken the amnesty oath, means in good faith to keep it.

In this latter sense I am constrained to say that I do not believe that the vast majority of those who have taken the oath are loyal, because I do not believe, in the language of our patriotic President, that you "trust" them.

That my opinion is not formed from any prejudice, but that it is a conviction based on sworn and legal testimony, I beg leave to refer to the testimony of Hon. John Covode. In one part of it, in answer to a question put to him by the committee, he says:

"I conversed with loyal men from other States—Mississippi, Alabama, &c.—who were then in New Orleans. They expressed a deep interest in having a correct policy inaugurated in Louisiana on account of the effect it would have on their own States. They said that if Louisiana was directed in the right course at the start, from her position and relations to other States, it would go far to produce the best results in several other States. I will here state that many truly loyal men whom I met in New Orleans seemed to lack confidence in their being ultimately protected and supported by the Government; and I was frequently asked, if I became satisfied or convinced that they were to be abandoned to the rule of the rebel element, to notify them in time to enable them to get away, more especially if the troops of the United States were to be withdrawn. They said that if the troops were withdrawn they could not live there. I know many citizens of Louisiana who remained within reach of the military because they did not dare to venture to return to their former homes."

In another part of his testimony the following significant facts are developed:

"Question. Have you a copy of your report to the President?"

"Answer. I have not a copy of that report. I have at home the rough draft from which the report was made, but not the accompanying papers, as I had no copies made of them. Not being aware that I should be called before this committee to testify I did not bring that rough draft with me to the city."

"Question. Can you state from recollection the substance of the conclusions in your report to the President which you state you made to him?"

"Answer. I might be able to state the substance of the conclusions. One of them I recollect distinctly was to this effect: 'That if the rebel element was allowed to vote in the South every member who would be returned to Congress would be hostile to the policy of the Federal Government, not only as regards payment of the national debt, but in reference to the emancipation of the negroes; that while they expressed a willingness to accede to the principles of the emancipation proclamation, they always coupled with it a determination to regulate their own affairs in that respect, stating that they would have an organized system of negro labor which they would control for themselves. Over and over again, in conversation in New Orleans, I heard them saying that they could make the condition of affairs better for themselves than it was before. They said that Government had freed the negroes and should be made to take care of cripples and those who were not able to work, while they would regulate and control the labor of able-bodied men.'

"I would here state that while many in the South would say that Government must pay the rebel debt as well as Federal debt, the better and more intelligent class of them did not speak in this way; but they told me distinctly that I could not expect that they would help to pay our debt or pension our soldiers for whipping them; that they would have power in the Government some day, with their increased representation, and would be able to defeat the payment of the interest on the debt or in some other way destroy public credit. I asked them where they expected to get help for that purpose, and they would generally say that there were portions of the North where they had no interest in Government securities—the West, for instance. I found that to be the feeling among the best men who had been in the rebellion that I met at the South. They seemed to take it for granted that we could not expect them, when they should again attain power, to help pay our debts."

Now, this is the testimony of one of the men sent by the President to ascertain the amount and kind of loyalty there is in the South.

Carl Schurz, also sent by the President to ascertain the feeling of the South, gives the following as his estimate of loyalty:

"I may sum up all I have said in a few words. If nothing were necessary but to restore the machinery of government in the States lately in rebellion in point of form, the movements made to that end by the people of the South might be considered satisfactory. But if it is required that the southern people should also accommodate themselves to the results of the war in point of spirit, those movements fall far short of what must be insisted upon."

"The loyalty of the masses and most of the leaders of the southern people consists in submission to necessity. There is, except in individual instances, an entire absence of that national spirit, which forms the basis of true loyalty and patriotism."

He also recommends the President to—

"Advise Congress to send one or more 'investigating committees' into the southern States to inquire for themselves into the actual condition of things before final action is taken upon the readmission of such States to their representation in the legislative branch of the Government and the withdrawal of the national control from that section of the country."

Generals Terry and Turner and Colonel Brown—

"Concur in representing the sentiments of the people of Virginia in relation to the Government as unimproved, and as rather having become embittered since Lee's surrender. They say that at that time the people were humble, sick of war, longing for peace on any terms, and ready to accept gratefully the pardon of the Government, and to submit to any conditions that might be imposed, while now they are arrogant, exacting, and intolerant. Most witnesses of that class express a decided opinion that the withdrawal of the Federal troops and of the Freedmen's Bureau would be followed by an unremitting persecution of white Unionists and persecution and remission to slavery of the colored people. The change of feeling is very generally ascribed by these witnesses to the President's liberal policy. In regard to the Federal debt, the people of Virginia are represented as in favor of its repudiation, or at least of combining with it the confederate debt. The witnesses who have been connected with the confederacy, however, deny this, and represent the people as willing to pay their share of the Federal debt by taxation. On this subject General Lee's opinion is that they are willing to pay both, and opposed to a repudiation of either."

General Swayne thus testifies before the committee on reconstruction of the amount and kind of loyalty in Alabama. He says:

"After the surrender of Lee a kindly feeling was generally expressed toward the United States, since which a great increase of bitterness has taken place, displaying itself in a sort of social ostracism toward Union men, northern emigrants, and Army officers. There is a general desire on the part of the people to see the bureau removed. The Governor would like to see it removed, but while it remains extends to it cordial cooperation. The city of Mobile appears to be largely under the dominion of rowdiness, and actuated throughout by a feeling of hostility to the freedmen. During the past six months four colored churches have been burned in consequence of an attempt to establish colored schools in them."

Dr. James P. Hambleton, an ex-rebel surgeon, thus testifies as to the feeling in Georgia:

"The people there expect payment for their slaves and for the destruction of property by the war when the passions of the hour shall have subsided. They expect that at some future day there will be a sort of compromise by which the southern States will be relieved of their share of the rebel debt as a compensation for their losses. The people hold the same opinions as to State sovereignty as before the war, but having accepted the situation cannot, as honorable men, again resort to secession."

Talk about the loyalty of the South! Loyalty to whom and to what? Loyalty to the Government and people of the United States who have made them submit by force to the Constitution and laws they fought so long and desperately to destroy? Is it natural that the hearts of these people could so soon be changed from one of intense, bitter, deadly hate to that of devotion and attachment to the Government? And if their loyalty is not one of devotion and attachment, what kind of loyalty is it? Do you propose to have two kinds of loyalty, one for the North and the other for the South? If you do, what is to be the nature of the one and the character of the other? If northern loyalty is shown by the thousands of lives that have been lost and the millions of money that has been spent to preserve the nation, is southern loyalty to be proven by an utter contempt for the brave heroes who put down the rebellion, by a shameful recital of their high-handed outrages in desolating loyal States, or by making demigods of their traitorous leaders, to whom even now they propose to erect monuments as enduring evidence of their new-born love to the Government? Is this the kind of loyalty you want? Is this the kind of men you trust with the destinies of this nation? If it is, then, in my judgment, you need no joint committee to hunt it up. You will find it broadcast from Virginia to Texas. If it is not, then you must wait, and wait patiently, until the people in that region learn what you mean by loyalty, and set earnestly to work to obtain it.

Mr. Speaker, I am not an alarmist, but I cannot close my eyes to what is going on around me, nor fail to note the "signs of the times." We have barely emerged from one of the greatest and most bloody conflicts known to the annals of history. Millions of treasure have been spent, hundreds of thousands of lives have been sacrificed, and whole States have been desolated by the ravages of war to put down treason and to maintain and uphold the Constitution and the Union. Sir, if I mistake not, we are on the eve of a revolution that portends as momentous consequences to the untold millions of the future as the conflict through which we have passed brought upon us.

I cannot close my eyes to the fact that the very men who brought on this war of rebellion, and who strove through blood and persecution to overthrow this Republic, are striving to-day to get back into the places they ignominiously deserted, and are endeavoring once more to control the Government they impiously tried to subvert. I cannot overlook the fact that in none of the States where treason was the most violent and vindictive, and where traitors were the most wicked and defiant, has there been a single State government established, but that men whose records were the blackest for treason to the country have been elevated to the highest offices by the people; while on the other hand, men who were true to the country, and who suffered persecutions and confiscation, and were at all times the staunch and unwavering supporters of the Union, are set aside and laughed at and mocked for their loyalty. I have yet to see wherein treason has been looked upon as a crime, or to find where any traitor has been made odious. On the contrary, the tens of thousands of men who with devilish hate sought the life of the nation are as complacent at the sad wreck they have made, and as jubilant at the easy penalties they have incurred, as though they had been doing God's work, and were receiving a crown of glory for their valor and devotion to the cause of treason.

After the surrender of Lee to Grant these men were ready to agree to any terms. They thought that treason was a crime, and that there was a law in existence to punish it as such. They would have been willing at that time to concede any condition for future good behavior and security in order to save their lives and their property. But when the President, from the goodness of his heart it may be, but certainly with mistaken clemency, gave them a pardon for past offenses, and they found themselves far beyond the reach of the law, they began to think that treason was not so great an offense after all, that it was only a political mistake, and not a crime. And to-day, instead of being humble and penitent, we find them open, bold, and defiant. They talk now of their rights in the Union, just as they used to prate of their "divine institution," and insist that we have no power to impose any terms upon them, and that all who do insist on terms are traitors and disunionists. I am inclined to think, sir, that if we were traitors we would have a better chance of easy times for the future than by standing forth as the advocates of our country's right, to be branded by such as they as revolutionists.

The President, in my judgment, made a great, a sad, and I fear a fatal mistake in the indiscriminate manner with which he granted pardon.

I am satisfied he did it for the best, thinking that after these men said they had lost all, and that the Government, in its great clemency forgave them all, they would become penitent and be moved by the tender cords of love to the side of the country. But, sir, the President has been mistaken. He has been made the victim of misplaced confidence, and instead of their becoming penitent, they are as defiant to-day as they were when Jeff. Davis ruled at Richmond as the great high-priest of the confederacy. Treason is still as deep and as damning in their bosoms as the day the great southern heart was inflamed by the attack on Sumter. They will strive to make the President think otherwise, to induce him to stand by them, and after he has stood by them and they have once more got back the power they lost, they will turn on him to sting him as surely as the viper turned to sting the farmer after he had warmed life into it.

It was but the other day that Alexander H. Stephens, the vice president of the exploded confederacy, gave his testimony before the committee on reconstruction, and what does he say:

"But the people of that State, (Georgia,) as I have said, would not willingly, I think, do more than they have done for restoration. The only view in their opinion that could possibly justify the war which was carried on by the Federal Government against them was the idea of the indissolubleness of the Union; that those who held the administration for the time were bound to enforce the execution of the laws and the maintenance of the integrity of the country under the Constitution; and since that war was accomplished, since those who had assumed the contrary principle—the right of secession and the reserved sovereignty of the States—had abandoned their cause, and the Administration here was successful in maintaining the idea upon which war was proclaimed and waged, and the only view in which they supposed it could be justified at all; when that was accomplished, I say, the people of Georgia supposed their State was immediately entitled to all her rights under the Constitution. That is my opinion of the sentiment of the people of Georgia, and I do not think they would be willing to do anything further as a condition precedent to their being permitted to enjoy the full measure of their constitutional rights. I only give my opinion of the sentiment of the people at this time. They expected that as soon as the confederate cause was abandoned that immediately the States would be brought back into their practical relations with the Government as previously constituted."

"That is what they looked to. They expected that the State would immediately have their representatives in the Senate and in the House, and they expected in good faith, as loyal men, as the term is frequently used—I mean by it loyal to law, order, and the Constitution—to support the Government under the Constitution. That was their feeling. They did what they did believing it was best for the protection of constitutional liberty. Toward the Constitution of the United States, as they construed it, the great mass of our people were as much devoted in their feelings as any people ever were toward any cause. This is my opinion. As I remarked before, they resorted to secession with a view of maintaining more securely these principles. And when they found they were not successful in their object, in perfect good faith, as far as I can judge from meeting with them and conversing with them, looking to the future developments of their country in its material resources, as well as its moral and intellectual progress, their earnest desire and expectation was to allow the past struggle, lamentable as it was in its results, to pass by, and to cooperate with the true friends of the Constitution, with those of all sections who earnestly desire the preservation of constitutional liberty and the perpetuation of the Government in its purity. They have been a little disappointed in this, and are so now. They are patiently waiting, however, and believing that when the passions of the hour have passed away this delay in restoration will cease. They think they have done everything that was essential and proper, and my judgment is, that they would not be willing to do anything further as a condition precedent. They would simply remain quiet and passive."

What will the loyal men of this country say to such reasoning as this? After carrying on a war of four years to break up the Government, and after having been conquered and compelled to yield to a superior force, we are coolly told by these reconstructed patriots that they expected their representatives to be admitted "as loyal men," and that when they went into rebellion the people thought it was best for constitutional liberty, and that they will not agree to any conditions that the American people impose upon them, and says with the most supreme impudence that the South ought to refuse all conditions, and in case conditions are demanded and refused, he says:

"Should such an offer be made and declined, and these States should thus continue to be excluded and kept out, a singular spectacle would be presented. A complete reversal of positions would be presented. In 1861 these States thought they could not remain safely in the Union without new guarantees, and now, when they agree to resume their former practical relations in the Union under the Constitution as it is, the other States turn upon them and say they cannot permit them to do so, safely to their interest, without new guarantees on their part. The southern States would thus present themselves as willing for immediate union under the Constitution, while it would be the northern States opposed to it. The former disunionists would thereby become Unionists, and the former Unionists the practical disunionists."

Surely, Mr. Stephens has been taking lessons from the President, or the President has been learning from him. He says further on this subject:

"I think, as the Congress of the United States did not consent to the withdrawal of the seceding States, it was a continuous right under the Constitution of the United States, to be exercised so soon as the seceding States respectively made known their readiness to resume their former practical relations with the Federal Government, under the Constitution of the United States. As the General Government denied the right of secession, I do not think any of the States attempting to exercise it thereby lost any of their rights under the Constitution as States when their people abandoned that attempt."

Is it any wonder that these red-handed traitors are such friends of the "President's policy," when they see and know that "his policy," and his alone, is to give back to them all their rights as fully and place them in possession of the Government as completely as before they went into rebellion? And if this "policy" be carried out, what penalty is there, or can there be, for treason? And what inducements will be held out for loyalty? On the contrary, will not a premium be offered for disloyalty, and treason made respectable?

The President's policy, in my judgment, has done more to make treason respected and traitors heroes than the establishment and independence of the confederacy could have done; because, if the President's policy is fully carried out, it not only places the eleven seceding or rebellious States in the hands of the rebels, but by giving them once more a voice in the Government, the time will not be long before these same rebels will have the complete control of the Government in all its departments. No wonder, then, every rebel, from Davis to the merest subaltern in the confederate army, including bushwhackers, jayhawkers, and guerrillas, copperheads, and whilom peace men, are the earnest and devoted admirers of the "President's policy." It is just the "policy" for them, because they plainly see that it is the only one that they can live by and one which, through their newspaper press, they profess to die by. The President may continue to be deluded; but I warn the American people to-day not to look with indifference at what is going on about them, not to imagine, because we have put down the war of rebellion, there is still no danger to the Republic. I say there is danger; and unless the people of the North, the East, and the West arise once more in their might and proclaim to the South, you shall not be again invested with all the rights of loyal States until fundamental guarantees are given for future peace and security, you will see this Government, in less than ten years, in the hands of the very men who for the past four years have been trying to destroy it.

But it is said the President has the advantage of Congress, because he has "a policy," and Congress has none. It is a good thing for this country and the world that Congress has no "policy." The day of "policy" has, I trust, passed away, never to return. It was "policy" that brought on this rebellion, and that was near making the rebellion a success.

So long as Congress and the Executive acted on "policy" in the prosecution of the war, defeat after defeat was the result. But so soon as "policy" was thrown aside, and principles, eternal and unchangeable, were pursued instead, victory after victory perched upon the banners of the Republic, until at last principle was made triumphant over policy in the total and utter overthrow of treason.

It was "policy" that induced the framers of the Constitution to recognize the existence of slavery. It was "policy" that made the Missouri compromise of 1820, and that led to its repeal. It was "policy" that made the fugitive slave law of 1850, and it is "policy" that would to-day yield to the spirit of slavery, and give back to it more than it possessed when four million human beings were held in bondage.

No, sir; I want no policy; I have done with it. I want principles—principles that will live when you and I are dead, and that our children can live by and bless us for when they come in possession of the trust reposed in us.

This war has already decided one principle. It has decided that hereafter, in this land of liberty, there shall be no such thing as a slave, and the American people have made this principle a part of the organic law of the land. Mr. Alexander Stephens, however, does not think that the American people had the right or the power to make this a part of the Constitution, although he says it was one of the results of the war.

Hear the logic of this ex-vice president of the confederacy:

Question. Do you mean to be understood in your last answer that there is no constitutional power in the Government, as at present organized, to exact conditions precedent to the restoration of political power to the eleven States that have been in rebellion?

Answer. Yes, sir; that is my opinion.

Question. Do you entertain the same opinion in reference to the amendments to the Constitution abolishing slavery?

Answer. I do. I think the States, however, abolished slavery in good faith as one of the results of the war. Their ratification of the constitutional amendment followed as a consequence. I do not think there is any constitutional power on the part of the Government to have exacted it as a condition precedent to their restoration under the Constitution, or to the resumption of their places as members of the Union.

Congress has decided another principle which it had the power to do under the constitutional amendment abolishing slavery, and that is that all freemen should have the common rights of humanity—to sue, testify, and hold property; thus, for the first time in the history of this Government, making good the avowment in the Declaration of Independence that—

"All men are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights, among which are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness."

I propose that now, since slavery is no longer in existence, that the clause in the Constitution of the United States put there by "policy" in the interests of slavery shall be stricken out, and that hereafter the southern States, instead of having a representation here based on the negro population, shall be represented according to their white population alone or according to their voting population.

I have heretofore given my reasons for this and do not propose to repeat them, but until a constitutional amendment of this kind is passed by Congress and ratified by the States I cannot vote to admit them to representation.

Desiring that "treason should be made odious," and knowing that it would be unsafe to again trust political power to such as engaged in rebellion against the Government; feeling that I cannot safely trust such men in making laws for me, I want a constitutional amendment proclaiming in effect that no person who has entered or shall hereafter enter into rebellion against the United States shall ever be eligible for President, Vice President, or member of the Cabinet, or as a Senator or Representative in Congress.

I know you have a law on your statute-book, commonly called the "test oath," that excludes such persons from being Senators or Representatives; but once allow the southern States to participate in legislation, and in conjunction with the men who serenaded the President on the 22d of February last, and who presented him with a set of resolutions in which this test oath is denounced, you will find that it is but a "rope of sand," and that it will be repealed as unconstitutional. I prefer, therefore, to make this a part of the organic law, so as to place it beyond the reach of any "policy" that may hereafter desire to repeal it.

I know it will be hard for the southern people, who have engaged in this rebellion, to be taxed to pay off any public debt contracted in subduing them, and that it will be desirable, and even a point of honor with them, to tax her people to pay off the debt incurred by the rebel States in waging war against the United States.

In order, therefore, to protect the hundreds of thousands of men and women who loaned their hard earnings to the Government to carry on the war, and who received bonds in return, on the express condition that they should be promptly and faithfully met, as well as to protect thousands of poor Union men in the South who do not want to be taxed to pay off the rebel debt, I desire a constitutional amendment that neither Congress nor any State shall pass any law whereby any part or portion of the debt contracted in putting down rebellion shall ever be repudiated, or whereby any part or portion of the debt, State or confederate, contracted in aid of the rebellion, shall ever be paid or assumed.

I am aware that all the lately rebellious States have either passed laws or have inserted clauses in their constitutions, looking to the same result, but I am at the same time impressed with the conviction that "policy" might lead these men hereafter to repeal their laws or alter their constitutions, and I prefer that the American people should place a prohibition in the Constitution that would be so high that ambition would never soar to reach it or cupidity dare to touch it. Besides, since they were so willing to put this clause in their State constitution, they could not object to aid us in placing it in the Constitution of the United States.

As our soldiers and sailors should be our peculiar care—especially since the President has said that he intends to rely upon them expressly—I think we owe it to the sacrifices they have made and the sufferings they have endured, that there should be a constitutional provision denying to Congress the right to hereafter pass any law by which any pension, bounty, or gratuity shall be given to any person who served in the confederate army, or who went into rebellion against the Government. I know there is no fear of this or the next Congress passing any such law; but if reconstructed traitors ever get into power, and the Vallandigham Democracy should be within reach to aid them, I am disposed to think that they would refuse to give any pension, bounty, or pay to our soldiers and sailors, unless you would agree to give the same to theirs. Why not? They think, in the language of the rebel ex-vice president, that when they took up arms to tear down the Government they were aiding "to rescue, preserve, and perpetuate the principles of the Constitution;" and inasmuch as that is just what our soldiers and sailors thought they had periled so much to save, they (the rebel soldiers) will claim as much of the honor and gratitude as our own.

These, Mr. Speaker, are the principles I would advocate, to be made a part and portion of our organic law. With them I think the country will be safe; without them you might as well prepare yourself at once to see this Government in the hands of the men who have been seeking to destroy it.

Congress owes it to the country to pass upon the propositions that I have named—and which I do not pretend to claim to be my own—and to submit them to the States for ratification. Instead of being several, they can be embraced in one proposition. So soon as they are ratified by any or all of the eleven States, I would admit such of them to representation as adopt them. Such as do not adopt them I would exclude from representation until three fourths of the States have ratified them, so as to make them binding upon all.

In this way, and in this alone, in my judgment, can the honor, the safety, or the perpetuity of the Republic be established.

I know there are some who do not apprehend any evil consequences from allowing these States to be represented now without any conditions and without any changes in our fundamental law. I wish I could think with them, and could place that confidence in the honor and loyalty of the men who went into rebellion as would warrant me in trusting them without any guarantees. But, sir, I cannot believe that men who conspired so long and secretly to bring on the rebellion, who fought so desperately and wickedly to make it a success, who starved and tortured so many thousands of our brave and heroic defenders in prisons and in dungeons, who have taken so many oaths, and have violated them, and become perjurers before God and man, and who since they have been vanquished and compelled to cease their strife, are as open and defiant as they should be modest and humble—I cannot believe, I say, sir, that such men are safe to be trusted with the destinies of a great nation and of an injured and magnanimous people.

I may be mistaken. It is possible, barely possible, that they are sincere, and that they do not contemplate in the future to act in any other way than for the glory and honor and success of this mighty nation. If I have made a mistake in not believing them to be thoroughly loyal, it is one made on the side of my country and in behalf of her safety. The loyalty of men who have been engaged for over four years in breaking up the Government is at least doubtful. In doubtful cases it is better to give the benefit of the doubt to the side of the permanency of your country than against it. If these men are at once taken in full fellowship and granted equal rights and powers without any guarantees, and it should afterward turn out that they were not true and sincere in their loyalty, the consequences will be terrible, and nothing but the interposition of the all-powerful arm of God could stay the anarchy that would be its legitimate result.

Let us all, then, unite in insisting on such guarantees as will secure a peace that is lasting and that will make the Constitution and the Union as impregnable from treason within as it is invincible from foes beyond its borders; and whether our course be indorsed to-day or not we shall have the consciousness of acting honestly and with a sole view of perpetuating our institutions, and unnumbered millions yet unborn will justify our action and honor us for standing firmly and unflinchingly by the ark of our safety.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. Speaker, as this is the only occasion probably upon which I will have an opportunity to speak outside of the regular business of the House, I avail myself of it for that purpose. I regret that the rule has not been suspended so that I might be allowed to speak in the House and not have to come in Committee of the Whole to say what I think I ought to be entitled to say in the House. But as this is a day for general discussion, I suppose my lips may be opened and I can say pretty much what I please. Therefore, I propose to discuss the same question that is discussed here usually on Saturdays, namely, the condition of the States and the condition of the country, the position of the President and the position of Congress at this time.

I hold, Mr. Speaker, as I have always held, that this war through which we have just passed was prosecuted for the purpose of restoring the Union; that the action of all the eleven States which passed ordinances of secession, and which claimed to be out of the Union, was null and void; and that the entire action of Congress, all the speeches made by Union men, and by almost everybody else except those who were rebels and who believed in the right of secession, for there were some such on this floor, and I understand there are some such now, were made distinctly and emphatically maintaining the ground that those eleven States were not out and could not get out of the Union. They attempted to set up a government for themselves, making slavery the corner-stone of that government. It was an old and favorite plan of many people in the South. It was discussed fully, elaborately, and at length, in this Hall and at the other end of the Capitol, for a quarter of a century, and the termination of that discussion brought on the war. Every loyal man in the country, North and South, and especially the loyal representatives of the people, denied the right of those States to secede, or to go out of the Union, or to do anything by which the Constitution should be subverted or the Government overthrown. And when it was my good fortune to enter the Thirty-Eighth Congress, a large majority of the representatives of the people sustained that idea. It was my pleasure to act with them, and to vote for men and money to suppress the rebellion and to keep these States in the Union, so as to have one great and glorious Republic. That was the policy pursued by the late President, Mr. Lincoln; that is the policy pursued by the present incumbent of the presidential chair, Mr. Johnson. That was in every resolution and in every speech made, even by the extreme men, upon this floor. That was the doctrine to which the Union party adhered.

Now, sir, after we have pursued that line of policy and carried the war to a successful termination, and restored the Union by the suppression of the rebellion, the remarkable, the wonderful doctrine is propounded on this floor in the Thirty-Ninth Congress that these States are out of the Union and should be kept out of the Union until members upon this floor see proper to let them come in.

Now, there is a plain provision of the Constitution which no man can ignore, which no man can deny, and which is the substratum upon which our Government rests, and that is that there cannot possibly be a republican form of government unless representation accompanies taxation.

The very moment this war was closed, the very moment the rebellious armies surrendered, the Government inaugurated a system of taxation throughout the entire South, appointing assessors and collectors in every district, who brought into the Treasury of the United States nearly thirty million dollars. And yet it is a conceded fact that throughout the entire South, during the war, the people were slain, their towns, cities, and houses were burned, their property was destroyed, and they were left almost entirely destitute. If this be true, and if this Congress intends to insist upon that policy, I ask, in the name of common sense, how long it can last. It does not follow because you admit the constitutional principle to which I have referred that rebels must represent these people in the Congress of the United States. It does not follow that rebels shall hold office. It does not follow that men who have attempted to overthrow the Government shall come here and hold seats in this House and at the other end of the Capitol. We have the determination of that question; we are to decide upon the qualifications of those who come here and claim seats; and I presume there is no man who has loved his country and stood by it and defended it in its hour of peril that would admit any man to a seat to represent any portion of this country, whose hands are not clean, and cannot do, as we have all done, take an oath to support the Constitution and laws of the country, and swear that he has never uplifted his arm against the Government of his country. That is not asked; it never has been asked by any one who has been loyal heretofore to this Government; it never has been asked by the President of the United States. And I submit the question now, not only to Congress, but to the country, what are you to do? What will you do? What can you do contrary to what has been done already? A policy was inaugurated by the late President Lincoln, which has been carried out by President Johnson, under which these States have formed their organizations, and under which they are here to-day. Will you change that policy; and if so, how will you change it?

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I wish to ask the gentleman from Kentucky if it makes any difference whether we allow a man who was engaged in the rebellion to come in here and represent a district, or some other man, who, although he was not engaged in the rebellion, would vote exactly as the rebel would? Does it make the representation any better because the representative did not happen to be engaged in the rebellion, provided his views are the same and his votes here would always be the same?

Mr. SMITH. Well, Mr. Speaker, I do not see how that difficulty can be avoided in the future of our country.

Mr. BOUTWELL. If the gentleman will permit me, I will suggest a way.

Mr. SMITH. I prefer first to suggest my own way. The gentleman from Massachusetts can suggest his afterward.

Now, during the whole war, there were men here representing States which were not in rebellion, but which had a rebellious element in them, which contained rebellious districts, a portion of the people of the State absolutely believing in the doctrine of secession. Gentlemen representing such States hold seats upon this floor now. How are we to avoid that? Is there anything in the Constitution, is there anything in any law by which we can prevent people from sending representatives from any of the States which have not been absolutely in rebellion by the passage of an ordinance of secession by a State convention or by the Legislature? It cannot be avoided.

Now, I say very distinctly that, while the State of Pennsylvania may to-day send to this House a majority of good Representatives, men who will vote fairly and correctly and honestly and conscientiously, it does not necessarily follow that she will continue to send here, through all time, only men who will vote in accordance with the ideas of my distinguished friend who has suggested this question. It is not to be assumed that the district which I now have the honor to represent, and which I represented in the Thirty-Eighth Congress, will necessarily return a man of my political sentiments at the next election. It is not to be assumed necessarily that the district which has sent here my honorable colleague, [Mr. McKEE,] who is as radical as it is possible for a man to be, and whom I love and admire because of his devotion to the Union, will elect at the next election a man with the same zealous principles. Because a particular district in Illinois sends now as its Representative a gentleman seven feet high, and with the strong political proclivities of my friend over the way, [Mr. WESTWORTH,] it does not follow that that district will at the next election choose just such a man, and one reflecting the same opinions that he does. What legislation can regulate this matter? Who can fix a rule by which it is to be done?

Mr. BOUTWELL. If the gentleman will give way for a moment, I would like to say a word just here.

Mr. SMITH. If the gentleman thinks that he can suggest a plan, I am always willing to learn; and therefore I yield.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I desire to ask the gentleman whether he does not see any difference between canvassing the political opinions which may be held upon questions concerning the administration of the Government by men elected as representatives from loyal States, and declining to recognize as entitled to representation people who at present are not represented, and who cannot be until there is some affirmative action on the part of the Government, without an inquiry as to their opinions concerning the right of the Government to exist. If we find, as we have found by the testimony of Mr. Stephens and others, that in some of these States which the gentleman desires should be represented immediately and without inquiry, nine tenths or nineteen twentieths of the people deny the right of this Government to exist, are they to come in here by their representatives and attempt to use their political power for the overthrow of the Government? Is not that a different question from the question how the Government shall be administered, all of us agreeing that it has a right to exist?

Mr. SMITH. As the question is presented by the gentleman from Massachusetts, I admit the difference in the two propositions which he presents. But, sir, allow me to say that I do not confine the question alone to loyal States, to Pennsylvania, Illinois, Massachusetts, or Kentucky. I submit this question in the case of a State where that condition of things does not exist, according to all the information we have, which is not locked up and hidden from the House and from the country—a State where there are loyal men, who have from the beginning to the end of the late struggle evinced their devotion to the Union, and who have further manifested their loyalty to Congress by returning to Congress as representatives men who are as loyal as any who now exercise the privilege of this floor—in such a case as this how is it to be reconciled to the consciences of members of this House and the people of the country, that such a community should be denied the right of representation?

Mr. BOUTWELL. Does the gentleman mean to confine the elective franchise in Mississippi, for example, to the loyal white men, excluding the disloyal white men?

Mr. SMITH. Yes, sir.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Then I ask the gentleman how a government is to be set up and maintained in such a State as Mississippi, it being matter of public notoriety, as well as the showing of sworn testimony, that nine tenths of the white people are disloyal? Does the gentleman expect that one tenth of the white people of Mississippi will be permitted by nine tenths to set up and continue a government against the judgment of the nine tenths, unless you support that government by the power of the Federal authority?

Mr. SMITH. Now, Mr. Speaker, I am glad that this question has been asked. According to the precedents established here by speeches and by resolution in the Thirty-Seventh and the Thirty-Eighth Congresses by the strongest men upon this floor, the doctrine was fully enunciated and maintained by a majority of the Union men, among them the honorable Speaker of this House, that the loyal people of each State, regardless of numbers, were to be recognized and considered as the State, and entitled to the rights and privileges of this State, including the right of representation in Congress.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I did not ask the gentleman what the Speaker of this House, or any one else, has said. I asked the gentleman a practical question; if it appear upon testimony which cannot be disputed that nine tenths of the people of Mississippi are disloyal, does the gentleman expect that those nine tenths will permit the one tenth to set up and maintain a government?

Mr. SMITH. Mr. Speaker, if that question should be reduced to a practical form—if it be true that in such a case one tenth of the community must rule, that one tenth alone must be allowed to vote, that one tenth should be regarded as the State, and the remaining portion of the people must be entirely ostracized, must not be considered as entitled to the right of suffrage in the reorganization; who is to fix that? The gentleman no doubt will say "Congress is to fix it." Very well, admit it, for the sake of argument. Then why does not Congress fix it, and let the loyal one tenth of the people be represented in Congress, and enjoy all the other rights to which, as loyal citizens, they are entitled under the Constitution?

I know that the distinguished gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM,] whom I regret to say I do not now see in his seat—a gentleman who is justly looked upon as one of the leaders of this House, a man for whose opinions I have a very high regard, and one whose lead I have followed during the troubles of the last three or four years—asserted in the Thirty-Seventh Congress, in the case of an applicant for a seat from the State of Virginia, that the twenty-five men who alone had voted for that applicant, were the district, and that therefore he was entitled to a seat on this floor; and he was accorded a seat by a majority of the votes of the House, the Union men voting for his admission.

Again, sir, the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. Maynard, held a seat on this floor as a Representative from the State of Tennessee during the Thirty-Seventh Congress, after that State had adopted an ordinance of secession.

Mr. McKEE. Will my colleague permit me to ask him one question?

Mr. SMITH. Yes, sir.

Mr. McKEE. In the case of the election of that gentleman from Virginia, did any others than those twenty-five who voted offer to vote or want to vote?

Mr. SMITH. I do not know anything about that; and it is not pertinent to the question. The rule of law and of practice in such a case is, that it makes no difference whether there were twenty, or twenty thousand men voting. No matter how many refuse to vote, those who do vote are entitled to representation, and their representative is entitled to his seat.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman from Kentucky yield to me for a moment?

Mr. SMITH. Yes, sir.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I desire to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] a question. I would like to know whether he believes that it is in the power of nine tenths of the people of a State—

Mr. HIGBY. I object to the gentleman from Pennsylvania asking a question of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky having the right to the floor has a right to yield.

Mr. HIGBY. I object to the gentleman from Pennsylvania putting a question to another gentleman who is not upon the floor.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Then I will ask the gentleman from Kentucky to put to the gentleman from Massachusetts the question which, to avoid circumlocution, I proposed to ask directly myself.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman from California [Mr. HIGBY] is correct in the point which he raises, as the gentleman addressed has not the floor to reply.

Mr. HIGBY. I do not want the gentleman from Pennsylvania to speak in the time which I, being entitled to the floor, have yielded to the gentleman from Kentucky. I want the gentleman from Kentucky to go on with his remarks.

Mr. SMITH. I thought the gentleman had yielded the floor to me unconditionally. I do not wish to get into any trouble. I am trying to be as courteous as I can.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania may address the member upon the floor for the purpose of explanation, but he cannot address other members.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I desire the gentleman from Kentucky to yield to me to put a question to the gentleman from Massachusetts. I do not listen to what the gentleman from California says; I yield to the decision of the Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky has the right to yield the floor to the gentleman from Pennsylvania for personal explanation under the rule which has so often been read.

Mr. SCOFIELD. For explanation of the pending measure.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will see that does not extend to interrogating other members.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Let me ask the gentleman from Massachusetts how he believes nine tenths of the disloyal people of a State could destroy or impair the rights of the loyal one tenth. Now, if that loyal one tenth have to pay taxes have they not certainly the right of representation? Having that right of representation, when they come here and present loyal men and who are capable of taking the oath I have taken, what reason can he give for not admitting them to seats upon this floor?

Mr. BOUTWELL. I should like to answer the question if the gentleman will permit me.

Mr. SMITH. I will yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts if he will not take up too much time in answering the question.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I will answer as briefly as I can.

Mr. SMITH. Do not take too much time.

Mr. BOUTWELL. You can stop me when you please.

Mr. Speaker, the right of representation, whether in the Senate or in this House, is a right which pertains to States as States; and can be exercised by the people only through the recognized State organizations. The State organizations in these eleven States, which once existed in harmony with the organization of the national Government, by some event or through a series of events, have ceased to exist as a matter of fact, because they are not represented. That is the evidence they have ceased to exist. How, why, or when is a matter of no importance. Before any representation from either of those States can be exercised you must have the previous recognition of the right of the State to be represented. And in the inquiry as to the right of a State to be represented we must look to the whole constituency of a State to ascertain whether there is such an existing loyal sentiment as will reasonably lead to the expectation that the representation of that State will be loyal.

I will answer the question distinctly. There is no right of one tenth of the people of a State, even though loyal, to be represented as a State. It is the right of the people, of the whole people, when they demonstrate their loyalty to this Government, to be represented as the people of that State.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. The gentleman overturns the doctrine of Mr. Lincoln from the beginning.

Mr. McKEE. Allow me to ask a question.

Mr. SMITH. Not now. Mr. Speaker, Mr. Lincoln used language which I think it proper to read just here. I think it was when he was first inaugurated President of the United States. I did not vote for him then, but fell into the ranks and followed him afterward during the war. I think it is good authority to quote from. I want his original supporters to go back upon him, if they can, and when the war is over deny the doctrines of that great man. He said:

"The right of each State to order and control its own domestic institutions according to its own judgment exclusively is essential to the balance of power, on which the perfection and endurance of our political fabric depends."

Now, there is no statement in that as to the number of the people who shall compose a State. I say, with all deference to this House, Congress has violated the laws in the admission to representation to Congress from those States lately disorganized, but now ready for admission to representation. If the gentleman from Nevada were here in his seat I would say that that State has not the requisite number of people to entitle it to representation upon this floor, yet she has two Senators and a Representative in Congress. Now, what are you to do? If you carry out the rule strictly you would have prevented that thing. If the loyal people who have maintained their allegiance to the Government in any of these States still claim it as a State, it is a State.

Now, I submit a question to the gentleman on the other side. The States have been disorganized. Their governments have been somewhat subverted—entirely if you please. Slavery has been overthrown, one of the fundamental institutions of each State, a constitutional provision of each State, one recognized by the Constitution of the United States and maintained by all the laws of the Government of the United States. There has been an entire subversion of that institution in every State of the Union. The Governors who went into the rebellion have all been turned out of office. How? By what means? By force, by war. By men supplanting the principles upon which they stood before the war and repudiating the action of the Governors then elected and the Legislatures then in power.

And what do we find to-day? No man on this floor has ever yet given a different construction nor can do it. There is a State government in every State lately in rebellion, a Governor, a Legislature, a judiciary, all the power which belongs to States under the Constitution. And what is it? It is recognized as republican in form. It is considered good.

But suppose you do not like it; suppose you will not admit it as a principle upon which these States should be organized and received back into the Government: what are you going to do, and when are you going to do it? You say that the President has no power to do what he did. Why do you not undo it? You have been here five months. The intellect of the nation, I presume, is in this Hall and the other. The representatives of the people are here from all the districts except these eleven States. If what has been done by President Lincoln and President Johnson is not good, why in the name of common sense, justice, right, and constitutional law, do you not undo it and do something else that is good?

Well, suppose you do undo it, what are you going to do in its place? You are bound to have a State government, to have the same machinery there that exists now. You say that you want the rebel debt repudiated. It has been done. You say you want the constitutional amendment adopted. It has been done. You say you want loyal men elected to Congress. How do you know that that has not been done in every instance? Who has determined that question? Has the legitimate power of each House investigated it, decided upon it, and reported to each House upon it? The Committee of Elections have done nothing, reported nothing on the subject. The representatives of the various States claiming to be loyal have been asking admission on this floor, and they have been rejected. Upon what ground? Congress says the States lately in rebellion are not properly organized. Why do you not organize them? What are you waiting for?

You say you want to see loyalty in the South. When are you going to get it? How are you going to get it? Are you going to get it this year, or next year, or the next, or when? Have you any assurance that you will have any more loyalty two, three, four, or five years hence?

than you have now? I can very well conceive how a man will be elected who is considered a loyal man to-day, from a district in Alabama, who can take the oath and take his seat here and vote and act with the Union men, and that at the next election they may send back another man from the same district of different politics. But how are you going to avoid that? What statute will enable you to avoid it? There is none.

There is but one process by which it can be remedied, by some constitutional enactment, such as was offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BAKER] the other day. If when this Congress assembled it had passed two amendments to the Constitution and stopped there, I believe the country would have been quiet and restored to a degree of peace to-day that it will not reach for years to come. Those two amendments should have been: 1. Repudiation of the rebel debt and no taxation hereafter for the payment of any portion of it. 2. That no man who had gone voluntarily into the rebel army or given aid and comfort to the rebellion should hereafter hold an office within the gift of the Federal Government. If Congress had passed those two amendments to the Constitution by this time the country would have been restored to peace and quietness, and no Representative from the rebel States would have taken his seat here who was not loyal to the Government. Then those who had not used their efforts to overthrow and destroy the Government would have been represented here, as they are entitled according to your Constitution, and you could have collected your taxes with the same ease that you do it now in the North.

Now, I want this country to be in the hands of Union men. I want men to control it who are fitted to maintain it in the future. I want the people who have sustained it during its dark days to pilot it in the years to come. But I assert from my place to-day, with all seriousness, and with as much earnestness and honesty, as in my judgment can be possessed by any man, that this Congress is doing a wrong which will result in injury to this great Government by denying the great constitutional principles upon which the Government of this country is founded, in refusing to a people, however rebellious they may have been, who have been whipped and completely subjugated until they laid down their arms and agreed to be obedient to the Constitution and laws of the country, a representation in the councils of the nation where they should be heard.

Gentlemen say we must punish somebody. Very well, I agree to that. The distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOWEN] offered a resolution some days ago directing an inquiry to be made as to why some of these men have not been punished, and calling for the punishment of Jeff. Davis and others of the leaders of this rebellion. Now that very indirection seems to be casting blame upon the President because these men have not been punished.

What is the fact? The inquiry was made of the Chief Justice of the United States as to why he did not hold a court for the trial of those charged with treason. His reason was that martial law existed in Virginia and the other rebel States, and it was injudicious to hold a court in a State where martial law was prevailing. And yet a court has been held under that same Chief Justice in the District of Columbia, where martial law exists, and has acted upon questions in which all the States lately in rebellion were interested.

The Secretary of War was called upon and he expressed the same sentiments. The President has reserved from pardon five hundred leading men in the rebellion, as is well known to Congress and to the country. Now, why do you not pass a joint resolution calling for the trial and execution of these traitors? Because you want to dodge it; and why? Because you know the President of the United States has no power in himself to do it; Congress alone has the right to make such laws as will provide for the trial, condemnation, and punishment of these people. Why do you not introduce your law for that?

Mr. SCOFIELD. I would ask the gentleman why he does not introduce a bill to that effect.

Mr. SMITH. I will, if some of you do not do it.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Why has not the gentleman done it before? He has been here five months.

Mr. SMITH. I have been waiting for it to be done by some of the gentlemen who have shown so much blood-thirstiness in regard to the rebels.

Mr. SCOFIELD. The gentleman is the only one now talking with any blood-thirstiness, and he calls upon us to say why we have not done something to punish these men.

Mr. SMITH. Because the organs of the radical portion of Congress, and of those who are opposed to the policy and conduct of the Administration, are denouncing him day after day because he does not do something. And yet members sit in their seats here or walk about the city or go through the country condemning the President for what should be justly charged to the Congress of the United States, and which cannot be shouldered on him.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I would ask the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SMITH] if he desires to be understood as claiming that Congress has the power to pass laws now under which these men shall be tried, condemned, and punished; and must that not be done under the laws that existed at the time the crimes were committed?

Mr. SMITH. As a matter of course they must be punished under the laws that existed at the time their crimes were committed. But Congress can by law provide the means by which they can be brought to justice.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Must they not be tried in the district prescribed by the laws which existed at the time the crimes were committed?

Mr. SMITH. I will agree to that. But the districts are as numerous as the men themselves. We can have them tried in Virginia and all the southern States because the courts are now reestablished there.

Mr. BROOMALL. I would ask the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SMITH] what additional legislation he considers necessary and what power has Congress to pass laws for the punishment of crimes committed heretofore.

Mr. SMITH. I have said all the time that the President of the United States had nothing to do with it; and I was undertaking to defend the President against the charge that he does not punish anybody, when he had no right to punish anybody. If the right existed in any place at all to lay down a plan by which these people were to be brought to trial it was in Congress and nowhere else. They failed to do it. I know Congress cannot pass ex post facto laws. I know that.

Mr. BROOMALL. What law can Congress pass?

Mr. SMITH. I understand how men would avoid if they could, bringing the people they charge as having been guilty of the highest crimes known to the laws of the country to justice because it will affect to some extent the policy pursued by Mr. Lincoln and President Johnson.

Mr. BROOMALL. I desire to ask the gentleman what power Congress has in the matter. And where does it get it?

Mr. SMITH. I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania—I do not want him to answer, as I will answer for him—what power has the President in the matter?

Mr. BROOMALL. To enforce the laws as they exist.

Mr. SCOFIELD. To execute the laws.

Mr. SMITH. If the position assumed by these gentlemen be true, that Congress has no power by any process of legislation over these rebels who have thus acted, what power have they to legislate in reference to the rebels in the States under the parole of the Administration? What right have they to keep them out? They want to punish the whole of them in a body. They want to punish a State, a corporation, for what a few men have done. They refuse, by any declarative action of theirs, so as to put themselves right upon the record. I know what it means. It does not need a man of great experience to understand it. It is because President Johnson has followed the policy of President Lincoln. He carried out that policy, and States have been organized in the rebel States, republican in form, and which cannot be overturned or destroyed, which this Congress dare not destroy. I leave it to time to prove the truth of what I say. It is because they feel the force and effect of that policy upon the people. The great mass of the people will soon rise to maintain it, whether they have belonged to one party or the other heretofore.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. The President of the United States did, on the 2d of October, 1865, address a letter to Chief Justice Chase on this subject, and the Chief Justice, on the 12th of October following, replied, declining to hold a court as suggested by the President, and proposed a military tribunal for the trial of these people.

Mr. SMITH. That is true. I understood the President to say so myself.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I want to make a suggestion in reference to what has been said of Chief Justice Chase. I do not know these statements are exactly parliamentary, but as one has been made, I desire to say this: within a few days the Attorney General of the United States made a statement to myself and others, not confidential or private, which it may be well enough to be known by the nation. He, the law officer of the Government, stated that the position taken by Chief Justice Chase under the circumstances was proper, as the condition of the country was not such as to make a judicial trial much less than a mockery. Chief Justice Chase was therefore right, in the opinion of the Attorney General, in declining for the time to hold court on account of the disturbed condition of the State where the trial was to be held.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say only this: if the opinion of the Chief Justice was correct, and that a civil trial would have been nothing less than a mockery, that in all the mass of civilians a jury could not be found that would convict them of treason, would it not be a farce and mockery for a commission to be called? I say that the position assumed by Congress and Chief Justice Chase, and other leading men in the country, to throw the whole onus of complaint and blame upon the President of the United States is wrong, unfair, and unjust. It is as certain to recoil upon them as the sun will rise and shine from day to day until the world shall end.

Now, I know that attacks were made upon the President of the United States long before this Congress met. I know that the very day this Congress was organized an attack was made upon him by which it was attempted to take out of his hands everything that had been done or that he could do, and to reverse every principle which had been adopted for six or eight months, and to place the whole matter in the hands of a committee, whose proceedings are so secret that no member of the House, even, is permitted to know what they are doing.

I happened to vote for the appointment of that committee, and I am sorry for it. They say that full confession is good for the soul, and I am always ready to confess when I do wrong. I did vote wrong then, because I had but just entered the House, and I believed that the Union party, with what I had heretofore acted, was still composed of Union men who did not adhere to the infamous doctrine, which I had fought for four years, that a State is out of the Union, and not entitled to representation. I went with them, therefore; but the moment I found out that their policy was to maintain that the States were out of the Union, and should be treated as Territories, that moment I abandoned them. It was not the great Union party, true to the Government and the Constitution. I belong to that, and stand by it to-day.

The resolution which was offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STREVE] in 1862 reflected my ideas then, and it expresses my ideas now. If he and his friends have departed from it, it is not my fault. I choose to stand by it now, as I did then. Let me read it:

"Resolved, That if any person in the employment of the United States, in either the legislative or executive branch, should propose to make peace, or should accept or propose to accept any such proposition, on any other basis than the integrity and entire unity of the United States and their territory as they existed at the time of the rebellion, he will be guilty of a high crime."

We then declared that it was a crime for a man to believe that this Union was dissolved, and to-day the gentleman from Pennsylvania is guilty of that very crime; and I stand here to-day to assert it. I am sorry that he is not in his seat. If he were, I presume he would answer me as he did on a former occasion when my mouth was shut, and I was not permitted by the rules of the House to respond, in language which no gentleman would utter. I suppose he would make a similar response to-day; but let me say that anything that falls from such a mouth falls harmless at my feet, as its utterer is old, decrepit, and powerless.

Now, I want to say, as my time is nearly out, that I believe in the Union of these States; I believe in the punishment of treason as a crime; I believe in the perpetuity of this Government; I believe in the Constitution and laws of my country; I believe it is the best, the purest, the most beneficent Government that God ever gave to man; and I rejoice with men of all colors, that this to-day is recognized as a free Government. I am glad that the shackles of slavery have been stricken from the limbs of four million people, and that they are in the way of being elevated until they attain to the full stature of manhood. I would throw no obstacles in their way; I would do all I could to elevate them, and secure to them those rights to which they are entitled under the Constitution and laws of my country.

But I want to see this Union restored; I want to see the States restored to their original positions in that Union. I want to see these seats filled; I want to see representatives both here, and on the floor of the Senate, from all the States, so that we may be once more a united people, and united for good. Let us maintain the integrity of the nation, the Union of the States, the supremacy of the Constitution, and the enforcement of the laws. Then, shall we transmit to posterity the liberties which we have enjoyed, based upon the rights of man, the liberties of the people, and in a country whose resources have scarcely begun to be developed. We shall go on and upward to greatness and glory. Then, can we invite to our shores the people of all nations, opening to them the doors of civilization; educating and elevating them, and providing them with comfortable homes; then shall we be the center of civilization, a great, grand, glorious, and Christianized people, whose rule shall spread from one end of the continent to the other; nay, throughout the world—instructing man in the paths of truth, virtue, and equal liberty.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. F. THOMAS asked and obtained leave of absence for his colleague, Mr. J. L. THOMAS, for Monday and Tuesday of next week.

Mr. RITTER asked and obtained leave of absence for Mr. HOGAN for two weeks.

FREE AND SLAVE LABOR, ETC.

Mr. RITTER. Mr. Speaker, I arise to-day with much diffidence; and if I were to consult my own feelings I certainly would have remained silent. The fact, sir, that so many gentlemen of great ability have so ably discussed most of the important subjects that are now agitating the public mind, together with a due appreciation of the great importance and magnitude of these questions, is well calculated to throw over one of my humble pretensions a distrust of my ability to do those subjects and the people who honored me with a seat here that justice which is perhaps demanded of me. But, sir, the present unsettled and unfortunate condition of our country demands that every one who loves the American name; every one who loves the Government and the Union of the United States; every one who loves the Constitution that is the basis and foundation of our Government and Union should do something, if possible, to calm and unite the feelings and sentiments of the people, so that we may all once more have full confidence in the justice, integrity, and perpetuity of our Government.

Sir, it is said that our Government can only be maintained by the consent of the governed, and if this be true—as I apprehend all will agree that it is—the proper question for us now to settle is, what course should this Congress pursue in order to restore confidence in the minds of the people, to convince them that it is the intention of the Congress of the United States to treat all the citizens of this country with equal justice, no matter whether they live in the North or South, or whether they live in the East or West? Sir, if this can be accomplished all of our differences will at once be at an end; the soldiers that are now kept in the various States may at once be disbanded and returned to their homes, and the people in all the States would at once, as in times gone by, be constituted into a wall of defense against any and every enemy against the United States no matter where they might make their appearance. Sir, can we not do this? Can we not sacrifice our prejudices, our anger, and resentment, our party feelings, yes, and our parties, too, if necessary, in order to accomplish such a noble purpose? Sir, we have already sacrificed millions of money and oceans of blood avowedly to accomplish this grand object, and after the people have sacrificed all this cannot we lay aside our differences and determine, at least for the present, that we will adhere to the Constitution as it is, and require only that it shall be maintained, and the laws obeyed?

Sir, look for one moment at our condition. The people who were in rebellion against the authority of the United States have all acknowledged their defeat: they have surrendered to Federal authority. Yes, sir, they have done everything that has been required of them in order to their admission to seats in this Hall, and still we refuse them, notwithstanding they were told time after time by the highest authority that all that was necessary was for them to lay down their arms and submit to the laws. Sir, is this calculated to give confidence to these people that they will be treated with equal justice by this Congress? They have, by State conventions, amended their constitutions so as to abolish slavery in each State; they have declared their ordinances of secession to be void, repudiated all debts created on account of rebellion, and most of them have ratified the amendment to the Constitution of the United States abolishing slavery everywhere in the United States; and now, sir, they are submitting to taxation while we are refusing to allow them to be represented in this Hall. Sir, is this course calculated to give confidence to the people that this Congress intends that all of the citizens of the United States shall be free and equal?

But, sir, it is said that we must have guarantees. What do we understand from this? Sir, who has told what these guarantees are to be? All of the dominant party in this House are asking for and claiming that we should have guarantees, yet no plan of restoration setting forth the guarantees demanded by them has been presented to this House. Sir, why have the people in the lately rebellious States abolished slavery, pronounced their secession ordinances void, repudiated their war debts, &c., unless it has been to conform to the requirements of the conquerors, and thereby give assurances, or guarantees if you please, that they will obey the laws of the United States? Sir, is not this cry for guarantees merely an excuse for the purpose of postponing the time of the admission of the representatives from these States so that the dominant party here can have time to make such amendments to the Constitution and pass such laws as in their judgment will secure their party in power, and which they know that they could not do if all the States were represented? Sir, is this calculated to inspire the people with confidence that this Congress intends to do equal justice to all?

Mr. Speaker, the idea of being taxed without the right of representation is one that has always been abhorred and detested by the American people, and accordingly we find in the Declaration of Independence one of the strongest reasons for rebelling against the King of England was that he had refused to pass laws for the accommodation of large districts of people unless those people would relinquish the right of representation in the legislature; a right, they say, that is inestimable to them and formidable to tyrants only. The Constitution of the United States also declares that representation and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States, which may be included within this Union, according to their respective numbers. Sir, I may safely say that the sentiment that there should be no taxation without representation has become so deeply impressed in the minds of the people of the United States that every effort to change it will but be the means to hurl from place or position every man who makes it. Sir, the President has fixed a plan for the restoration of those States, the people of those States have sacrificed a very large amount of property and also their own political views in order to become the recipients of the President's plan. They are willing and anxious to do it, and why should we object?

Sir, we have no sacrifice to make; we have maintained the Constitution and the Union; the flag of our fathers floats undisturbed over this nation; and I appeal to this House and to the country, I appeal to every lover of this Union, to come up like men and support the President in his noble and manly efforts to restore these erring people and States to maintain the Constitution and the Union, that we may once more have peace, prosperity, and happiness. Sir, it may be said that we have had some foreshowing of a plan, or rather the conditions upon which these States are to be allowed to be represented in the Congress of the United States. It is true that the majority of the committee of fifteen did report that the people of Tennessee were in a condition to exercise the functions of a State within this Union; but they then assert that they can only exercise the same by the consent of the law-making power of the United States. Now, sir, if the people of the State of Tennessee are in a condition to exercise the functions of a State, I ask, by what means or by what authority are they in that condition? It must be by authority of the Constitution of the United States; and if so, I would like to know by what authority these people are required to obtain the consent of the law-making power of the United States before they do exercise those functions which they admit themselves that they are in a condition to exercise.

Now, sir, I affirm that when a State is in a condition to exercise the functions of a State that Congress has no right or authority to require anything more than to judge of the legality of the election and qualification of its members, and to require that they shall take the oath prescribed by the Constitution. But they then declare that Tennessee is one of the United States of America upon the express condition that the people shall do certain things, and that they shall not do certain other things. These conditions are all very remarkable, and are required without even a shadow of authority. But, sir, there is one of them that strikes me as being more remarkable than all the rest, for the reason that in requiring it they make a demand, as I understand it, in direct opposition to an express declaration of the Constitution. The condition alluded to is in the words, "Nor shall the said State ever in any manner claim from the United States, or make any allowance or compensation for slaves emancipated or liberated in any way whatever." Now, sir, these slaves were the property of somebody, or else they could not have been slaves, and the Constitution expressly declares that private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation.

Sir, I have heard a great deal said by gentlemen upon this floor about the importance and propriety of the Government complying with its pledged faith and solemn promises made to the colored people. This is all very well; but, sir, a great Government like ours should never place itself in such a condition that the fulfillment of one promise is the direct violation of another. Sir, what stronger pledge, what more solemn promise, has this Government ever made than the pledge to the white people of these United States that their lives, liberty, or property should not be taken without due process of law; and then added the clause above quoted, that private property should not be taken without just compensation? Sir, no stronger promise or pledge has ever been made to any people. It is true that this promise was made to white people; but that does not make it less obligatory upon us. Sir, who would have owned a slave if the Constitution and laws of the country had not authorized it? Being thus authorized, the people of Tennessee vested their money in slaves, relying upon the pledges and promises of the Government to protect them in it. Really, sir, it does seem to me to be most remarkable that we do not only disregard the pledge of the Federal Government, but they also require the State of Tennessee to violate her own pledges made to her own people.

But, Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose today to discuss the important subject of the restoration of the seceded States further than I have done. My object is to ask attention to another subject of perhaps but little less importance. It is, sir, to one of the most important sources to which we are to look for revenue to enable us to meet the vast demand that is now continually pressing upon us in the item of interest, as well as to supply the ordinary demands of the Government, and ultimately to pay the enormous debt that we now owe.

To be more explicit, it is my purpose to speak of the agricultural interest of the country, and to show, if I can, the difference in the different systems of labor as practiced in this country heretofore, and what may be expected from the laborers now in portions of this country under the system of labor now being inaugurated. Sir, the agricultural interest of this country is one of far more importance than any other one interest, and perhaps of many others put together, and if the agriculturists should fail for only a few years together, our whole country would be ruined, and no other interest or branch of industry could save us; but let the agriculturists succeed, and with proper legislation the country is safe. Now, sir, if this be true, we see at once the great necessity of fostering and protecting that important and worthy class of our fellow-citizens.

Sir, in making our calculations for revenue to meet the vast demands against us, it will not do for us to suppose that the revenue from the States heretofore known as slave States will be increased by this great and sudden destruction of slave labor, but that the products of those States will be greatly diminished, and to the extent of that diminution must be the increase of taxation in the free States. The Government, therefore, must look to the free States to make up the deficiency caused by the destruction of slave labor in the former slave States. I know, sir, that this statement, if true, disproves the truth of an assertion long and loudly made by a certain class of politicians in our country, to wit, that free or hired labor is more profitable than slave labor, and in order to prove this assertion to be true, a comparison has often been made between the States of Ohio and Kentucky, Ohio being a free State and using free labor, and Kentucky slave labor.

The argument is that as Ohio has a larger population and makes more in the aggregate than Kentucky, therefore free labor is more profitable than slave labor. I suppose, however, that the hard-working farmer in Ohio would not be much comforted by a knowledge of the fact that his State made more in the aggregate than the State of Kentucky if he is at the same time informed of the additional fact that each individual—white, free colored, and slave—in the State of Kentucky did make more on an average than did each individual in the State of Ohio. What gratification can it afford to a citizen of Ohio to know that his neighborhood is very densely populated, and that because of that fact, together with the difference in their system of labor, that he makes less on an average than does each individual in the State of Kentucky?

To prove that this is true, I beg to call the attention of this House and of the country to that most valuable document, the Eighth Census, made in 1860. By an examination of that document it will be found that the State of Ohio had in 1860 a population of—

Free colored persons.....	36,673
Total.....	2,339,511

The assessed value of real estate and personal property in Ohio was $959,867,101. The average value of property assessed in Ohio, to each individual, white and free colored, is about $410.

Kentucky had of—

Free colored persons.....	10,684
Slaves.....	225,433
Total.....	1,155,634

The assessed value of real estate and personal property in Kentucky was $528,212,693; making an average to each individual, white, free colored, and slave, of about $457; and if made to each white and free colored person, the average is about $567 to each one.

To ascertain which had the most profitable system of labor, the people of Ohio, or those of Kentucky, I deem it necessary only to call attention to the most important products raised in each State, and estimate their value, and make the average to each person, thus:

In Ohio in 1860:
Wheat raised, 14,532,570 bu., at $1 3/4 bu.....	$14,532,570
Corn, 70,637,140 bu., at 50 cts. "	35,318,570
Rye, 656,146 bu., at $1 per "	656,146
Oats, 15,479,133 bu., at 50 cts. "	7,739,566
Rice, none.....
Tobacco, 25,523,972 lbs at 10 cts. 3/4 lb.....	255,279
Cotton, none.....
Value of live stock, including horses, mules, asses, milch cows, working oxen, other cattle, sheep, and swine.....	80,433,780
Total value.....	$138,935,929

This gives on an average to each person in the State of Ohio about $59.

In Kentucky in 1860:
Wheat raised, 7,394,811 bu., at $1 3/4 bu.....	$7,394,811
Corn, 64,043,633 bu., at 50 cts. "	32,021,866
Rye, 1,055,262 bu., at $1 "	1,055,262
Oats, 4,617,029 bu., at 50 cts. "	2,308,514
Rice, 24,407 lbs, at 10 cts. 3/4 lb.....	2,440
Tobacco, 108,102,437 lbs, at 10 cts. 3/4 lb.....	10,810,243
Cotton, 4,092 bales, at 10 cts. 3/4 lb.....	163,480
Value of live stock, including horses, mules, asses, milch cows, working oxen, other cattle, sheep, and swine.....	61,863,237
Total value.....	$115,625,033

This gives an average to each person in the State of Kentucky, including slaves, of about $100; and if the average is made only among the white and free colored persons, the amount to each one would be about $125, more than double the amount made to each person in Ohio, the people of Ohio making only $59 to each person. But to test this matter further, we will take the most important of the products of the States of Tennessee and Indiana:

The State of Indiana has a population of—
White persons.....	1,339,000
Free colored persons.....	11,438
Total.....	1,350,438

The assessed value of real estate and personal property was in 1860, $411,042,424; making an average to each person in the State of about $305.

The population of the State of Tennessee was—

White.....	826,782
Free colored persons.....	7,900
Total population.....	1,109,801

The assessed value of real estate and personal property in the State of Tennessee was in 1860 $382,495,209. The average value to each person including slaves is about $343, and if the average is made only among the white and free colored persons it will be found to be about $453 to each one, against $305 to each person in the State of Indiana.

Mr. KELLEY. Are all the people of Kentucky embraced in that calculation—slaves and all?

Mr. RITTER. Every one; white people, free colored people, and slaves; if there are any other kinds there, if the gentleman will point them out, I will include them.

Mr. KELLEY. And the property equals $500 to each one of them?

Mr. RITTER. Three hundred and forty-three dollars to each.

Mr. KELLEY. Slaves and all?

Mr. RITTER. Yes, sir; if you exclude the slaves it will be $459 to each.

In Indiana in 1860:
Wheat raised 15,219,120 bu., at $1 3/4 bu.....	$15,219,120
Rye, 400,226 bu., at $1 "	400,226
Corn, 69,641,591 bu., at 50 cts. "	34,820,792
Oats, 5,028,775 bu., at 50 cts. "	2,514,387
Tobacco, 7,246,132 lbs, at 10 cts. "	754,613
Cotton, none.....
Value of live stock, including horses, mules, asses, milch cows, working oxen, other cattle, sheep, and swine.....	50,116,964
Total value.....	$103,796,105

This makes an average to each person in the State of Indiana of about $77.

The products of Tennessee in 1860 were as follows:

Wheat raised, 5,409,863 bu., at $1 3/4 bu.....	$5,409,863
Rye, 265,314 bu., at $1 "	265,314
Corn, 50,748,260 bu., at 50 cts. "	25,374,133
Oats, 2,343,122 bu., at 50 cts. "	1,171,561
Tobacco, 38,931,277 lbs, at 10 cts. 3/4 lb.....	3,893,127
Cotton, 227,450 bales, counted at 400 lbs. 3/4 bale and 29 cts. 3/4 lb, is.....	9,098,000
Live stock, including horses, mules, asses, milch cows, working oxen, other cattle, sheep, and swine.....	61,257,374
Total value.....	$106,469,402

This makes an average to each person in the State of Tennessee, including slaves, of $95. And if the average is made between the white and free colored person only, it is about $127 to each person, against $77 to each person in the State of Indiana.

But as it may be thought that a comparison between these four States is not sufficient to satisfy every one, we will go still further, and introduce the great and rich State of Illinois and compare it with the State of Alabama.

The population of the State of Illinois was in 1860:

White persons.....	1,704,323
Colored persons.....	7,623
Total.....	1,711,951

The assessed value of real estate and personal property was $389,267,372. This makes an average value to each person in the State of about $221.

The population of the State of Alabama was in 1860:

White persons.....	523,431
Free colored.....	2,650
Slaves.....	433,080
Total.....	959,161

The assessed value of property, real estate and personal, was in 1860 $432,198,762, making an average to each person in the State, including slaves, of about $448, and if the average is made between the white and free colored persons of the State only, it will be found to be about $800 to each person in the State of Alabama, against $221 to each person in the State of Illinois.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman allow me to put a brief question to him right here? Mr. RITTER. A short one.

Mr. KELLEY. Does that calculation embrace the appraised value of the slaves in Alabama and Kentucky?

Mr. RITTER. Yes, sir; I believe the Government always went upon the principle that they were worth something.

Mr. KELLEY. Does the calculation also embrace the appraised value of the laboring people of the free States?

Mr. RITTER. That has nothing to do with it, because the free colored people in the slave States are upon just the same footing in that respect with the free laboring population of the North.

The people of the State of Illinois made, in 1860, the following products:

Wheat,	24,159,500 bu., at \$1 $\frac{3}{4}$ bu.....	\$24,159,500
Rye,	981,322 bu., at $1	981,322
Corn,	115,293,779 bu., at 50 cts.	57,648,389
Oats,	15,336,072 bu., at 50 cts.	7,668,036
Tobacco,	7,014,230 lbs., at 10 cts. $\frac{3}{4}$ lb.....	701,423
Rice,	none.....
Cotton,	6 bales, counted 400 lbs to the bale, and at 20 cts. $\frac{3}{4}$ lb.....	480
Value of livestock, including horses, mules, asses, milch cows, working oxen, other cattle, sheep, and swine.....		73,434,621
Total value.....		$164,593,771

This gives an average to each person in the State of Illinois of about $96.

I would like to have the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] to this, because I suppose he will attempt to disprove these calculations, if he can.

Mr. KELLEY. I think they are disproved now.

Mr. RITTER. I have no doubt they are as much as they ever will be.

The people of the State of Alabama made, in 1860, the following products:

Wheat,	1,222,487 bu., at \$1 $\frac{3}{4}$ bu.....	\$1,222,487
Rye,	73,942 bu., at $1	73,942
Corn,	32,761,194 bu., at 50 cts.	16,380,597
Oats,	716,435 bu., at 50 cts.	358,217
Rice,	499,659 lbs., at 10 cts. $\frac{3}{4}$ lb.....	49,965
Tobacco,	221,284 lb., at 10 cts.	22,128
Cotton,	997,978 bales, at 400 lbs to the bale, and at 20 cts. $\frac{3}{4}$ lb.....	79,838,240
Value of live stock, including horses, mules, asses, milch cows, working oxen, other cattle, sheep, and swine.....		43,061,805
Total.....		$141,007,871

This gives an average to each person in the State of Alabama, including slaves, of about $146; and if the average is made between the white and free colored persons only it is about $266, against an average of $96 in the State of Illinois.

These facts, it seems to me, are sufficient to satisfy the most prejudiced partisan as to which is the most profitable, free or slave labor; but as some persons are never satisfied unless extremes are made to meet, I beg to ask attention to a few facts in relation to the States of Massachusetts and South Carolina.

Massachusetts had a population in 1860 of—

White persons.....	1,221,464
Free colored persons.....	9,062

Total.....1,231,066

The assessed value of real estate and personal property in Massachusetts in 1860 was $777,157,816, making an average to each person in the State of about $631.

South Carolina had a population in 1860 of—

White persons.....	291,388
Free colored.....	9,914

Total.....703,708

The assessed value of real estate and personal property in South Carolina was in 1860 $489,319,128, which makes an average to each person in the State, including slaves, of $695; and if the average is made between the white and free colored persons, who were the owners of the property, the average value to each one of these will be found to be about $1,624, against $631 in the State of Massachusetts.

In Massachusetts in 1860:
Wheat raised,	119,783 bu., at \$1 $\frac{3}{4}$ bu.....	\$119,783
Rye,	388,085 bu., at $1	388,085
Indian corn,	2,157,063 bu., at 50 cts.	1,078,531
Oats,	1,180,075 bu., at 50 cts.	590,037
Rice,	none.....
Tobacco,	3,233,238 lbs., at 10 cts. $\frac{3}{4}$ lb.....	323,319
Value of live stock, including horses, mules, asses, milch cows, working oxen, other cat- tle, sheep, and swine.....
		12,737,744
Total		$15,237,499

This gives an average to each person in the State of Massachusetts of about $13.

South Carolina raised in 1860:

Wheat,	1,285,631 bu., at \$1 $\frac{3}{4}$ bu.....	\$1,285,631
Rye,	89,091 bu., at $1	89,091
Corn,	15,065,006 bu., at 50 cts.	7,532,503
Oats,	936,971 bu., at 50 cts.	468,487
Rice,	119,100,528 lbs., at 10 cts. $\frac{3}{4}$ lb.....	11,910,052
Tobacco,	104,412 lbs., at 10 cts.	10,441
Cotton,	353,413 bales, counted at 400 lbs to the bale, and 20 cts. $\frac{3}{4}$ lb, is about.....	28,273,040
Value of live stock, including horses, mules, asses, milch cows, working oxen, other cattle, sheep, and swine.....		23,934,465
Total.....		$73,504,010

This gives an average to each person in the State of South Carolina, including slaves, of about one hundred and four dollars; and if the average is made between the white and free colored persons only, it will be to each about two hundred and forty-three dollars, against about thirteen dollars to each person in the State of Massachusetts.

It may be said that Massachusetts is not an agricultural State, and that her wealth and profits arise from her manufactures. This does not alter the case, as her property is certainly all included in her list of property assessed for taxation, and the same difference exists there.

But we are told that the negro will work better and produce more as a freeman than they have ever done as slaves. To ascertain what is true, or what we may expect from the colored people that have been lately made free, we have only to ascertain what has been the result where any large numbers of that race have been suddenly emancipated; and in order that there shall be no cause for contradiction on this point as to the facts of the case I will give them in the language of that eminent historian, Alison, who, in his History of Europe, says that—

"St. Domingo, the greatest except Cuba, and beyond all question the most flourishing of the West India islands before the Revolution, is about three hundred miles in length and its average breadth about ninety miles. The Spanish possessed two thirds and the French the remainder. In the French portion the inhabitants consisted of about forty thousand whites, sixty thousand mulattoes, and five hundred thousand negro slaves. This French colony was immensely productive, exceeding all the British islands together. Its exports, including the Spanish portion, were £18,400,000, and its imports £10,000,000 sterling. Eighteen hundred vessels and twenty-seven thousand sailors were employed in conducting the vast colonial traffic. It was this splendid and unequalled colonial possession which the French nation threw away and destroyed at the commencement of the Revolution, with a recklessness and improvidence of which the previous history of the world had afforded no example. Hardly had the cry of liberty and equality been raised in France, says our historian, when it responded warmly and vehemently from the shores of St. Domingo. The slave population were rapidly assailed by revolutionary agents and emissaries, and the workshops and fields of the planters overrun by heated missionaries, who poured into an ignorant and ardent multitude the new-born ideas of European freedom.

"The Constituent Assembly of March 8, 1790, had empowered the colonies to make known their wishes on the subject of a constitution by Colonial Assemblies freely elected by their own citizens, and on the 15th of May, 1791, the privileges of equality were conferred by the same authority on all persons of color born of a free father and mother. The planters openly endeavored to resist the decree, and civil war was preparing, when, on the night of the 25th of August, 1791, the negro insurrection long and silently organized, at once broke forth and wrapped the whole northern part of the colony in flames.

"The conspiracy embraced nearly the whole negro population of the island. The cruelties exercised exceeded anything recorded in history. The negroes marched with spiked infants on their spears instead of colors. They sawed asunder their male prisoners and violated the females on the dead bodies of their husbands."

Here, sir, we have the result of an attempt to put the negro on an equality with the white man. Sir, does it afford any consolation to those who are so persistently endeavoring to bring on an equality here? What is there in this plain and clear historic fact that gives hope for a better result here if these wild and fanatical schemes are pressed upon the people of these United States? Do we not know, sir, that history will repeat itself, and that if they continue to press and force upon the people this equality that similar results will be the consequence here?

But, sir, let us follow our author a little further, and see what has been the result of the emancipation of these people upon the industry and prosperity of the island. He informs us that the universal freedom of the blacks was proclaimed on the 3d of June, 1793, and then gives us the following table, which he says contains the comparative wealth, produce, and trade of St. Domingo in 1789 and in 1832, after forty years of nominal freedom:

Sugar exported, pounds.....		672,000,000
Coffee, pounds.....		86,789,000
Ships employed.....		1,680
Sailors.....		27,000
Exports to France.....		$6,730,000
Imports from France.....		$9,890,000
	1832.

Population.....	280,000
Sugar.....	none
Coffee, pounds.....	32,000,000
Ships employed.....	1
Sailors.....	167
Exports to France.....	none
Imports.....	none

Here sir, we have a very sad but very instructive account of the result of suddenly emancipating large numbers of the colored race. Sir, is history to repeat itself in this instance? Is it not most rational for us to suppose that it will? What reason have we to believe that the colored people will do any better here than they have done under similar circumstances in other countries? Sir, can any gentleman suppose after being informed of these plain historical facts that those large and rich plantations in the former slave States will ever (for generations to come) be made to wave and almost to groan with or on account of the rich harvests of former years? No sir. But on the contrary these broad and fertile acres will be uncultivated, the fences that once inclosed them rotted and gone, and the land which once sent forth such large and heavy crops of grain, tobacco, and cotton will be covered with brambles and other wild growth that will afford no profit to either man or beast.

But, sir, we have other evidence to prove that whenever large numbers of colored people are suddenly emancipated the result is the destruction of labor, and consequently a very large falling off of the products of the soil.

I will call the attention of gentlemen to the facts as they have occurred in the island of Jamaica, where the negroes were emancipated under the most favorable circumstances; their freedom was not said to be the result of war. No, sir; the Parliament of Great Britain honestly made an appropriation to pay the owners for their property, and full equality, as it is desired here, was granted to the negro race. Parliament passed the act liberating the slaves on this island in 1833. Their population at that time was, of whites, 15,776; mulattoes, 68,527; and of blacks, 293,125. In the year 1810 Jamaica imported to the amount of £4,308,337, and her exports were £2,303,579. In twenty years after the emancipation of the slaves her imports had fallen off to the sum of £864,094 and her exports to the sum of £837,276; and in 1864 her exports were only £403,520, and her imports £932,316. There has been some increase in her black and mulatto population; but the white population have decreased to the amount of 1,900, and during the period between 1832 and 1847, 605. Sugar and coffee plantations containing 356,432 acres of land were entirely abandoned; and from 1848 to 1853 579 other plantations, containing 391,187 acres, were totally or partially turned to waste. These facts were recently stated in a speech delivered in the other end of this Capitol by one of the Senators from Kentucky

[Mr. DAVIS] as being verified by Mr. Carey, and a statement made by the West India Association of Glasgow and other documents.

Mr. Bigelow, in his Notes on Jamaica, says:

"Shipping has deserted her ports, her magnificent plantations of sugar and coffee are running to weeds, her private dwellings are falling to decay, the comforts and luxuries which belong to industrial prosperity have been cut off, one by one, from her inhabitants; and the day is at hand when there will be no one left to represent the wealth, intelligence, and hospitality for which the Jamaica planter was once so distinguished."

The same writer, on page 53, says:

"It is difficult to exaggerate, and yet more difficult to define, the poverty and industrial prostration of Jamaica. The natural wealth and spontaneous productivity of the island are so great that no one can starve; and yet it seems as if the faculty of accumulation were suspended. All the productive power of the soil is running to waste; the finest land in the world may be had at any price, and almost for the asking; labor receives no compensation, and the product of labor does not seem to know the way to market. Families accustomed to wealth and every luxury have witnessed the decline of their incomes until now, with undiminished estates, they find themselves wrestling with poverty for the commonest necessities of life."

And on page 54 he says:

"Since the year 1833, when the British slave emancipation act was passed, the real estate of the island has been rapidly depreciating in value, and its productivity has been steadily diminishing to its present comparatively ruinous standard."

And on page 55 the same writer gives us a table, which he says is from official returns, showing the amount of exports for three years previous to the emancipation act with the exports for three years preceding the month of October, 1848. He then adds that—

"By this contrast it appears that during the last three years the island has exported less than half the sugar, rum, or ginger, less than one third the coffee, less than one tenth the molasses, and nearly two million pounds less of pimento than during the three years which preceded the emancipation act."

And on pages 62 and 63 of the same author we have this statement:

"The value of fixed property—sugar estates—before emancipation was estimated at £20,000,000 sterling, but that the same property then could not be sold for more than £600,000 sterling."

Mr. Speaker, can any gentleman suppose, with this exhibition of facts before him, that the former slave States will, at any time for generations to come, be able to pay one half the amount of revenue that they would have done if their system of labor had not been destroyed? If so, I confess it is more than I can do. But, sir, whatever the deficiency may be, it must be clear to every one that those who did not own slaves will each one have to pay their proportionate part to make up that deficiency.

But, sir, admitting that what I have said is true, the great question of what is the best course for us to adopt under the present state of affairs, still presses itself upon us and demands our serious and earnest consideration.

Sir, it is the duty of all patriots to take facts as they exist, and make the best out of them that we are able to do, without regard to party considerations. We all know that we were once the most happy and prosperous people upon this globe. We also know that that is not the case now, but that our happiness and prosperity as a nation is, to say the least of it, greatly diminished. What, then, I ask, is necessary for us to do in order again to be prosperous and happy? I know, sir, that some plain, common-sense people would think the question easily answered, and that all we have to do would be to retrace our action and return to the condition we were in when we were prosperous before, with all the laws and customs that we then had, and we would be so again.

But, sir, these people forget that politicians are now ruling and leading the people of the United States, and their minds are filled with the ideas of progress and reform, and that although these progressions and reforms may be alone for the sake of maintaining a particular party, yet rather than acknowledge that they have failed in their attempts at reformation, they will press forward to something in advance, even if they bring ruin upon all. Now, sir, under this state of case the people will have to regard all that has been done as fixed facts, at least for a time, and look to these facts as they now exist, and make the best we can of them.

Mr. Speaker, I affirm that in my judgment one of the most important things that can now be done in order to restore this Government and give confidence to the people in its justice and integrity, is for those who are now controlling it to pay all loyal persons for all the property of every kind that has been taken by the Government or its agents in order to enable it to put down the rebellion. Sir, no man can have confidence in the justice or integrity of a Government when he knows that it has taken the proceeds of his hard earnings, and then delays or refuses to make just compensation in some way. Sir, a very large number of loyal men in these United States have had property of different kinds taken from them, and in many cases it was property upon which they mainly depended for a support, and yet payment is withheld or refused.

Now, sir, what effect is this course to have upon the minds of the people? Does not every gentleman know that if the Government fails to pay the citizen his just claims, and at the same time forces these same citizens to pay taxes to support these men in office, that it will have a tendency to alienate the minds of the citizens and all love for the Government or its stability will be destroyed? Sir, what other course could be adopted that would be so well calculated to bring on a repudiation of the entire debt, and thus to prostrate and destroy the credit and honor of this nation? Sir, only a few days since there was a proposition made in this House by an honorable member, [Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio,] to amend the Constitution so as to prohibit the payment by the Government or by the States for slaves that had been emancipated by it. Now, sir, why is such an amendment as this asked? Surely if the Constitution and laws of our country give no claim to those who formerly owned these slaves, such an amendment is entirely useless, and if the mover of the proposition had not thought that these people had a claim founded upon the Constitution and laws he would not have proposed such an amendment.

If, then, these people have this claim, and to avoid it this amendment is sought and forced upon these people without their consent, I ask, sir, will not this be repudiation, so far as it goes, of the deepest dye, and what other effect do gentlemen suppose that such a measure can have upon the minds of the people except to alienate them from the Government and prepare them to vote for the repudiation of the whole debt of the United States? Sir, I warn gentlemen, if they do not desire such a repudiation, to stop in their wild and mad career and to cease their efforts to force their peculiar views upon the people.

Sir, let us imitate the noble example set us by our President; let us unroll the Constitution, as he has done, and be governed by it; let us open the doors of this House to the Representatives duly elected and qualified from all the States; let each State regulate and control their own affairs in their own way, subject to the Constitution and laws of the United States. This, sir, in my judgment, is the only way that we can ever have a restored Union. We may have a Government kept together by military power, but it will not in that way ever give us a restored Union.

Mr. SHELLABARGER obtained the floor.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHELLABARGER] permit me to ask one or two questions of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. RITTER] which he stated his willingness to answer after he should have concluded his speech?

Mr. SHELLABARGER. If I knew how much time it would take I might be willing to yield.

Mr. KELLEY. It will not take five minutes.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. If it will not take more than five minutes, I will yield.

Mr. KELLEY. I will propound the first question with the leave of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I will exercise my right to resume the floor if I find that too much time is to be taken.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I object to the question being put to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. RITTER] unless he is allowed time to reply.

Mr. KELLEY. He will have time. The gentleman from Kentucky stated the assessed value of the property of the slave States in comparison with the assessed value of the property of the free States. I want to inquire whether that embraces the assessed value of the increase of slave population from year to year.

Mr. RITTER. I believe the gentleman asked that same question while I was upon the floor, with the exception of the part in regard to the increase of slave population. Of course slaves were regarded as valuable, and were required by the laws of the State to be assessed at what they would bring in the market, and were taxed as property.

Mr. KELLEY. I believe that branch of manufactures did not appear in the list of assessed property of the free States.

Mr. RITTER. That has nothing to do with the productions of the soil.

Mr. KELLEY. I wanted to point out the distinction. The gentleman's calculation of property was made by appraising the value of each working man in the South at from three hundred to one thousand dollars, and then crediting him with a portion of that in the average possession of property.

Now, I desire to ask the gentleman whether it be true, as he states, that all have been on an equality in Jamaica. He stated that all, black and white, were equal in Jamaica.

Mr. RITTER. I gave my authority for the statement.

Mr. KELLEY. The right of suffrage there is not possessed by one in ten of the population; suffrage there is not as liberal as it is in England.

As the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHELLABARGER] wants the floor, I will forego the other questions.

Mr. RITTER. I think any other day will do just as well.

Mr. KELLEY. I will ask one other question: if taxation with representation be the true principle, and its disregard must lead to revolution, ought not that principle to be applied to the majority of the people of the two States of South Carolina and Mississippi?

Mr. RITTER. The gentleman makes that a matter of assertion.

Mr. KELLEY. I ask the gentleman a question. He argues that the correct principle is that taxation and representation should be equal, and that the disregard of that principle would justify revolution. Now, I ask whether the disregard of that principle in regard to the majority of the people of the two States of South Carolina and Mississippi would in his judgment justify revolution?

Mr. RITTER. I am in favor of taxation and representation going together. In South Carolina they have always gone together, for the people have all been represented.

Mr. KELLEY. The gentleman stated that the census of 1860 showed that there were 291,000 white people in South Carolina, and 412,000 colored people. Now, I ask whether the principle which he regards as so sacred and inviolable should be applied to that State, and whether its disregard would in his judgment justify revolution?

Mr. RITTER. The gentleman forgets that the people of the State of South Carolina and the other southern States have always been represented in the State Legislature, and until the last two or three years have always been represented in Congress. He appears to have the idea that there were some persons in that section of the country who were not represented.

Mr. KELLEY. Does the gentleman, then, mean that the person shall have no voice in electing his representative, but that an oligarchy, an aristocracy, or a monarch may designate the representative; or does he mean that the representative shall be the choice of the person represented?

Mr. RITTER. I do mean to say that there are a good many persons in the country who do not vote, and yet they are represented; and I presume that such will be the case for all time to come. I do not understand that any gentleman here proposes that everybody shall vote.

Mr. KELLEY. Then I will modify my question. Does the gentleman believe that a majority of the free adult male inhabitants of a State ought to have a voice in electing its representatives?

Mr. RITTER. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me we are consuming time here altogether unnecessarily. As I am trespassing upon the time of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SHELLABARGER.] I will make this single remark, that I do not regard this as the proper place to discuss the question in regard to the qualifications of voters. The Constitution has, in my opinion, placed the control of that question with the States.

Mr. KELLEY. It is not often that a gentleman from Kentucky declines to answer a question or evades it.

DISFRANCHISEMENT OF REBELS.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Mr. Speaker, some weeks ago I introduced a resolution, which was adopted by this body, referring to the Judiciary Committee of this House the inquiry whether it is competent, under the American Constitution, for Congress to declare by law the forfeiture of citizenship where that citizenship has been voluntarily abandoned by acts of disloyalty. Since that resolution was adopted the distinguished gentleman who occupies the chair of this House has been, I am glad to find, speaking, in the same direction in which that resolution points. Since that, again, one of the most distinguished lawyers of the House has introduced a set of resolutions bearing upon the same subject, and expressing with more distinctness a plan for putting in application that power of the Government, if it be one of the powers of the Government.

I am most glad, therefore, to find these and other evidences that the mind of the country is being directed now toward this important practical inquiry, as one, not all, of the means that may be resorted to for the purpose of relieving us from these questions of terrible embarrassment by which our Government is surrounded. To that great question, I desire to direct the remarks which I am about to make.

Mr. Speaker, your country, not yet twelve moons ago, went out from the presence of dangers so terrible and deadly as that their merest statement mocks at all the resources of human speech; and it went into a triumph and joy as indescribable as its recent sorrow was. And now again the people stand appalled under the shadow of some huge calamity, and before "grim-visaged war hath smoothed his wrinkled front" men of stoutest heart start back aghast at the damned portent of civil war which they deem they see grim and manifest before them, and they look into each other's faces and inquire—why? In "the breach" between the President of the United States and Congress touching the method of restoring the States in recent revolt to controlling power in the Union, and in the causes for that breach, most men find the occasion for this alarm. I go not at all to-day into the consideration of these, and allude to them now only for the purpose of saying, as I do here and now, that if any faith can be placed in the sincerity or truth of the most solemn utterances of the Congress and of the President then they do not differ, but do most precisely agree, upon at least one of the most, if not the most, important and decisive principles and means for the restoration of these States to power which can enter into that great work. Nay, I go further, and solemnly aver here upon the awful responsibilities of one of the legislators of this my country that if the President and Congress have the constitutional right to employ this means to which I allude for the restoration of the States, and if they will in good faith unite to apply and put in force the principle which both solemnly profess to hold, then the work of restoration of these States will be, if not easy at least ultimately certain, and at once secured.

The principle to which I allude is, that in all these States the truly loyal alone shall have powers of government, either by the holding of office or by the exercise of the elective franchise, and that "the conscious and responsible leaders of the rebellion" shall be tried, convicted, and executed.

If, indeed, it be so that you may exclude from all powers of government, in the States recently in rebellion, those who really desire to destroy the Government, and if we may secure to the loyal people alone all control of the States and their Federal representation, then I see no reason why every State so governed would not be welcomed to-day to the embraces of the parent Government with an acclaim of joy almost like that which angels gave at Bethlehem.

The avowals by the President of the United States of his desire for this exclusion of rebels from all powers of government, and for their condign punishment, have been so frequent, so recent, and so explicit, that to doubt their sincerity would be to attribute to the President treachery to his professions and an infidelity to all the instincts of honor and manhood.

And, first, I reëxhibit to Congress and to the country a most explicit avowal of his principles upon this subject, made by the President at Nashville on the 9th of June, 1864, in accepting the nomination of the Union party for the Vice Presidency. The avowal is an emphatic and complete assertion of all the constitutional power, at least by State action, and also of the expediency and duty of exercising the power, for which I shall contend. It was upon this explicit avowal that Mr. Johnson was elected. In his formal letter accepting the nomination, he refers to this speech as one "in which I indicated my acceptance of the distinguished honor conferred by that body, and defined the grounds upon which that acceptance was based, substantially saying what I now have to say." (See Johnson's Life, by Savage, 298.) No pledge to principle could be more solemn, therefore, than this one is. None could be more signally ratified by a great people than was this in Mr. Johnson's election. In speaking of the convention to be convened to restore the government of Tennessee he uses the following language, which will be found in his Life, pages 295 and 296:

"But in calling a convention to restore the State, who shall restore and reestablish it? Shall it be the man who gave his influence and his means to destroy the Government? Is he to participate in the great work of reorganization? Shall he who brought this misery upon the State be permitted to control its destinies? If so, then all the precious blood of our brave soldiers and officers so freely poured out will have been wantonly spilled. All the glorious victories won by our noble armies will go for naught, and all the bat-le-fields which have been sown with dead heroes during the rebellion will have been made memorable in vain. Why all this carnage and devastation? It was that treason might be put down and traitors punished. Therefore, I say, that traitors should take a back seat in the work of restoration. If there be but five men in Tennessee loyal to the Constitution, loyal to freedom, loyal to justice, these true and faithful men should control the work of reorganization and reformation absolutely. [Loud and prolonged applause.] I say that the traitor has ceased to be a citizen, and in joining the rebellion has become a public enemy. He forfeited his right to vote with loyal men when he renounced his citizenship and sought to destroy our Government. We say to the haughty and industrious foreigner who comes from England or Germany to dwell among us and add to the wealth of the country, 'Before you can be a citizen you must be here five years.' If we are so cautious about foreigners who voluntarily renounce their homes to live with us, what should we say to the traitor who, although born and reared among us, has raised a patricidal hand against the Government which always protected him? My judgment is that he should be subjected to a severe ordeal before he is restored to citizenship. A fellow who takes the oath merely to save his property and denies the validity of his oath is a perjured man and not to be trusted. Before these repenting rebels can be trusted let them bring forth the fruits of repentance." "Treason must be made odious, and traitors must be punished and impoverished. Their great plantations must be seized and divided into small farms and sold to honest and industrious men."

Mr. Speaker, the argument I now enter upon is all aimed to show that "the traitor ceased, so far as his Government may so elect to treat him, to be a citizen" and "forfeited his right to vote" when, by persistent rebellion against his Government, he "renounced his citizenship," and that he "should be subjected to a severe ordeal before he is restored to citizenship," and that "he should be required to bring forth the fruits of repentance before he shall be trusted." And these are the solemnly "defined grounds upon which Mr. Johnson's acceptance of the nomination was based." (Life, 298.) These are not merely the excited utterances of a stump speech, but were again carefully and solemnly repledged as principles in his letter to the president of the convention that nominated him. Upon them he went to the American people. The people by an overwhelming voice approved them. They cannot be now retreated from without both dishonor most shameless and foul and moral treason most deep and infamous. I cannot and will not believe that the President means to retreat from them; or that he purposes to seek refuge from the scorn and indignation of a betrayed and outraged people in the embraces of them whom he called the "perjured fellows who take the oath merely to save their property." (See Life, 294.)

He has again and again repledged himself to this same thing since his election. In his recent speech to the Virginia delegation headed by Mr. Baldwin, (late of the rebel congress,) he used these words:

"If there were but five thousand loyal men in a State, or a less number, but sufficient to take charge of the political machinery of the State, these five thousand, or the less number, are entitled to it if all the rest be otherwise inclined. I look upon it as being fundamental that the exercise of political power should be confined to loyal men, and I regard that as implied in the doctrines laid down in these resolutions and in the eloquent address by which they have been accompanied."

In the recent speech of Colonel Stokes, of Tennessee, made to the Legislature of that State, he is represented to have made the following statement touching the present views of the President upon this important question:

"As President Johnson said the other day before I left Washington, 'If you don't disfranchise the rebels they will disfranchise you.'"

Such, then, are the views of the President. To say that they are not his views, or that they are put forth as mere lures to ensnare a generous and confiding people into his support—mere "springs to catch woodcock," which he deems neither constitutional nor capable of being practically applied and enforced, nor fit to be so applied—is to attribute to him purposes and conduct which would be disgraceful to the most vulgar political harlequin, but which, in the ruler of a great and generous people who have so honored and trusted him, would be utterly disgusting and infamous. I will neither say nor believe this; and I therefore shall assume that the President deems it both practicable, constitutional, and fit to enact that the traitor "forfeited his right to vote with loyal men when he renounced his citizenship and sought to destroy the Government," and "that he shall be subjected to a severe ordeal before he is restored to citizenship."

I need not say that Congress has already indicated its belief in the same thing.

It is obvious, then, that either they who hold the two political departments of this Government are most false and insincere, or else they agree that the disloyal should be sternly excluded, by "severe ordeals," from Government until they "bring forth fruits of repentance."

I now proceed to inquire whether this which both Congress and the President favor is permitted by the Constitution.

And to guard myself, at the very threshold of these remarks, from misapprehension, I state, that should the Government be found to hold this alleged power of excluding them who have renounced their citizenship from the exercise of its powers, still I do not favor such exclusion against the mass of the common people, unless it shall appear that they continue incorrigibly disloyal, and insubordinate to our Government and laws. I only inquire now as to the power. The manner and extent of its employment will be a matter for the high, solemn, and most cautious exercise of the wisdom and discretion of Congress; to be done with due regard to the nature of ours as a popular Government resting upon the will of the loyal citizens, but also with regard to the perpetuity and safety of the Republic.

What makes the inquiry upon which I now enter, as to the right to exclude the disloyal from citizenship and from voting, of such vital moment just now is the sad fact that in at least ten of these States there is the highest reason to fear that more than half the white inhabitants desire the destruction of this nation.

The people could not learn a fact, so utterly unnatural and appalling, until each household spelled it out, letter by letter, line by line, for itself. But the nation did learn it at last, when every family had read it in the marble features of its own slain—

"For there was not a house in which there was not one dead."

To again refuse to believe it as we did before, and to decline again to act upon it as true is only stark madness. For four years and a half that almost entire people strove for that destruction, with a ferocity of will which made the purposes of Danton and Robespierre almost timid, and with a cruelty of execution which makes the "September slaughters of the prisons" almost mercy.

And now, when the grass has not yet covered the graves where sleep the victims of this immense crime, and when, by no act, or speech, or sign, the great mass of the authors of it have even professed regrets for the past except regrets for the failure, and when they avow no new desires for the future, this nation must either accept this most unwelcome fact of general disloyalty or else the nation cannot live.

Mr. Speaker, has the Constitution, now that actual war for the attainment of the nation's destruction has been crushed out, deprived the Government of all power to accept this fact, and to provide against the imminent peril to the nation which it imports? To show that the Constitution has not is the work of this my hour.

To be fully and accurately apprehended, let me state now what I am about to maintain and what I shall not maintain.

I do not think that the Federal Government has any power to exclude by law any civilized native of the United States from rights of national citizenship who has not violated or renounced his allegiance to the United States.

I do not maintain that any citizen can, by any act of disloyalty or by discarding his allegiance, divest himself of the obligations of the allegiance which he owes his country; but, on the contrary, I hold that he cannot.

I do not hold that the United States can regulate the enjoyment of the elective franchise in the organized States so as to prescribe who, of them who are citizens, shall be permitted to vote. I think the second section of the first article of the Constitution gives this power to the States.

What I do maintain and shall strive to establish is, that the United States is a supreme nationality with the sovereign power usually held by nations to define the obligations of citizenship and demand the paramount allegiance of all its citizens in return for national protection; and that, in virtue of such sovereignty, the nation has the power by law to declare what gross, open, and palpable acts of abjuration and abandonment of the obligations of citizenship shall work a forfeiture of all the political rights and powers of citizenship, including the elective franchise; and may also prescribe what shall be deemed sufficient evidence of a return to true faith and allegiance to his country such as to entitle him to demand the rights of a citizen.

To attain the establishment of these I now proceed.

THE UNITED STATES IS A NATION.

It is upon this sublime and simple law that I lay the foundations of my argument.

Mr. Speaker, how strange has been the history of that law's enunciation and enforcement in our country. Its absence from "the Confederation" rendered that structure, which was reared in the storms of war, utterly weak and insecure, and at the end of the eighth year of its existence prostrated it in ruin. To remove in the new Constitution this cause of the feebleness and ruin of the old, was the very end and purpose of the new one's formation. That high purpose they who made it engraved into its text in those vital words, "Shall be the supreme law of the land."

And then they set the purpose out again in the tiara of stars with which they bound the Constitution's brow, and made it read, "To form a more perfect Union."

This law, stated by Wheaton in the words, "The United States is a supreme Government, acting not only upon the sovereign members of the Union but directly upon the citizens," was thus made self-evident as the very foundation of the Government, both by the origin, the text, and the preamble of the Constitution. It was afterward affirmed by a thousand judgments of the highest courts of the States and of the nation. It was reannounced by the Government itself in the terrible dialect of war in the suppression of three successive revolts against that supremacy in the States of Pennsylvania, South Carolina, and Rhode Island. It became impressed upon the Constitution's history by the meanings assigned to it by those who made it. The same thing was enforced by the subsequent arguments of its great exponents, among which stands one—the reply to Hayne—unsurpassed by the achievements of the human intellect, and which has passed into undying history, the sole companion of its only peer, "the oration upon the Crown."

But, sir, after all these it was strangely, in God's orders, reserved to this Government to teach it to her children and the world in emphasis which startled the human race.

This lesson, which they who made it had thus written all over the Constitution, which the Government had three times more indicated by the accents of war, which for seventy years the courts had been framing into decrees and men had been illustrating with the best eloquence of earth, is comprehended at last. But, Mr. Speaker, it was only comprehended when it was written "in letters of mingled fire and blood—the fires of a war which swept half a continent, and the blood of 'the mighty millions.'"

There it stands now, written, comprehended. It is the judgment of by far the most august court which ever sat for "high resolve," the court of the mighty people; and men comprehend at last that this is a nation with right to live.

SELF-PRESERVATION A UNIVERSAL RIGHT AND DUTY OF NATIONS.

The next element of my argument I bring from the highest sources of public law; and assert that "the right of self-preservation is not only a right with respect to other States, but a duty with respect to its own members, and the most solemn and important one which a State owes to them." (Wheaton, 115.) "Every nation is obliged to perform the duty of self-preservation." (Vattel, s. p. 5.)

EVERY NATION IS ENTITLED TO THE MEANS OF SELF-DEFENSE.

Mr. Speaker, from the same high sources of authority, I allege that—

"Since a nation is obliged to preserve itself, it has a right to everything necessary for its preservation."
* * * * * "A nation has a right to everything that can ward off imminent danger, and keep at a distance whatever is capable of causing its ruin; and from that very same reason that establishes its right, it has also the right to the things necessary to its preservation."—Vattel, s. p. 6.

"This right of self-preservation necessarily involves all other incidental rights as a means to give effect to the principal end."—Wheaton, 115.

As we proceed we shall see that these principles, so evidently inherent in the very nature of sovereignty, are both held and employed by every independent State.

CITIZENSHIP IS A NATIONAL AND NOT A STATE QUALITY AND GIFT.

Let it be next thoroughly established and comprehended that in our Government there is, properly speaking, no State citizenship, and that, to adopt the language of the case of Lynch vs. Clark, (1 Sanford R., 583,) citizenship is "a national right or condition."

Chancellor Kent affirms the authority of this case (2 Kent's Commentaries, s. p. 30, note) when he says:

"The question [of citizenship as distinguished from alienage] is one of national and not of individual [State] sovereignty."

"A State," says Judge McLean, "may authorize a foreigner to hold real estate within its jurisdiction, but it has no power to naturalize foreigners and give them the rights of citizens. Such a right is opposed to the acts of Congress on the subject of naturalization and subversive of the Federal powers. I regret that any countenance should be given from this bench to a practice like this in some of the States which has no warrant in the Constitution."—19 Howard, 533.

"Every citizen of the United States is a component member of the nation, with rights and duties under the Constitution and laws of the United States which cannot be abridged by the laws of any particular State." "Every person who is a citizen of the United States, whether by birth or naturalization, holds his great franchise by the laws of the United States, and above the control of any particular State."—Opinion of Attorney General Bates, of 29th November, 1862.

By such authorities as these I show this other proposition of my argument, that by the very essence and nature of sovereignty it is and must be the nation, the supreme Government, that determines who shall be members of the nation's body, its citizens, and whom it will admit to demand its protection and enjoy its powers.

NATURE AND RIGHTS OF CITIZENSHIP.

In order that the legal consequences which flow from the fact that the nation bestows and controls citizenship may be completely understood, it is best now to look at the nature of American citizenship.

Although this is a subject of great difficulty in some of its aspects, yet it is in others of the very easiest and most obvious comprehension and statement.

In speaking of what privileges and powers are included in citizenship, Mr. Calhoun says:

"But though we may not be able to say with precision what a citizen is, we may say with the utmost certainty what he is not. He is not an alien. Alien and citizen are correlative terms, and stand in contradistinction to each other. They, of course, cannot so exist."

The principle here alluded to by Mr. Calhoun, that he cannot be held to be a citizen who does not owe, or who does not recognize or render the obligations of a citizen, is more fully expressed by Vattel (s. p. 106) in these words:

"If the body of society or he who represents it [the Government] absolutely fail to discharge their obligations toward the citizen, the latter may withdraw himself."

Now note what follows:

"For, if one of the contracting parties does not observe his engagements, the other is no longer bound to fulfill his, as the contract is reciprocal between society and its members. It is on the same principle also that society may expel a member who violates its laws."

Precisely the same thing in its legal effect is stated by the Attorney General of the United States in his opinion of the 29th November, 1862. His words are:

"The duty of allegiance and the right to protection are correlative obligations, the one the price of the other, and they constitute the bond between the individual and his country."

Justice Blackstone says:

"Allegiance is the tie or ligament which binds every subject to be true and faithful to his sovereign in return for protection which is afforded him."

It cannot be necessary further to enforce a proposition which is asserted by plain and irresistible reason, by every authority of any value upon international law which is in existence, and which is denied by none. This proposition is, that the "bond" which unites every sovereign State with its citizens is the recognition and rendering by the citizen of true loyalty, faith, and allegiance to his Government; and the reciprocal protection due and rendered by his Government to that citizen as the price of that allegiance; and when such faith is not recognized or rendered, there is no bond of citizenship and none of its rights. About the truth of this position there can be neither sensible dispute or doubt. The only question which can be made, bearing directly upon this doctrine of public law, is as to how the citizen may show he discards his allegiance, and how the Government may assert its right to forfeit his citizenship. This we shall presently come to and consider.

RELATIONS OF CITIZENSHIP TO SUFFRAGE.

I now assert another proposition which in principle is identical with and must result from the doctrine that "State laws and State legislation cannot in the nature of things be longer permitted to define, abridge, or enlarge the important privilege of citizenship in the United States." It is this: they from whom the United States may constitutionally withhold or withdraw the ordinary rights of national citizenship, such as the right of petition, of holding land, and of protection, cannot, except by the sufferance of the Government of the United States, have conferred upon them by the action of the States higher and more vital powers and rights of controlling the United States Government than would be derived by the possession of mere rights of national citizenship. In other words, those, whether native or foreign, whom the nation may rightly decline to permit the States to endow with citizenship merely, cannot be endowed by the States except by mere sufferance, as I have said, with the infinitely higher attributes of national sovereignty, which, by the elective franchise, selects all the rulers of the Republic. Judge Curtis (19 Howard R., 581) says truly that though—

"The enjoyment of the elective franchise is not essential to citizenship, there can be no doubt it is one of the chiefest attributes of citizenship under the American constitutions; and the just and constitutional possession of this right is decisive evidence of national citizenship."

I aver that they to whom the nation has rightly denied the rights of citizenship are thereby denied being deemed a part of the "people of the States" in the sense of the second section of the first article of the Constitution; and no State can make such men the electors and rulers of this nation unless, as is true in a few States, this be permitted by the mere sufferance of the Government. I do not object to this sufferance where loyal men are the recipients of it.

Let us see how this is now by the great lights of the law. I first cite Story, (Constitution, section 1103,) who, with irresistible force of reason, declares that—

"If aliens might be admitted indiscriminately to enjoy all the rights of citizens, at the will of a single State, the Union itself might be endangered by the influx of foreigners hostile to its institutions, ignorant of its forms, and incapable of a due estimation of its privileges."

Surely, whether the elective franchise be a right of citizenship or not, there is no other right so fatally dangerous to be intrusted, "at the will of a single State," to men not citizens, and "hostile to our institutions," as the power of selecting all the officers of the nation—a power which Judge Curtis well declares to be the "chiefest attribute of citizenship."

Again, sir, Chancellor Kent, (Note c, s. p. 229, 1 vol. Comm.) after declaring that in Ohio the right of suffrage is limited to naturalized and natural-born citizens, adds, "And so I think it ought to be in all sound policy; and the view taken of the subject in the above case (Spragins vs. Houghton, 2 Scammon, 377,) by one of the counsel who argued the cause, is a masterly argument." (See Mr. Butterfield's argument approved by Kent, in 2 Scammon, 382.)

Again, Mr. Lawrence (in Wheaton, 910) says:

"If they [the States] can admit to the elective franchise those who are not citizens, thereby neutralizing the votes of citizens, not only the Federal power of naturalization becomes a nullity, but in the latter case a minority of actual citizens by the aid of aliens may control the government of the States, and through the States the Government of the Union."

Once more I cite Mr. Calhoun, not merely because of the eminence of his learning and ability, but mainly because of the intrinsic force of what he says, and that it is said by one not too apt to restrict the powers of the States, nor to magnify those of the General Government. In the argument from which I have quoted (Wheaton, 905) he says:

"To suppose that a State can make an alien a citizen of the State, or confer upon him the right of voting, would involve the absurdity of giving him a direct and immediate control over the action of the General Government, from which he has no right to claim protection, and to which he has no right to present a petition. That the full force of the absurdity may be felt, it must be borne in mind that every department of the General Government is either directly or indirectly under the control of the voters in the several States." "Now, admit that a State may confer the right of voting on all aliens, and it will follow as a necessary consequence that we might have among our constituents persons who have not the right to claim the protection of the Government or to present a petition to it."

"But a still greater difficulty remains. Suppose a war should be declared between the United States and the country to which the aliens belong. They, as aliens, would be liable to be seized under the laws of Congress, to have their goods confiscated, and themselves sent out of the country. The principle that leads to such consequences cannot be true."

Surely Mr. Calhoun must be right. Surely the States cannot, if the nation should exercise its right to forbid it, authorize them to elect the American President and the American Congress, who can neither petition the Government they elect, demand the protection of the Government they elect, be required to bear arms in favor of the Government which they elect, be tried for treason against the Government they elect, nor remain, in time of war, in the country whose rulers they elect, and who are, by a law now in force, declared to be, in time of war, the enemies of the Government which they elect and required to be driven from the country. (See act of 6th July, 1798.)

Mr. Speaker, whether a nation endowed, as we have now seen ours to be, with the high attributes of supreme sovereignty—a nation with right to life; with right to all powers required to ward off danger to that life; with exclusive right to confer, define, and control national citizenship; with right, if it so choose, to exclude aliens from becoming citizens, and from either electing our rulers or demanding our protection until this nation shall deem them fit to become such; whether such a nation may withdraw the power of electing our rulers from men who have turned enemies of the Government and discarded all the duties of citizenship is the momentous inquiry to which all I have said was directed. If it be so that your Government has not this power, then, indeed, is it a prodigy of the hideous, a paragon of deformity, a very miracle of the monstrous, which has neither a peer nor proximate in the past of nations.

Look at the spectacle. A supreme Government exclusively creating and controlling allegiance and citizenship; but with States in that Government able to enact into supreme laws that all who have by acts of treason proved their purpose to destroy the Government shall elect its rulers, and that all who have not done this shall not vote for these rulers! You have a Government with exclusive power to decide whom it will permit to bear from State to State the right of abode, of holding land, and of exemption from unusual taxes, and yet with power in the States to declare that none but those whom the Union will not permit to have these lowest rights of citizenship shall elect all of the nation's supreme magistrates. You have a Congress able to make what the Constitution declares to be "the supreme law of the land," but with power in the States to enact by law that none shall vote in electing that Congress but they who, by taking part in rebellion, have shown that they aim at the destruction of both Congress and its supreme laws. You have a nation bound to exhaust every dollar of its treasures and every drop of its loyal blood to defend the rights and avenge the wrongs of its citizens, and yet with no power in that nation to declare that Mason, in England, and Slidell, in France, and Suratt and Saunders, in Canada, have ceased to have the rights of citizens; and you are, therefore, bound to exhaust this treasure and blood for the defense of these. You have a nation in which, like in all others, the "bond" which unites the citizen to his country is the fact that he acknowledges and renders allegiance to its laws; and yet you have that nation not only bound to protect them who defy and spurn their Government and its laws, but also bound to permit the disloyal States to enact into "supreme law" that none shall vote for President or Congress of the United States but such as have made war upon the United States.

Need I say that a doctrine leading to results like these is not false merely, but utterly shocking?

HOW RIGHTS OF CITIZENSHIP ARE FORFEITED.

I shall pursue these suggestions no further, but shall assume that there is some way by which this Government can deprive men whom it deems unfit to be members of society of such rights of citizenship and of electors as is demanded by the public safety.

It will be said that the only way within the Government's power to divest persons of the political powers of such citizenship, and of the right to elect the national officers, is to indict, try, and execute them; and hence that no right can be declared forfeited by a mere act of national sovereignty. In other words, it is alleged that in cases where the guilt and disloyalty of vast communities of men are open, notorious, confessed, historical, and established by years of persistent, general, and universal war, still their Government is bound to regard them as innocent, law-abiding, and patriotic, and worthy to rule the nation unless they are tried by a jury and executed!

Now, this assertion I meet with a flat denial; and I assert that it flies into the face of all law, common, constitutional, and international; of all reason, ordinary and extraordinary, and of all history, our own and all other nation's.

Look at these. Take our own recent and melancholy experience. We have eight million people, each of whom, with the exception of the women and children, has made war upon his country and forfeited his rights of citizenship and life. Unless secession be legal, then both the treason and forfeiture stand confessed by each one of the millions. Now, is it possible that each of these must be either convicted and executed, or else be permitted to be the rulers of this land? Is this great Government, indeed, so impotent as this, that in matters of this stupendous moment, shown to be absolutely vital to its existence, it can choose but one of two things, and either one of which two things carried out, I affirm, would be fatal to the nation's life. If it must permit these eight millions who waged four years of war for the nation's death, and who may profess neither penitence, loyalty, or change of purpose, to resume the highest powers of Government under laws of disloyal States which exclude from government all the loyal men of the State, then that is national death. If, on the other hand, to prevent this you must try, convict, and execute these millions, that is both national dishonor and death.

It is no escape from this dilemma to say that I would convict them and then not execute them, but grant a partial pardon sparing life, but forfeiting franchises. That both proposes impossibilities and yields the case—impossibilities, because no nation ever did, or will, or can, or ever ought to try and convict one third of its people; and it yields the case, because if a conditional and partial amnesty, which spares life but forfeits rights of citizenship, can be granted after conviction, so it can before, when the guilt is open and confessed. (6 Opinions Attorneys General, 20; Sultzer's case, Phil. R., 302.) I am not now to be understood as saying that a Government which assumes to exclude dangerous men from citizenship, or from higher powers than citizenship, as the elective franchise, deals with them in punishment of crime, or that in conceding to such men some rights of citizens, as that of residence, and depriving them of others, as that of voting, the Government is either punishing or pardoning crime as such. Such acts are no more a punishment of crime than the exclusion of aliens from the rights of citizens is a punishment of crime. And to admit such dangerous men to some rights of citizenship, as that of residing in the country, and of sparing their lives, is no more an assumption of the President's pardoning power than to permit aliens to reside and own property in the country is a pardon. These very same considerations prevent such laws from being bills of attainder, or of pains and penalties. This I argue not, because it is self-evident. You can no more punish and forfeit the property of an alien resident of the United States by the enactment of "attainder," or "pains and penalty" statutes, than you can so punish a citizen; and yet who ever dreamed that the act of July 6, 1798, banishing such aliens in time of war, was a bill of pains and penalties?

If it be true that our Government can withhold from none who are natives of our country the powers of citizenship, and if it cannot forfeit these powers by act of law and without conviction, when the citizen has openly renounced and trampled upon his obligations as a citizen, then some of the results would be the following: your Government could not exclude from citizenship the tribes of American Indians, at least not such as pay any tax. And yet that exclusion is as old as the Government. Neither could your Government exclude from powers of government pirates, or bands of robbers, or guerrillas, who are natives of your country and unconvicted. And yet such men, by the law of nations, are not only not citizens of any country, but are the declared enemies of the human race, whom any nation may destroy wherever found.

Neither could you declare men who flee their country in time of war to escape rendering to it military service to have lost citizenship. Such men you cannot try as criminals, or convict, because your process cannot reach them, and besides, the act of forfeiture may be one constituting no defined crime. Then, too, may Mason, Slidell, Breckinridge, and Wigfall, all not only demand the rights of citizen suitors in your courts, but, as has been said before, may demand that all this nation's loyal blood shall be expended in war to defend their rights and avenge their injuries.

We have already seen that the highest international authority in the world so expressly declares the law when he says that if a citizen does not "observe his engagements to the Government, then the Government is not bound to fulfill it, as the contract is reciprocal between society and its members," and that it is "on this principle also that society may expel a member who violates its laws." (Vattel, 106.)

There is no authority nor judgment of any court that does not take for granted and assume as a postulate the very thing I now strive to establish, to wit, that nations may exclude from all national citizenship, fellowship, and rights men whose character is wholly incompatible with the enjoyment of such rights. Take in proof of this the learned opinion of the Attorney General, Bates, already quoted, in which he assumes that if a man's character "is so incompatible with citizenship that the two cannot exist together" then he cannot be a citizen. Or take the definition of what a citizen is. I care not whose definition you select. You may take the oldest, as that of Aristotle, that it is one who "enjoys a due share in the government of that community of which he is a member," or you may take that of Vattel, that they are citizens who "are members of the civil society, bound to this society by certain duties, and subject to its authority; they equally participate in its advantages." In every definition it is assumed that he is not entitled to be a citizen who does not discharge the duties which "bind" him to society and entitle him to be "a member of the Government in which he shares its power."

Or take in further proof of this the express authority of every writer upon public law, all of whom, like Vattel, assert the power in the sovereign to deprive one of citizenship who will not perform his duties. Professor Felice (vol. 1, p. 145) expressly asserts the power of the sovereign to forfeit citizenship, and indeed so does every other judicious writer on public law.

HISTORY.

I now appeal to history. I assert that there is not, and never was, a civilized nation in which the sovereign did not both hold and exercise the power of forfeiting and taking away, and that by law or edict of the sovereign rights of citizenship when its duties were not recognized or rendered.

Accepting foreign citizenship forfeits all its rights in France; and so does taking a foreign office. (Wheaton, 922.) The same is true in Prussia. (Ib., 922.) One who abandons his country forfeits citizenship in Austria. An Englishman loses his rights as a British subject by adhering to a foreign Power. (Wheaton, 917; 2 Blackstone, 410.) The same is the law of Bavaria, of Wurtemberg, of Russia, and of Spain. The same law has been enforced again and again by Switzerland, and by every other European State; and that throughout all the period of civilized history.

Mr. HALE. Will the gentleman from Ohio permit me to ask him a question upon the point he is now discussing?

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Yes, sir.

Mr. HALE. I desire to inquire whether this forfeiture of which the gentleman speaks can ever operate until office found by a court of competent jurisdiction?

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I answer the gentleman that it does take effect by act of the sovereign in the enactment of the law or edict, whichever may be the channel of communicating the national will upon that subject-matter; and he will so find upon an examination of the authorities.

I have not appealed to these to show that our Government has the arbitrary power over the citizen which is held by the absolute Powers of Europe, for it is not so. I appeal to these to show that, during all time, and in every truly sovereign State which has the power to demand allegiance, and to confer citizenship, and to define its duties, whether that State be, like Austria and Russia, an absolute monarchy, or, like England, a limited one, or, like Switzerland and Rome, republics, they could also withdraw the same citizenship from them who performed none of these duties.

The two powers of conferring and withdrawing are in their nature inseparable. That would be a preposterous state of national sovereignty that can define by general law what kind of faith, allegiance, and duties done shall alone admit one to become a citizen and to demand his Government's protection, and yet that Government be utterly powerless to declare by similar law that the citizenship had ceased when all the duties of citizenship were utterly discarded and incorrigible treason was put in their place.

THE UNITED STATES.

I now assert that this very power in question, of withdrawing and withholding either some or all of the rights of citizenship from them who renounce their allegiance, has been exercised by your Government ever since it was in existence, and by the States before it was a Government. There was not a State in which during the war of the Revolution laws were not passed forfeiting rights of citizenship of them who adhered to the enemies of the country. The dates and titles of these acts will be found in 1 American State Papers, page 198. I cannot here refer to more than one or two, which will give a just idea of the character and legal effect of all.

Two years after the treaty of peace of 1783, Georgia and South Carolina passed laws forever disfranchising them who had made war against the United States; and Sir George Hammond, the British minister, in his elaborate debate with Mr. Jefferson as to these laws disfranchising and impoverishing these rebels, shows that these laws were in force in a majority of the States ten years after that treaty, and long after the adoption of our present Constitution. In 1787, Massachusetts passed a law which, for three years, excluded from voting, holding office, teaching school, and keeping hotel, all citizens of Massachusetts who had the year before engaged in the insignificant rebellion against Massachusetts which was headed by Daniel Shays. Those who had fired on or had wounded any citizen were forever deprived of citizenship, as was Shays and his principal officers. Afterward some of them who had fired upon citizens were permitted to recover their citizenship by proving penitence and loyalty, and by taking an oath of allegiance.

Mr. HALE. Will the gentleman permit again a single question?

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Yes, sir.

Mr. HALE. Did not every one of those laws to which the gentleman has referred involve the trial, conviction, and sentence of the persons thus disfranchised before a court of competent jurisdiction?

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I answer the gentleman, no, sir. Besides the gentlemen will find that one of our naturalization laws, that of 29th March, 1790, was repealed, in part, because it excluded from citizenship only those "proscribed" by the State laws, and did not include, in terms at least, those "legally convicted." And the repealing act of 29th January, 1795, added to those proscribed the other class of them convicted, making the clause read: "No person heretofore proscribed by any State, or who has been legally convicted of having joined the army of Great Britain," &c. So the law of 1802, now in force, is. So that either and both classes, the proscribed and the convicted, are excluded from American citizenship.

Mr. HALE. Then will the gentleman tell me how, under those laws, the fact of having been engaged in such rebellion was ever to be ascertained?

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Now, Mr. Speaker, I will state, in answer to that question, that a very proper provision in a law upon this subject, in execution of the power for which I am contending, would be to provide by law that wherever one who, coming apparently within the description of those proscribed, claimed to be entitled to exercise the prohibited right he should be permitted to establish his right by proofs.

Now, then, I go on with my argument; and the gentleman will see as I proceed how unimportant are the suggestions he makes.

The power of these States to pass these laws forfeiting the right to vote, and these other rights, was, I believe, never disputed in this discussion with Mr. Jefferson by the British Government. Many of these laws were long after the treaty. By both the British and American interpretation of that treaty they who were in the United States at its date, and who adhered to our Government, thereby became citizens of the United States. These acts of the State Legislatures, especially that touching Shays's rebellion, turned them into disfranchised men who never adhered to any foreign Government, never were out of the United States, and who, but for these laws, would have been citizens of the United States. And yet some of these laws, without any trial or conviction, forever disfranchised them. Some of these laws punished particular individuals by name for specified offenses. These were acts of attainder or of pains and penalties, and such the United States may not now, owing to an express constitutional provision, pass. But such as provided generally for forfeiting citizenship where men had renounced their allegiance, were not bills of attainder, are not prohibited by our Constitution, and are a most ordinary and just exercise of a sovereign power which was and is conceded by all our history to have been possessed by every one of the colonies. And shall it be endured now, that this great nation shall hold less power over national allegiance when it is voluntarily discarded by a traitor than these colonies had?

Mr. HALE. I take a deep interest in the gentleman's argument, and if he does not take offense, I would like to ask him a question.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I will yield to the gentleman with pleasure.

Mr. HALE. As I understand the drift of the gentleman's argument now, it is that Congress may lawfully enact to-day forfeiture of citizenship as a penalty for having been engaged in the rebellion against the Government. I believe I am correct in that understanding. Then I submit whether there is not another difficulty in the case, which is simply this: that by another express provision of the Constitution, which he has omitted to notice, he is again precluded, for the imposition of a new penalty, for any crime whatsoever, committed before the passage of the act is expressly and directly within the definition of an ex post facto law; and whether it is not thereby forbidden by the Constitution of the United States, just as effectually as bills of attainder. I do not propose to argue or elaborate my suggestion. If to-day we may by legislation enact the penalty of the loss of citizenship for rebellion or disloyalty, may we not by the same operation enact another or different penalty before the passage of the act?

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman knows, of course, that no law is ex post facto which is not both a criminal law and one punishing an act in a manner in which it was not punishable when it was done. But he forgets what has so abundantly appeared already in what I have said, that the high obligations of citizenship are not created by criminal laws, but arise out of that reciprocal, civil, and political contract of the common and international law which these denominate "allegiance," "the bond," "the ligament." He forgets that the obligations of these and the penalties which their violation brings to the violator, all existed when these men discarded their allegiance, and that the forfeiture, on their part, of rights then accrued. For this Government now to accept and by law declare that forfeiture thus already accrued, is neither attaching new penalties to an act nor punishing crime, as such, at all. The obligations of citizenship are as old as the Government; as old as any Government. They arise not at all out of any criminal law. Their violation is a violation of civil and political obligations, and works a forfeiture of the right to demand national protection and rights, as well where there is no law defining or punishing the act, either as treason or as any other crime; and also as well where the act of forfeiture is no defined crime (such as abandoning country to avoid defending it) as where it is treason. When, through Mr. Webster, this Government withheld from Thresher the rights of an American citizen to demand the Government's protection, and thus forfeited the highest rights of the citizen, the Government did not thereby impose new or ex post facto punishment, because that no law existed prohibiting the acts (which worked the forfeiture) of going abroad and engaging in the Lopez expedition. Of course these forfeitures by act of law ought never be resorted to except where the abjuration of allegiance is open and notorious; and then should not be extended to forfeiture of property, but only, as in Thresher's case, to withholding political power and protection.

But, sir, I go on. From the day of its birth to this hour your Government has by acts of Congress both asserted and exercised this identical power for which I argue. These acts bear date respectively April 14, 1862, and March 29, 1790, and were signed by Washington and Jefferson. These acts all expressly provide that no person proscribed by any of these State laws to which I have alluded shall ever be admitted to become citizens of the United States without the assent of the States.

These acts of Congress are not pointed to as cases where the acts themselves first worked the forfeiture, for that was done by the State laws proscribing the traitors. But I do refer to them for the supremely important purpose of showing that it has stood for seventy-seven years as an unquestioned and unreversed judgment of the nation, that it is right and wise perpetually to deprive, by mere act of law, and without trial or conviction for any offense, men who are open and notorious rebels of all such rights and powers of citizenship as the public safety requires to be withheld or forfeited; and this, too, as against natives of this country who have never left it.

These laws were passed by the men who made your Constitution. They have remained upon your statute-book, and have been enforced throughout every day of your national existence. To-day they remain there, standing almost alone now, of all the statutes of our natal era, witnesses of that strange sagacity, genius, and power which conceived and planned and reared the awful structures of the Republic, and which started that Republic down through the ages upon its career of power and grandeur. There stand these statutes yet, like sentinels with swords of flame at gate of Eden, guarding the entrance to our national fellowship and power; and like monuments, too, of the wisdom of the Government's authors. These monuments of the nation's origin are now covered with the gray mosses of near a hundred years, and three generations of the nation's children have passed to the dead beneath their shade. And still they stand there to-day, their foundations resting upon the granites, justice and law, upon which lie, in eternal repose, the deep foundations of the Republic itself. And all over them, from base to summit, is written in characters as plain as those traced "by the fingers of a man's hand over against the candlestick upon the plaster of the wall of the King's palace," that truth, upon which all human government is founded, and upon which stands the government of God, that true allegiance and fidelity to Government is the only foundation of Government that can be; and that men fall from citizenship by the same "sin by which fell the angels."

But, Mr. Speaker, I quit this presentation of the authorities by pointing my countrymen, and you, fellow-members of this House, to the last and most terrible years of your life. In those fearful events which have been around you, and when good men had forgotten the partisan in the patriot, and when they were grasping with the awful energies of despair for the wisest and best means of national existence, you have again and again reenacted these principles of the Revolution; and your acts of Congress bear the now immortal signature of your honored and lamented President. Oh, how lamented now! By mere acts of law you have confiscated lands; you have deprived of power to hold office; you have deprived of the power to vote; and have wholly forfeited every quality of citizenship. The act of March 3, 1865, is an exercise of the very right of forfeiture without trial for which I argue. That act provides that—

"All persons who have deserted the military or naval service of the United States"—

And who do not report for duty within a prescribed time—

"shall be deemed and taken to have voluntarily relinquished and forfeited the rights of citizenship, and their right to become citizens; and such deserters shall be forever incapable of holding any office of trust or profit under the United States or of exercising any right of citizenship."

Unless somebody shall hereafter appear in the world strong enough to show that to desert our armies is a higher offense against the duties of citizenship and a plainer relinquishment and forfeiture of its rights than four years of war against the nation's existence is, then this law will stand as a practical assertion, exercise, and application of all the national powers of self-preservation for which I contend.

Mr. Speaker, I here quit my great theme, recommending to my fellow-members and to this great people to complete the argument upon the elements and forces of which I have scarcely entered. But, sir, even in what I have so poorly said, the right of this nation to enact a law to exclude from the high powers of the nation them who, by treason, have become its enemies, and not its citizens, is seen to be established, nay, sir, irresistibly established, by the very nature of all government; by the combined forces of reason, justice, and public virtue; by the very terms, nature, and origin of citizenship; by the paramount allegiance owed by the people to the Government of the United States as the "supreme law of the land;" by the precepts of the international law; by the usages of all other civilized nations, and by the unvarying practices of your own.

Sir, if indeed it be so that all these are not enough to establish as among the powers of our great and beloved but most injured Government, the merest right of self-defense, and if indeed the chief architects of that ruin of States, which lies there before you yet, almost unalleviated; if the chief actors of this crime, a crime whose infernal shades and glares are, in all the long future, to at once darken and show all that is bad in human history; if all these chiefs of human infamy, with blood-drops dripping from every finger's end, and from "each particular hair;" if these men, unrepentant, un-aneled, "no reckoning made," may stalk back, not to ordinary rights of citizenship merely, but to the higher, grander powers of electors of this mighty nation; nay, may come here into the very sanctuary of the nation's life, and to liberty's last retreat, and may come, too, as the rulers of the Republic, and all this in defiance of all power in the Government to forbid it, then, sir, have the precepts of all reason, all law, all morality, all history, all experience, and all common justice been discarded in the making of your Government; and then I turn away from looking at my country's future in anguish, in despair of the Republic.

But, Mr. Speaker, it is not so. Your country and mine has the power to be, and the Republic will live.

Mr. SCOFIELD obtained the floor.

Mr. HALE. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to yield to me for about five minutes. I do not think I will occupy more than that.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I yield to the gentleman on condition that I do not lose my right to the floor.

Mr. HALE. I do not wish, Mr. Speaker, to put myself in the position of the immortal gentleman to whom Goldsmith alluded in his "Retaliation," who only thought of convincing while others thought of dining, but I do beg the privilege of calling the attention of the gentleman who has just taken his seat, and who has made an argument which for elaborateness, learning, and fairness I have seldom heard equaled in this House, and in which I have been greatly interested, to one or two points.

In regard to the proposition I made that the legislation which he proposes partakes of the nature of an ex post facto law, I submit it is not an answer to say simply, that section has nothing to do with the case. It is proposed by him, as a penalty of treason and rebellion, that these men shall, by legislation of Congress at this day, be deprived of certain rights. I say that by all legal definition it is an ex post facto law and nothing else.

Another point; in regard to the statutes passed by Congress since the rebellion, the act of 1864, and others to which he has alluded, I submit to the gentleman, and I know his own fairness will lead him to the same conclusion, that every one of those laws was prospective in its operation and not retrospective or retroactive. The law of 1864, which the gentleman read, about deserters, in which he emphasized the word

"have"—"those who have deserted or may desert"—has that word inserted in it for the express purpose of protecting it from the character of a retroactive law. It speaks of those who shall not return to their allegiance by a day fixed, making the prospective commission of the crime of desertion as the thing to be punished, and not the past offense.

A single word more and I have done. I believe I hold the crimes of rebellion and treason in as great detestation and horror as it is possible for a man to do. But there is one thing that I dread in this country more than armed rebellion, more than treason, and that is, to see true, honest, loyal, strong men of the nation, like the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SHELLABARGER,] in their zeal to put their condemnation upon the crime of treason, override, or seek to override, the plain and palpable provisions of the Constitution.

I regret that I am not prepared to go through with the gentleman's argument and point out where it seems to me he has departed from the true constitutional ground. I hope to be able to make that effort at some early day.

Mr. SCOTFIELD resumed the floor, but yielded to Mr. WARNER, who moved that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at five o'clock and twenty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule and referred to the appropriate committees: By Mr. DELANO: The petition of L. C. Vernon, M. D., and others, of Muskingum county, Ohio, asking a revision of duties on foreign drugs and medicines.

Also, the petition of William Wolfe, and Henry Howe, and 200 others, citizens of Ohio, praying an increased duty on foreign wools, and the protection of the wool-growers of the country.

By Mr. WILLIAMS: The petition of wool-growers of Butler county, Pennsylvania, asking for increase of duty on foreign wools.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, April 23, 1866.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. H. GRAY. The Journal of Friday last was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, transmitting, in answer to the resolution of the Senate of the 8th of January last, a communication from the Secretary of War, covering copies of the correspondence respecting General Order No. 17, issued by the commander of the department of California, and also the Attorney General's opinion as to the question whether the order involves a breach of neutrality toward Mexico; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SUMNER. I offer the petition of Mary Johnson, of Norfolk, in Virginia, in which she sets forth sundry losses growing out of the rebellion, and asks that Congress will take her case into consideration and provide some indemnity for her. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. I also offer the petition of F. C. Treadwell, sr., who will be remembered by many in former years as a lecturer on the Constitution of the United States, and an eminent jurist, in which he calls upon Congress to extend the right of suffrage to every person eligible to an elective office in the Union, and insists that the power of Congress on that matter is complete. I move the reference of this petition to the joint committee on reconstruction.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CHANDLER presented a petition of the members of the first Michigan cavalry, praying that soldiers discharged in Utah Territory, and not furnished transportation, may be paid their actual traveling expenses to their homes; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Michigan, praying for a grant of land to aid in the construction of a railroad from Saginaw to some point on Lake Michigan, in the direction of Bay de Noquette, and in the Grand Traverse region; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. MORGAN. I have received a petition from the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York, in which they express the opinion that the bill (S. No. 233) now before the Senate of the United States, being a bill in relation to the appointment of enlisted persons at the Naval Academy, and for other purposes, is, in the judgment of the chamber, calculated to improve the character and efficiency of our seamen. They therefore respectfully ask Congress to enact that bill into a law. I ask its reference to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

It was so referred.

Mr. HOWE presented a petition of citizens of Columbia county, Wisconsin, praying for an increase of the duties on wool imported into this country; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of the common council of the city of Green Bay, a petition of citizens of Green Bay, and also a petition of citizens of Appleton, in the State of Wisconsin, praying for the improvement of the harbor at the mouth of Fox river, in that State; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HENDRICKS presented a petition of mechanics and laborers of Indianapolis, Indiana, setting forth that the present tariff does not afford them sufficient protection, and praying that the duties on imports may be increased so as to afford better protection to American industry; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. VAN WINKLE presented the petition of John Gordon, praying compensation for services rendered as messenger in the Post Office Department; which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. WILLEY presented the memorial of Sarah A. Monroe, widow and relict of Rev. T. H. W. Monroe, praying for compensation for services rendered by her husband as chaplain in East Washington Methodist Episcopal church hospital; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. RAMSEY presented two petitions of citizens of Blue Earth county, Minnesota, praying for an equalization of bounties to volunteers in the late war; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Finance, communicating a statement relative to the apportionment of the national currency; which was ordered to be printed.

PRINTING OF A BILL.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, it was Ordered, That the bill (S. No. 207) to provide for the equalization of the bounties to soldiers in the late war of rebellion be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. ANTHONY, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a joint resolution (S. R. No. 63) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to exchange or dispose of certain odd volumes of congressional documents, and other odd volumes, reported it with amendments.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to whom was referred the petition of Joseph Nock, praying for the payment to him of damages arising from the annulling of his contract for supplying the Post Office Department with mail locks and key, and also for the use of his patent for the construction of mail locks, submitted a report accompanied by a joint resolution (S. R. No. 71) referring the petition and papers in the case of Joseph Nock to the Court of Claims. The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC LANDS IN NEVADA.

Mr. STEWART. I am instructed by the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was recommended the bill (S. No. 215) concerning certain lands granted to the State of Nevada, to report it back with amendments. I ask for the present consideration of the bill; it is a short one, and is approved by the committee and by the General Land Office.

By unanimous consent, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The first amendment reported by the Committee on Public Lands was so to amend the first section as to make it read as follows:

That the appropriation by the constitution of the State of Nevada to educational purposes of the five hundred thousand acres of land granted to said State by the law of September 4, 1841, for purposes of internal improvement is hereby approved and confirmed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in the third line of the second section to insert the word "hereby" before "granted;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That land equal in amount to seventy-two entire sections, for the establishment and maintenance of a university in said State, is hereby granted to the State of Nevada.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the words "anno domini" in the second line of the third section, so as to make that section read as follows:

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the grant made by law of the 2d day of July, 1862, to each State, of land equal to thirty thousand acres for each of its Senators and Representatives in Congress, is extended to the State of Nevada; and the diversion of the proceeds of these lands in Nevada from the teaching of agriculture and mechanic arts to that of the theory and practice of mining is allowed and authorized without causing a forfeiture of said grant.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the fourth section of the bill, and in lieu of it to insert the following:

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint a surveyor general for Nevada, who shall locate his office at such place as the Secretary of the Interior shall from time to time direct, whose compensation shall be $3,000 per annum, and whose duties, powers, obligations, responsibilities and allowances for clerk hire, office rent, fuel, and incidental expenses shall be the same as those of the surveyor general of Oregon, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, and such instructions as he may from time to time deem it advisable to give him.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the fifth section, and in lieu of it to insert the following:

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That in extending the surveys of the public lands in the State of Nevada, the Secretary of the Interior may, in his discretion, vary the lines of the subdivisions from a rectangular form, to suit the circumstances of the country; but in all cases lands valuable for mines of gold, silver, quicksilver, or copper shall be reserved from sale.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add the following as a new section:

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That until the State of Nevada shall have received her full quota of lands named in the first, second, and third sections of this act, the public lands in that State shall not be subject to entry, sale, or location under any law of the United States or any scrip or warrants issued in pursuance of any such law except the homestead act of May 20, 1862, and acts amendatory thereto, but shall be reserved exclusively for entry and sale by the said State for the period of two years after such survey shall have been made.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WADE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 280) to repeal an act entitled "An act to retrocede the county of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia, to the State of Virginia," and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WILLEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 281) to authorize the Chesapeake Bay and Potomac River Tide Water Canal Company to enter the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

NITRO-GLYCERINE.

Mr. CONNESS. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be directed to inquire into the necessity of prohibiting the importation of nitro-glycerine, its transportation on American vessels, or by land within the United States, and its manufacture in the United States; and that the committee report by bill or otherwise.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. CONNESS. I have received this morning by the telegraph, from the Chamber of Commerce of San Francisco, the result of a special meeting called by that body in relation to this subject, which I ask to have read at the desk. It is addressed to Congress.

The Secretary read, as follows:

"At a special meeting of San Francisco Chamber of Commerce, the following action was taken:

"Whereas several fatal accidents have lately taken place from the terrible explosive properties of nitro-glycerine, a substance whose full powers seem yet imperfectly understood, even by experienced chemists, whereby great loss of life and property have resulted: Therefore, desiring to prevent further calamity,

"Be it resolved, That the president of this chamber be instructed to telegraph Congress requesting immediate legislation for the protection of life and property from dangers connected with nitro-glycerine.

"Resolved, That this chamber recommend the immediate passage of a law, under a suspension of the rules, constituting the shipment or transportation of nitro-glycerine by any public conveyance within the United States or by any vessel of the United States a felony."

Mr. CONNESS. I also hold in my hand a letter from a prominent gentleman of the city of New York, a small portion only of which I will read in this connection, showing the importance of as immediate action as can be taken on the subject, and I desire to call the attention of the honorable chairman of the Committee on Commerce to it, that he may, at the earliest moment of time, report upon it. This gentleman says:

"The fearful explosion and loss of life in San Francisco, of which we have received but brief accounts per telegraph, has been preceded by one still more dreadful at Aspinwall, of which your morning papers will give you the particulars, both caused by the same powerful and dangerous explosive material, namely, blasting oil, or nitro-glycerine. These two fearful calamities, following each other in quick succession, have caused much alarm here, especially as it is known that a considerable quantity of the article is now in our public warehouses."

He then alludes to former legislation regulating explosives by Congress, and continues:

"I am well informed that Austria has such a law. The inventor himself is ignorant of many of the means which cause its explosion. A person is now on his way to San Francisco with a package containing some twenty-five pounds in his state-room, a quantity sufficient to blow the ship to atoms. Other parties are known to be traveling with it in their carpet-bags on our railroads. Will you move in this matter? It is a most important one, in which the public is deeply interested."

"WILLIAM A. BAYLEY."

I desire this paper to be referred to the committee, with extracts from papers throwing some light on the material of nitro-glycerine, and also a pamphlet issued by the parties who have undertaken its circulation and introduction into use in the United States. It appears that there is a stock company being organized in New York, with a capital of $1,000,000, for the purpose of manufacturing in the United States and introducing this terrible explosive into general use. The pamphlet also contains an extensive dissertation on the article. All these papers I desire to have referred, with the resolution, to the Committee on Commerce.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the resolution.

The resolution was adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the papers accompanying the resolution be also referred to the Committee on Commerce. That order will be made, if there be no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. LLOYD, Chief Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had passed the bill (S. No. 146) for the relief of Thomas F. Wilson, late United States consul at Bahia, Brazil.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution; which were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. No. 89) to issue American registers to the steam vessels Michigan, Despatch, and William K. Muir, and for other purposes;

A bill (S. No. 150) for the relief of Theodor G. Eiswald; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 29) for the transfer of funds appropriated for the payment of salaries in the Post Office Department to the general salary account of that Department.

INTER-STATE INTERCOURSE.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move to take up House bill No. 11, to facilitate commercial, postal, and military communication among the several States.

Mr. JOHNSON. The Senator from Maine who is not in his seat, [Mr. MORRILL,] and has been absent on business three or four days, is very desirous of being heard on that bill. He is a member of the committee before whom the bill has been pending. I submit, therefore, to the Senator from Michigan whether he had better not let it lie upon the table until his return. I understand he will be here to-morrow or next day. A delay of a few days can make but very little difference, I suppose, in the result of the measure one way or the other. I know that the Senator from Maine is very desirous of laying before the Senate the views which he wishes to present on the subject.

Mr. CHANDLER. I should like to go on with the discussion of this bill; I do not know that we shall arrive at a vote to-day. I am aware that the Senator from Maine proposes to discuss the bill; but I desire to arrive at a vote as soon as possible. It has now been before the Senate for three successive sessions, and most of those who desire to speak on it have spoken; but I understand some, among others the Senator from Maryland, desire to make speeches on the bill, and I should like to progress as far as possible to-day, and I shall press it to a vote as early as practicable.

Mr. JOHNSON. I was unable to hear the honorable member.

Mr. CHANDLER. I say I should like to have the discussion go on to-day and arrive at a vote as soon as possible. I understand there are several members prepared to make speeches now, and I desire to press for a vote at the earliest possible moment. It has now been before the Senate, as I observed, for three successive sessions, all of the last Congress and the whole of this session, and I presume every member is prepared to vote upon it.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not know—certainly that is not my purpose now—that I shall discuss the measure at all; but I know that the Senator from Maine is very anxious to be heard upon the subject before a vote is taken. I am not aware that there is any other member of the Senate who proposes to debate it.

Mr. CHANDLER. I then move that it be made the special order for one o'clock on Wednesday next, the day after to-morrow—that it be postponed until Wednesday at one o'clock and made the special order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That motion is not in order, as the bill is not yet before the Senate.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move to take it up for that purpose.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am told that the honorable Senator from Maine is not likely to be here until Thursday.

Mr. CHANDLER. Well, I will say Thursday.

Mr. JOHNSON. Say Friday.

Mr. CHANDLER. I am told he will be here on Wednesday, and therefore I will move to make it the special order for Thursday. My first motion is that the bill be taken up.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CHANDLER. I now move that the bill be postponed until Thursday next at one o'clock and made the special order for that hour.

Mr. CLARK. I appeal to the Senator from Michigan to let it go over a day or two beyond that time. I know that the Senator from Maine expected to be back before this time, but he has been unexpectedly delayed and may be delayed until Thursday or Friday.

Mr. CHANDLER. If he is not present, I shall consent to a further postponement.

Mr. CLARK. That will be satisfactory.

Mr. CHANDLER. Let it be made the special order for Thursday with that understanding. The motion was agreed to.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that we proceed to the consideration of the Post Office appropriation bill, with a view to dispose of the pending amendment to it.

Mr. HOWE. I suggest to the Senator from Ohio that he let that go over until one o'clock, and let us go on with a few private bills in the mean time.

The motion of Mr. SHERMAN was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 280) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867, and for other purposes.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Wisconsin appeals to me to allow this bill to go over until one o'clock. I am willing to consent to have it laid aside informally until that time, as I understand there is no special order for one o'clock to-day, but I desire to have this bill disposed of to-day.

Mr. HOWE. I should like to have the bill laid aside informally with a view to proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 472.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection, as I said before, to letting the appropriation bill lie over informally until one o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be laid aside by common consent until one o'clock.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I think the Senator from Ohio is mistaken; there is a special order for one o'clock; the bill for the relief of contractors in the Navy was the special order for one o'clock. It was so made the other day, and I supposed it continued as such.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is in the Calendar of special orders, but does not stand assigned as a special order for to-day.

Mr. HENDRICKS. It was assigned the other day as a special order, and was then passed over informally.

Mr. SHERMAN. I believe we can dispose of the Post Office bill in a short time.

Mr. CLARK. I suggest to the Senator from Indiana that the bill to which he refers was not passed over informally, but was superseded by a previous special order, the unfinished business of the day before, so that it has lost its place as a special order.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I ask the Chair if that be the effect.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It stands in the list of special orders but will not come up necessarily at one o'clock to-day. Having been superseded by the unfinished business of a former day it stands on the Calendar among the special orders but is not to be called up at one o'clock as a special order, not having been assigned for that hour to-day.

Mr. HOWE. I understand that there is no objection to letting the Post Office bill be laid aside.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If no objection be made that bill will be laid aside informally.

GEORGE R. FRANK.

Mr. HOWE. That being done, I move to proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 472.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 472) for the relief of George R. Frank, late captain in the thirty-third regiment Wisconsin volunteer infantry, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to direct the Paymaster General of the United States Army to settle and pay out of any money appropriated, or hereafter to be appropriated for the payment of the Army, the account of George R. Frank, late a captain in the thirty-third regiment of Wisconsin volunteer infantry, for his services, and all allowances as captain in that regiment, in the service of the United States, from the date of his last payment to the time of the final muster out and payment of the regiment, the same as though he had not been mustered out as captain for the purpose of being mustered in as major or otherwise.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NAVY PAY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. GRIMES. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 197, to provide for the better organization of the pay department of the Navy.

Mr. SHERMAN. That will take considerable time, I fear. I therefore hope the regular order will be proceeded with.

Mr. GRIMES. If it does take time, let it come up again to-morrow in the morning hour. We can go on with it until one o'clock now.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to that.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which provides that hereafter the active list of the pay corps of the Navy shall consist of eighty paymasters, forty passed assistant paymasters, and thirty assistant paymasters. Paymasters are to be regularly promoted and commissioned from passed assistant paymasters, and passed assistant paymasters from assistant paymasters, subject to such examinations as are required by law, and such as may be established by the Secretary of the Navy. Passed assistant paymasters are to give bonds for the faithful performance of their duties in the sum of $15,000, and their annual pay is to be, at sea, $1,500; on other duty, $1,400; on leave or waiting orders, $1,200.

The Committee on Naval Affairs proposed to amend the bill by inserting after the words "assistant paymasters," in line eight of section one, the following words:

And all passed assistant paymasters authorized by this act to be appointed who have not heretofore been appointed and commissioned as assistant paymasters, and all assistant paymasters hereby authorized to be appointed, shall be selected from those who have served as acting assistant paymasters for the term of two years, and who were eligible to appointment in that grade when they were appointed acting assistant paymasters as aforesaid.

Mr. GRIMES. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the words "two years" and inserting "one year."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GRIMES. In order to make it more specific I propose, at the end of the amendment, to strike out "that" before "grade," and insert "the;" and after "grade" to insert "of assistant paymasters;" so that the clause will read:

All assistant paymasters hereby authorized to be appointed shall be selected from those who have served as acting assistant paymasters for the term of one year, and who were eligible to appointment in the grade of assistant paymasters when they were appointed acting assistant paymasters as aforesaid.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to. Mr. SHERMAN. This bill, I believe, changes the pay of all the officers of the Navy. I have not had time to look into it.

Mr. GRIMES. Not at all. It regulates the pay department, and merely creates a few more paymasters and makes a new grade of acting assistant paymasters.

Mr. SHERMAN. This, then, is not a bill to change the pay?

Mr. GRIMES. Oh, no.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then I have nothing to say about it.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. It was ordered that the amendment be engrossed and the bill read a third time. The bill was read the third time and passed.

• WILLIAM PIERCE.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 231.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 231) for the relief of William Pierce was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to issue to William Pierce duplicates of the following-described bonds of the United States of America, Treasury Department, for the Oregon war debt, issued by the United States under an act of Congress approved March 2, 1861, payable at any time after the 1st of July, 1881, at the Treasury of the United States, with interest at the rate of six per cent. per annum, namely: No. 679, No. 682, No. 681, and No. 270, with coupons attached; the first three bonds being for the sum of $100 each, and the last named being for $50, each of them being signed L. E. Chittenden, Register of the Treasury, and each of the coupons attached being signed by G. Luff; but before the issue of the new duplicate bonds William Pierce is to execute and deposit with the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, to the full acceptance and satisfaction of the Treasurer, such bond of indemnity as is usually required by the regulations of the Treasury Department for the issue of duplicate certificates of inscribed stock.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Is there a report in this case?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes sir. The bonds were lost by the burning of the steamer Golden Gate. The proof of the loss is as complete as it can be, and the petitioner is to give the bond of indemnity that is usually required by the regulations of the Treasury Department for the issue of duplicate certificates of inscribed stock.

Mr. HOWARD. What was the amount of the bonds lost?

Mr. ANTHONY. Three hundred and fifty dollars.

Mr. CLARK. The case is well proved.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Is this like the case we acted upon the other day?

Mr. ANTHONY. We have passed a number of cases on the same specifications.

Mr. CLARK. The bonds are fully identified and the loss well proved.

Mr. ANTHONY. The report is very short, if Senators desire to have it read, but I think it is unnecessary to read it.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

MRS. JERUSHA WITTER.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I ask the Senate to take up for consideration Senate bill No. 276.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 276) for the relief of Mrs. Jerusha Witter, was read a second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Mrs. Jerusha Witter, widow of Dr. Amos Witter, late surgeon of the seventh regiment Iowa infantry volunteers, on the pension-roll, at the rate of twenty-five dollars per month, to commence from the date of her application for a pension, and to continue during her widowhood.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SHERMAN. I now call for the regular order.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 280) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department during the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1867, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. HENDERSON to add the following as an additional section:

SEC. —. And be it further enacted, That in all cases in which persons have been appointed, either during the recess or during the session of the Senate, as assistant postmasters or other civil officers under the Government, whose appointments require the consent of the Senate, and whose appointments, having been submitted to the Senate, have been rejected or not consented to before the adjournment thereof, no money shall be drawn from the Treasury, or used from any fund or appropriation made or created by law, to pay the salaries of such persons under such appointments, or under any previous appointment to the same office, for services rendered after said adjournment. And if any such person shall, after such adjournment, be appointed to the same office, no money shall be drawn or used as aforesaid to pay his salary until his appointment shall have been consented to by the Senate at its succeeding session.

Mr. JOHNSON. When the amendment now before the Senate was offered, I suggested to the Senate and to the mover of the amendment that it was perhaps doubtful whether we had the power to pass a law of that kind. The Government have acted under the belief, founded upon the advice that they have received from the law officer of the Government, on several occasions, that a commission issued by the President during a recess of the Senate, when he has clearly the authority to appoint, continues to the end of the next succeeding session of Congress or of the Senate, whether or not the nomination of the particular officer has in the mean time been by the Senate rejected, they being of opinion—and I certainly am not prepared to say that they are wrong—that the power conferred upon the President is a power which Congress cannot directly take away. However it might be if the provision was a prospective one, yet if the true meaning of those commissions is, that they continue until the end of the succeeding session, the party who may be in office under the commission is entitled to be paid; and the fact, therefore, of the adoption of this amendment, if that is the condition of the officer, if he has the right to his salary which the appointment gives him, will be, virtually, to repudiate an obligation which the Government has contracted. From the reading of the amendment at the desk, I suppose it goes to that extent. I submit, therefore, to the honorable member from Missouri whether he had not better modify it, if it is to pass at all, so as to clear it of all constitutional difficulty, and above all to clear it from a result which would seem to me to be apparent, that the Senate are sanctioning a repudiation of obligations properly contracted by the Government through the President.

The honorable member suggests to me that I have not properly apprehended the extent of his amendment. What I have said was said on what I supposed it to be as it was read from the desk. I have the amendment now in my hand, and I will read it for the purpose of ascertaining whether I have properly apprehended it. It is:

SEC. —. And be it further enacted, That in all cases in which persons have been appointed, either during the recess or during the session of the Senate, as assistant postmasters or other civil officers under the Government, whose appointments require the consent of the Senate, and whose appointments, having been submitted to the Senate, have been rejected or not consented to before the adjournment thereof, no money shall be drawn from the Treasury, or used from any fund or appropriation made or created by law, to pay the salaries of such persons under such appointments, or under any previous appointment to the same office, for services rendered after said adjournment. And if any such person shall, after such adjournment, be appointed to the same office, no money shall be drawn or used as aforesaid to pay his salary until his appointment shall have been consented to by the Senate at its succeeding session.

The latter part of the amendment was not in the section as originally proposed. I think that has been added at the suggestion of my friend from Illinois, the chairman of the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. HENDERSON. No, sir. He suggested something of the sort.

Mr. JOHNSON. He suggested it and you adopted it. So far as the latter part of the amendment is concerned, it goes to this extent, that the President has no authority to appoint to the same office any one whose nomination has been rejected by the Senate. That has been done from time immemorial, and nobody has ever questioned the authority to appoint. There is nothing in the Constitution which limits the power of the President to appoint whoever he pleases. You may by law, perhaps, provide by way of punishment in certain cases that no one shall be appointed to office; but in the absence of any particular law excluding any particular man from the right to hold an office if he is appointed, the President's authority is just as absolute to appoint in a case where his nomination of the same man has been rejected as it is in the first instance to appoint him originally. I do not think I can be mistaken as to this. Whether the President should appoint is quite another matter; whether he should not show that respect to the Senate of not acting in relation to an appointment of this description which the Senate have refused to advise is an entirely different inquiry.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator from Maryland will allow me to suggest that that is not the point which I made. I do not doubt that, as a question of power, the President may continue to send in the nomination of the same person after he has been rejected. As to the propriety of doing so, that is another thing; but as a mere question of power, as the Senator from Maryland well says, he may select whom he pleases where he has the power to make the appointment. But the point which I made was that where a vacancy existed while the Senate was in session, it was not competent for the President to make any appointment after the Senate adjourned. The Constitution authorizes the President to appoint men to office by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and a subsequent clause of the Constitution authorizes the President to commission officers to fill vacancies which may occur during the recess of the Senate, whose commissions shall expire at the end of the next session of the Senate. Now, it does seem to me very clear under this provision of the Constitution as an original question, that the vacancy must happen during the recess of the Senate to authorize the President to fill it at all. This is the exact provision:

"The President shall have power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate, by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session."

When can the President fill up a vacancy by granting a commission which shall expire at the end of the then next session of the Senate? Clearly when a vacancy happens during a recess. Now, can it be said that a vacancy happens during a recess which existed when the Senate was in session? By way of illustration, there is a vacancy upon the supreme bench, which occurred, I think, since the last adjournment of the Senate. Suppose the President of the United States had omitted to fill that vacancy, to send in a nomination to the Senate until the Senate closed its present session, would it be contended that the President after the Senate had adjourned could commission a man as a justice of the Supreme Court, to hold his commission until the end of the next session of the Senate afterward? Would that be a vacancy which happened during the recess?

The intention of the framers of the Constitution was that all officers, saving some minor appointments which might be made by the heads of Departments in pursuance of laws which should be passed, should be made by the nomination of the President with the advice and consent of the Senate. The framers of the Constitution intended that all the officers of this Government should be appointed by the concurrent action of the President and Senate; but the Senate not being always in session, and vacancies liable to occur at any time, it was necessary to provide some means by which the offices might be filled; hence this other clause was inserted to allow the President, when a vacancy happened in the recess of the Senate, to fill it by a temporary appointment or commission. It is not called an appointment at all, it is called the granting of a commission for a person to exercise the duties of that office until the end of the next session of the Senate, so as to afford an opportunity for the President and the Senate together to fill the office in the proper mode contemplated by the general provision of the Constitution.

Now, I suppose in speaking of this amendment immediately before the Senate, it is entirely competent to provide that no person shall be paid who is commissioned to discharge the duties of an office during the recess in case of a vacancy which has not happened during the recess. I beg pardon for saying so much in interruption of the Senator from Maryland. I really forgot that I was speaking on an interruption.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am very much obliged to the honorable member; he requires no apology; and I have an answer to each of the questions which his remarks suggest. The first is that the construction of the clause of the Constitution to which he has referred, has been before the executive branch of the Government frequently, and that construction from the first period when it was presented has, as I think, been uniform. The law officers of the Government have considered the word "happen" as used in the part of the Constitution adverted to by my friend from Illinois, as meaning "existing," independent of the cause of the vacancy. The object is to keep the Government in operation, to keep in existence all officers whom the Constitution deems necessary to carry on the Government; and if, therefore, from any cause, no matter what, a vacancy in them exists at any time when the Senate is not in session, the Executive has the authority to fill it. I have by me one of the several opinions upon that subject. The one that I have before me was given by Mr. Wirt when he was Attorney General, as far back as 1823. In it he says:

"I find that General Swartwout's commission as Navy agent at New York, expired during the last session of the Senate. Your nomination of another person to fill that vacancy was not confirmed by the Senate, and the vacancy still exists."

What was to be done? Could the office be filled, the Senate having adjourned and the vacancy having existed during the session of the Senate? He goes on to say:

"It is the case, then, of a vacancy which arose during the session of the Senate, but which, from the circumstance that has been mentioned, continues to exist in the recess. The question on which you ask my opinion is, whether, under the Constitution, you can fill the vacancy by a commission to expire at the end of the next session?"

The provisions of the Constitution on this subject are—

"1. That the President shall nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint, all officers, &c.

"2. That the President shall have power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate, by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session."

Had this vacancy first occurred during the recess of the Senate, no doubt would have arisen as to the President's power to fill it. The doubt arises from the circumstance of its having first occurred during the session of the Senate. But the expression used by the Constitution is "happen;" all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate. The most natural sense of this term is "to chance—to fall out—to take place by accident." But the expression seems not perfectly clear. It may mean happen to take place; that is, "to originate," under which sense the President would not have the power to fill the vacancy. It may mean, also, without violence to the sense, "happen to exist;" under which sense the President would have the right to fill it by his temporary commission. Which of these two senses is to be preferred? The first seems to me most accordant with the letter of the Constitution; the second most accordant with its reason and spirit."

He goes into a long argument to show that that is under all the circumstances the proper construction.

Mr. SUMNER. Whose opinion is that?

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Wirt's, and the same opinion has been given by several others. He comes to this conclusion:

"The construction which I prefer is perfectly innocent. It cannot possibly produce mischief without imputing to the President a degree of turpitude entirely inconsistent with the character which his office implies, as well as with the high responsibility and short tenure annexed to that office, while at the same time it insures to the public the accomplishment of the object to which the Constitution so sedulously looks—that the offices connected with their peace and safety be regularly filled."

That is to say, filled at all times. The honorable member from Illinois, therefore, perhaps, (certainly, if this construction given to the clause by Mr. Wirt is the correct one,) is in error in supposing that a vacancy which exists during the recess of the Senate may not be filled by the President during the subsequent recess of the body. But if the honorable member is right, the amendment which he proposes to this bill, and which the member from Missouri has adopted, would still be liable to objection. The uniform decision of the office has been that appointments made by the President during the recess, as to the authority to make which there of course can be no doubt, for it is communicated to him in express words, are to continue until the termination of the next succeeding session of the Senate. The commission which is given to an officer appointed during the recess is a commission which by its terms is not to expire until the termination of the next succeeding session of the Senate; and it has been held that it does continue until the termination of the next session of the Senate, although the nomination of the same man has been submitted to the Senate and has been rejected by the Senate. That has been the uniform construction of the Government, never, as I believe, questioned. Then what is the result?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not know that the Senator from Maryland was on the Judiciary Committee at the time; but this subject was brought before that committee at a previous session, and very elaborately considered. All these opinions of the Attorneys General which have been given in favor of executive prerogative were examined and reviewed; and the committee unanimously reported on this branch of the subject, that the vacancy must begin to exist during the recess of the Senate to authorize the President to fill it. It is no new question.

Mr. JOHNSON. The honorable member did not hear me. That does not affect the question I am now considering. I answer, whatever may have been the opinion of the Judiciary Committee, by saying that Mr. Wirt, in 1823, gave the opinion which I have just read, and that other Attorneys General since, to whom the question has been submitted, have given the same opinion. But what I said just now, when I was interrupted by the honorable member, was, that the particular construction to which I was then adverting had never been called in question, and had never been before the Judiciary Committee; and it presents the question, how long does a commission issued to a party appointed by the President during the recess, when there is no doubt of his authority to appoint, continue? It continues, according to the uniform construction of the executive, and, so far as I am advised, never questioned by any department of the Government, until the last day of the succeeding session of the Senate.

Mr. HOWARD. That is the exact language of the Constitution.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is the language of the Constitution. That being the case, those postmasters who were appointed during the recess hold commissions that run to the termination of the present session of the Senate. That is clear. If they do, then the vacancy that occurs is a vacancy occurring during recess, because as long as there is a man in office under a commission the office is filled, and there is no vacancy. The vacancy, therefore, begins to exist only at the termination of the next succeeding session of the Senate. Now, I can see—and I saw it when I was a member of the executive—that this may be used so as practically to do away with what was the general practice of the Constitution; but the framers of the Constitution, in words, authorized the President to appoint and to commission parties who were to hold their offices to the very last moment of the session. The object of that was to insure the offices being filled. It seemed, no doubt, it went upon the hypothesis that the President would nominate during the session of the Senate, and in all probability if his nomination of the particular officer was rejected, that he would nominate somebody else, but that until he nominated somebody else, and that other party was confirmed by the Senate, his first appointment remained; or otherwise the office would go unfilled.

I admit with the honorable member from Illinois that I think the President would war as against the spirit of the Constitution, or, rather, would be guilty of an abuse of power, if he designedly kept in office a man whom the Senate had thought proper to reject for reasons which he had no ground to believe would afterward cease to influence the Senate; but it very often happens, or may happen to the Senate—it has happened—that they reject to-day, and find that they have made a mistake, and are willing to confirm to-morrow. The President, therefore, may have reason to believe that an appointee of his, rejected by the Senate, would still, if renominated, not be objectionable to the body; but whether so or not, whether it be an abuse of power or not, is not the question which this amendment suggests. The question is, has he the power? And if he has the power, and he has exercised the power by appointing a particular man to office, that man is entitled to his pay under the Constitution. We have no right to interfere with the power of the President indirectly. We cannot say that he shall not appoint. If that would be nugatory, it is equally improper, I submit to the Senate, to attempt to accomplish the same object indirectly, by providing that although he appoints the appointee shall not be paid. If the Constitution gives to the appointee a right to hold his commission, then the honor of the United States is involved; he ought to be paid; and yet this amendment says that he shall not be paid.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am generally indisposed to legislate on general topics on an appropriation bill; but this amendment of the Senator from Missouri contains two propositions which, I think, are simply declaratory of the existing law; and, to avoid all doubt, they may as well be inserted here. The first proposition declares that if a person who has been appointed during the recess of the Senate, or during the session of the Senate, shall continue to hold his office after the adjournment of the Senate, when he has been rejected by the Senate, he shall not draw any pay therefor. That is a proposition so plain that I think there can be no controversy about it. If a person is appointed during the recess of the Senate his office certainly terminates at the adjournment of the Senate. Is there any doubt about that?

Mr. JOHNSON. No.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then should he receive any pay for services rendered after the adjournment of the Senate? That is the question. I say he should not; and the first proposition contained in this amendment simply provides that if he continues to discharge the duties of the office after the adjournment of the Senate he shall not be paid for that work and labor done by him. That is a very clear proposition, that after his office terminates he should not discharge the duties of the office, and especially should not draw a salary from the Treasury. The second proposition is almost as clear, in my mind, that where the Senate has rejected a particular appointment and the President undertakes to appoint that same person again to the same office, in the face of the rejection by the Senate, that person shall not draw his pay, from any appropriation from the Treasury, until the nomination has been again submitted to the Senate, and has been approved and ratified by it. It seems to me that that is the plain spirit of the Constitution. The President ought not to appoint a person who has been once rejected by the Senate, unless for clear and manifest reasons, and if those reasons are so clear and manifest they should be submitted to the Senate and the Senate would no doubt overrule its previous rejection of the nominee, and the incumbent ought to hold his office subject to that power of the Senate to reject the nomination.

Mr. JOHNSON. Suppose he is rejected on the last day of the session?

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well, then, if he is reappointed his salary ought to be suspended until the Senate have an opportunity to reconsider its rejection. The rejection of the Senate ought at least to have sufficient effect to prevent that person from holding office or drawing pay for such services in that office. That seems to me to be very plain. If, as the Senator from Missouri seems to think, there is danger that the President will, against the rejection of the Senate, appoint the same man to that office, I say that person ought not to receive money from the Treasury until the reappointment is submitted to the Senate and approved by it. With that view, I think, the amendment is carefully worded and will accomplish the purpose.

Mr. HENDERSON. I thank the Senator from Ohio for his defense of this proposition, which I think is perfectly clear, and I have but little to add to what he has said. The proposition seems to me to be perfectly plain. I examined all these opinions of the Attorneys General, and I found, in addition to the opinion referred to by the Senator from Maryland, quite an able opinion given by Mr. Taney, when he was Attorney General, upon the same subject, and sustaining in its position the views taken by Mr. Wirt. It is an opinion given in 1832 upon the appointment of a land officer in Mississippi, where the opinion is again given by that Department of the Government, that where the President appoints, the appointment holds until the last day of the session; and if the session of the Senate shall be adjourned without acting upon the nomination there is a vacancy again. It is contrary to my views of the subject, and yet I find that these opinions have been invariably given as stated by the Senator from Maryland. He is correct in stating that such has been the opinion, I believe, of every Attorney General who has been called upon for an opinion on the subject; but I differ with the Senator from Maryland in the opinion that he has expressed, that this amendment conflicts with that view of the subject. I do not think it has anything to do with it. I have so drawn the amendment as not to run counter to any opinion given by any Attorney General on the subject.

My idea in presenting the amendment is, that if the President shall nominate an officer to the Senate, and the Senate shall act upon it and specifically reject the appointment, and the President insists upon that party holding the office after the adjournment of the Senate, he shall have no salary. I differ with the Senator from Maryland in supposing that if Congress shall not vote to the executive department money, the executive department can continue its operations. I apprehend that Congress, by refusing to grant appropriations in the midst of a most important war, can stop the wheels of Government in that behalf. We can absolutely refuse to grant the means to carry on a war, and it will necessarily cease, provided we should do so. Now, the President makes an appointment. We have to advise and consent to that appointment, or else it is no appointment after the adjournment of the Senate. I grant that the appointment made lasts until the last day of the session; but the Attorneys General say that the President himself, by making another appointment and submitting it to the Senate, destroys the force of the first appointment. I have, therefore, drawn this amendment in reference to that point also. If the President fails to send us another appointment, and after we have rejected his appointment leaves the appointee to hold the office, I say he can legally hold it no longer than the last day of the session, and when that day arrives it is clearly within the power of Congress to say that that man, by virtue of that appointment, or by virtue of any succeeding appointment, shall receive no pay.

The Senator from Maryland, perhaps, is sustained by the opinions of the Attorneys General upon one point, and that is, that a vacancy exists at the adjournment of Congress. Mr. Taney says, otherwise the Government would cease; and, contrary to the expressed opinion of the Senator from Illinois, it has been held, notwithstanding the intervening session of the Senate, that after an appointment has been made, and the Senate has failed to act upon it, at the close of that session there is a vacancy again, and the President may appoint. There is no such constitutional provision. This is merely the construction given by the respective Attorneys General; that is, that a vacancy again occurs, and the Senator from Maryland says that, according to the opinions heretofore given, if a vacancy exists immediately after the adjournment of the Senate, the President can appoint whom he pleases. Very good; I will not take issue with the Senator on that subject; the President may appoint whom he pleases; I only ask the Senate to say that if he does appoint the same individual, that individual shall not be paid; that we will appropriate no money whatever, and give him fair notice of that fact, for the payment of his salary. That seems to me to be but just.

The Senator says the President may appoint whom he pleases, and if we undertake to interfere with that right, we are trespassing on the constitutional right of the executive department. That is the position. Suppose that war exists, and Congress refuses to grant appropriations to carry it on; suppose we declare that a certain individual is not a citizen of the United States by an act of Congress, and the President appoints such an individual, are we bound to pay him? It is very true that the President may appoint; but suppose that the President appoints to a civil office in my State a man who has been convicted of treason, if you please. Under the act which we passed in 1862, he is disqualified from holding office. Let me ask the Senator from Maryland, if the President appoints such an individual, are we bound to appropriate money to pay him?

Mr. JOHNSON. No. He has no right to appoint him.

Mr. HENDERSON. Why has he no right to appoint him? Simply by virtue of the operations of an act of Congress. Then cannot we legitimately pass an act of Congress without a conviction of the individual, declaring that if such and such a person shall be renominated he shall not be paid? I cannot think for a moment that such a power is not lodged in Congress. I cannot realize the fact for a moment that a valid objection can be presented to the amendment. I have given careful attention to all the opinions that have been delivered on this subject, and I do not think that the amendment conflicts in any degree whatever with these opinions.

I desire, while I am up, to amend the amendment in the second line by inserting after the word "been," the words "or shall be," so as to make it apply to the future as well as the past. It was a mere oversight of mine that those words were omitted.

Mr. JOHNSON. How will it read then?

Mr. HENDERSON. In this way:

That in all cases in which persons have been or shall be appointed during the recess or session of the Senate, &c.

It will make it apply in its provisions to the future as well as to the past. I desire also to add several words in the twelfth line of the amendment, so as to obviate an objection that may be presented. I believe no such objection has been presented, but I can see very well that if the appointment shall be made at the very last days of the session of the Senate, and the Senate adjourn without acting upon it, as suggested to me by the Senator from Illinois, some very serious difficulties may arise from the fact that notice has not been communicated to the officer. He may hold on for a month before he really knows that the Senate has rejected his appointment; hence some specific term should be stated within which the salary may continue to be paid after the adjournment of the Senate, and beyond that time it ought not to be paid. I will therefore modify my amendment by inserting after the word "rendered" in the twelfth line, the words "after the expiration of thirty days." That will give ample time for notice to be sent to any part of the United States that the Senate has rejected a nomination, and we shall pay him no salary from the expiration of thirty days from the adjournment.

Mr. JOHNSON. Are those the only modifications that you propose to the amendment?

Mr. HENDERSON. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The modifications named by the Senator from Missouri to his amendment will be made, the amendment being under his own control as yet.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not propose to argue the question again; but I submit to the honorable member from Missouri, and to the member from Ohio, the acting chairman of the Finance Committee, whether if this provision is to pass at all it ought not to be still further modified. The latter part of the amendment says that if any such person, that is, if any person whose nomination has been rejected or upon whose nomination the Senate have not acted, is again appointed to the same office by the President, he is not to be paid. That applies to the two cases of a nomination rejected, and a nomination not acted on. Suppose a nomination comes in a day or two before or the very day the Senate adjourns, or suppose the Senate without any good reason, for want of time, fails to act, or is unwilling to act, it would rather the matter should go over, as has frequently been done, is it necessary, in order to guard against any possible mischief which could result from leaving the President the power to appoint, to attempt to take from him indirectly the power to appoint by providing that the appointee shall not receive his salary? The vacancy may occur the day before, or the very day the Senate is about to adjourn, and he nominates; you cannot act upon it; you adjourn; is the office to remain vacant during the whole time that may intervene between the time of the adjournment and the time of the meeting of the next session?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I beg to suggest to the Senator from Maryland another case. Suppose a person in office should die on the day the Senate adjourns, and no information is received by the President or by Congress, and therefore there could be no action, either by the President or Congress. It is still a vacancy during the session of the Senate, but the President cannot fill the vacancy.

Mr. HENDERSON. This amendment only applies to the appointment of the same person who has once been rejected.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am speaking now, not of your amendment, but of the doctrine held by the Senator from Illinois. Now, the particular inconvenience, and it seems to me, the gross injustice, of a provision of that sort would be avoided by striking out, if the amendment is to be passed at all, in the seventh line the words "or not consented to before the adjournment thereof." It would then read:

And whose appointments having been submitted to the Senate have been rejected, no money shall be drawn from the Treasury, &c.

I agree with the Senator from Ohio that he has no right, under the original appointment of the President, to continue in office after the adjournment, because his commission expires with the adjournment; but the next clause of the amendment deprives the President of the authority to reappoint him. If the words which I have just read be stricken out, the power to reappoint would apply only to those whose nominations have not been acted upon, denying the power to appoint those whose nominations have been rejected. I suppose that will answer the purpose the honorable member has in view.

Mr. HENDERSON. I do not know that I have any serious objection to the modification suggested by the Senator, provided he will make the amendment at the end of line twelve instead of the seventh line. I will insert the words "so rejected by the Senate," at the end of the twelfth line, so that it will read:

And if any such person so rejected by the Senate shall after such adjournment be appointed to the same office, no money shall be drawn, &c.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That modification will be made as suggested by the Senator.

Mr. GUTHRIE. I feel very much indisposed to vote for this amendment in any shape in which it has been put or is likely to be put. The Constitution, which invests the nomination and the appointment in the President, has provided for vacancies which may occur during the recess. The framers of the Constitution knew that this Government in all its branches would require officers necessarily in the different localities to carry it out, and they knew that vacancies would occur when Congress was not in session and when the advice of the Senate could not be taken, and they provided that those vacancies should be filled, and they allowed no restriction upon the President in the selection of the individuals to do it. Now, I think in order that the Government may be carried on and the laws faithfully executed, this provision for appointments during the recess of the Senate was a wise provision and should receive a liberal and fair construction, so that we shall not fail in having officers. In the best light in which this proposition can be put, it is only restricting the President in the appointment of particular individuals. I can understand why the gentleman wants to keep a man who has been rejected by the Senate from receiving pay; but I cannot understand why he should wish to deny pay to the man on whose nomination the Senate have not had time to act, or whom they were not willing to take the responsibility of rejecting, and thus allowed it to go over. It is proposed to restrict the President from appointing him, and to declare that he shall depend upon the will of the Senate at the next session of Congress. I am satisfied there is no just reason for depriving any individual who has been nominated to the Senate for an office, and they have not acted upon the nomination, and he has filled the office and discharged the duty, of his pay.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will state to the Senator that that has been modified so as to confine it only to cases where the officer has been actually rejected by the Senate.

Mr. GUTHRIE. When I read the amendment it was the other way.

Mr. HENDERSON. I have modified it in that respect.

Mr. GUTHRIE. It was liable to the objection, and the whole proposition is distasteful to me, because it strikes at individuals instead of striking at principles. The individuals who are appointed are not to be paid, though they fill the offices and it is within the power of the President, and he is bound to see that these offices are filled, so that the public service may be discharged by competent individuals. It is his duty to do so, and yet by this provision you attempt to restrain him in the discharge of that duty by selecting certain persons and saying if they are appointed they shall not be paid for discharging the duty of the offices. I think we have no right to curtail his power in the premises, and I think we ought not to set the example of thus encroaching upon the President's prerogative of appointment. It looks to me as if we were beginning to make a little war on his appointments before they are made. I do not think that is becoming the Senate. I shall therefore vote against the amendment in all its shapes.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I am quite aware of these opinions of the Attorneys General, commencing back some thirty or forty years ago. The Attorneys General are the appointees of the President, and we know that they hold their offices at his will, and we know that when some persons have filled the presidential office they have not allowed persons to hold Cabinet offices who did not agree with them in opinion. I do not mean to derogate from the high character of the gentlemen who have filled the office of Attorney General in this country. They have been very able men, distinguished men, and they have given opinions upon the clause of the Constitution which I have read, but I really think those opinions will not bear the test of examination. If you bring those opinions to the language of the Constitution, I think you will see that they cannot be sustained. A mistake has arisen in the Senate in supposing that the President can appoint to office at any time. The President cannot appoint an officer either in the recess of the Senate or during the session of the Senate. The Constitution of the United States has not put the appointing power in the President's hands, but it has put it in the hands of the President "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate;" and he can no more appoint an officer without the advice and consent of the Senate than he can make a treaty without the advice and consent of the Senate. He can do neither. The language of the Constitution is peculiar. This is the language:

"He shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate shall appoint, ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States, whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law."

Then follows an exception authorizing Congress by law to vest the appointment of inferior officers either in the President alone or in the courts of law or in the heads of Departments. That is not material to the question we are now discussing.

Here, then, is the appointing power given to the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and that is all the appointing power that is given in the Constitution of the United States. The men who framed this Constitution saw that the Senate might not always be in session; there might be a difficulty in consequence of vacancies occurring by death or resignation while the Senate was not in session, and it would be impossible to fill that vacancy or to have the duties of the office discharged unless a power was vested in somebody temporarily to detail a person to perform those duties; and hence they added this clause:

"The President shall have power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session."

Now, what shall the President have power to do? To "appoint" persons? Not at all; but he shall have power to "fill up vacancies by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of the next session." The vacancy exists all the time; and if the President desires to have that person to whom he has granted a commission to fill up the vacancy continued in the office, he nominates him to the Senate and he is confirmed—not on this commission that was granted; that is not the practice. If a postmaster in the city of Baltimore had died in September last, and the President had designated A B to discharge the duties of postmaster at Baltimore on the 1st of October by granting him a commission to expire at the end of the present session of the Senate, and he thinks proper to appoint that same person to the office of postmaster in Baltimore, this designation that he has made by giving the commission is not what comes before us at all; but he sends his name in to us, and asks the Senate to advise and consent that he may appoint this man (whom he detailed by giving him a commission to act there until the Senate should meet) to the office, and his commission dates from confirmation, and this designation that he had given him a commission to expire at the end of the session goes for nothing; that is the end of it.

Mr. COWAN. Is he not a good postmaster until the end of the session, even though his name should never be sent in and somebody else's should be sent in?

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is not an appointment at all. It is a person acting in that place by virtue of the power vested in the Constitution.

Mr. COWAN. The word "fill" is used instead of "appoint."

Mr. TRUMBULL. Yes, sir; and there is some meaning in that; there was a reason for that; but the Attorneys General say that the President may fill any vacancy that exists during the recess of the Senate.

Mr. COWAN. Not "which happens."

Mr. TRUMBULL. Well, sir, that is not the language of the Constitution, and that language gives no effect whatever to the words "during the recess of the Senate." If the intention of the framers of the Constitution had been that the President might fill any existing vacancy during the recess of the Senate or any vacancy which existed they would have said so, but that is not what they have said. They have said that he may fill up a vacancy that may happen during the recess of the Senate. These words "may happen during the recess of the Senate" are used in other portions of the Constitution. By reference to that clause of the Constitution of the United States which authorizes the appointment of Senators, it will be found that the Constitution declares that the Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the Legislature thereof for six years? What else does the Constitution provide?

"And if vacancies happen by resignation or otherwise during the recess of the Legislature of any State, the Executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the Legislature."

The language is precisely the same, "if vacancies happen during the recess of the Legislature." Has it not always been held in this body that the vacancy must happen during the recess of the Legislature or it did not authorize the Governor to appoint? Has not that been decided over and over again, that the Executive of a State cannot appoint a Senator to fill a vacancy in this body unless the vacancy happened during the recess? Is not the fact that it occurs during the recess of the Legislature necessary to authorize the Executive to appoint? That has been decided over and over again, and is the settled construction of the Constitution of the United States, admitted by everybody. How often has it happened that States have been partially unrepresented in this body just from the fact of the Legislature's failing to elect. We have one such case now from the State of New Jersey. The Legislature was in session when a vacancy occurred here by the decision of the Senate that Mr. Stockton was not entitled to his seat; and the Legislature has since adjourned. Does anybody suppose that the Executive of New Jersey has a right to fill that vacancy? The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. Howe] says he does.

Mr. HOWE. You say the vacancy happened by the removal of Mr. Stockton.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Yes; and I say, does anybody contend that the Executive of the State has authority to fill that vacancy?

Mr. HOWE. Yes, sir; I say it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is well settled the other way; and I did not suppose that anybody held that doctrine. It has been decided, I do not know how many times, but a number of times, where the question has been brought up in the Senate, and it has always been decided that the Executive cannot appoint a Senator to fill a vacancy which existed while the Legislature was in session.

Mr. SUMNER. There is another element in the New Jersey case.

Mr. HOWE. The Senator will allow me to explain. The question upon which he and I would differ, I presume, is whether the existing vacancy was occasioned by the displacement of Mr. Stockton. My own impression is that the vacancy which exists is a vacancy which occurred by the expiration of the term of Mr. Ten Eyck. If that occurred during the session of the Legislature, the Governor cannot appoint, but if it occurred during the recess—

Mr. TRUMBULL. But there has been an intervening session of the Legislature, if it did occur during the recess.

Mr. HOWE. That vacancy we have decided never has been filled.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Does the Senator from Wisconsin hold, then, that after a Legislature has intervened the Executive can then act? Suppose the vacancy did occur during the recess of the Legislature; suppose a Senator were to die and subsequent to his decease the Legislature of the State from whence he came meets, fails to elect a Senator, and adjourns, does the Senator from Wisconsin mean to say the Executive can then appoint? The Legislature of New Jersey has been together since the expiration of the term of Mr. Ten Eyck. But there would be another and a conclusive answer to the Senator's suggestion, and that is this: Mr. Ten Eyck left no vacancy; Mr. Ten Eyck ended his term; and it has been repeatedly held that the Governor cannot appoint to an original term. That is not a vacancy happening. That is provided for by the Constitution in the clause which declares that each State is entitled to two Senators elected for the term of six years; and no Governor has ever undertaken to appoint a Senator for six years. Somebody must first be put into the office, must have commenced the term, before a vacancy can happen; so that I think my friend from Wisconsin will find upon investigation that in both points of view the Executive in the case I have supposed would have no authority to fill the vacancy.

Now, sir, the language, as I said in regard to the filling of a vacancy in the case of a Senator, is the same in the Constitution as it is in regard to the filling of a vacancy in the case of an officer of the United States. They must both happen during recess of the authority which has the right to make the appointment; in the one case the recess of the Legislature of the State, and in the other the recess of the Senate of the United States. If it were not so, it would be very easy to dispense with that provision of the Constitution which has vested the appointing power of all officers in the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, because the President could make appointments (if you call the filling up of a place by a commission an appointment) the moment the Senate adjourned, and continue in that way to make them as often as the Senate adjourned, and keep in office whomsoever he pleased, which would be manifestly a perversion of the meaning of the Constitution.

This whole question was submitted to the Committee on the Judiciary in 1863. It is no new question, and the Senator from Kentucky, if he will look into the subject, will find that it is not an attack upon the Executive. This is no new proposition in this body.

Mr. GUTHRIE. The Senator will permit me. I did not charge it as any attack upon the President. I charged it as an attack upon some people who had been nominated before this body and have been rejected or are likely to be rejected or not acted upon.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have no such motive governing me. I speak of the construction which I believe to be the true one of the Constitution of the United States, without reference to anybody who has been before the Senate or is likely to be before the Senate. In the Thirty-Seventh Congress this resolution was submitted to the Committee on the Judiciary:

"Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire whether the practice which to some extent prevails in some of the Departments of the Government, of appointing officers to fill vacancies which have not occurred during the recess of Congress, but which existed at the preceding session of Congress, is in accordance with the Constitution, and if not, what remedies may be applied."

My friend from Michigan, [Mr. HOWARD,] who was at that time a member of the committee, wrote an elaborate report, which I hold in my hand, on this subject, in which he reviews the opinion of Attorney General Wirt. He quotes from him the very same language the Senator from Maryland has quoted to-day, and also the opinion of other Attorneys General, and comes to the conclusion, in which the committee was unanimous, that the vacancy must begin to exist during the recess of the Senate in order to authorize the President to fill it by giving a commission to expire at the end of the next session of the Senate. In commenting upon this opinion of Attorney General Wirt, the committee say in this report:

"We equally dissent from the construction implied by the substituted reading, 'happened to exist,' for the word 'happen' in the clause. To say that an event which is to 'happen' during a given period of time may logically be an event which does not happen during that period, but during another and an anterior period, seems to us to be a perversion of language. 'Happen to exist,' as here employed by Mr. Wirt, is plainly intended as the equivalent of 'happen to be existing,' or 'in existence,' and is used to imply (though it does not) a continuance or prolongation of the event (the vacancy) from a point of time anterior to the recess. Now, it is the vacancy that is to 'happen.' Certainly any event which has begun and become complete must be said to have happened. But if a vacancy once exists, it has in law happened: for it is in itself an instantaneous event. It implies no continuance of the act that produces it, but takes effect, and is complete and perfect at an indivisible point of time, like the beginning or end of a recess. Once in existence, it has happened, and the mere continuance of the condition of things which the occurrence produces cannot, without confounding the most obvious distinctions, be taken or treated as the occurrence itself, as Mr. Wirt seems to have done. The words 'during their recess,' are plainly intended to qualify and limit the term 'happen.' The vacancy is to happen during their recess. Now, if the vacancy the President is authorized to fill may (as Mr. Wirt and his successors contend) take place indifferently during the recess or during the session, is it not evident that no meaning or effect whatever is given to the words 'during their recess?' Are not those words practically expunged from the Constitution?"

"Again, we see no propriety in forcing the language from its popular meaning in order to meet and fulfill one confessedly great purpose, (the keeping the office filled,) while there is plainly another purpose of equal magnitude and importance (fitting qualifications) attached to and inseparable from the former. In such a case the argument ab inconvenienti has no force, because the anticipated evils on the one hand are counterpoised by those on the other."

"But this forced and unnatural interpretation becomes more manifest in its results. Those results would quickly open the way to a practical deprivation of all power of the Senate over executive appointments. For if the President may in the recess appoint to and fill an office which during a session of the Senate was vacant, he may omit to make any nomination at a subsequent session, and at the close of it again appoint him under the idea of filling a vacancy, and so on from session to session. In the hands of an ambitious, corrupt, or tyrannical Executive, this use of the power would soon bring about the very state of things which the Constitution so carefully guards against, by requiring, in express terms, that the advice of the Senate shall first be taken, and its consent obtained before an appointment shall be made. We do not hesitate to say that this great safeguard of the public rights, interests, and peace is practically prostrated and destroyed by the insidious and, to our minds, totally unfounded construction which has been forced upon the clause."

"The committee, in considering the subject, have not overlooked the subsequent opinion given by Mr. Attorney General Tancy, in 1832, and that of Mr. Legaré, in 1841. Although the latter thinks the question one of no difficulty, and it is, in his mind, so plain as to 'admit of no doubt, whether it be considered as one of pure legal science or as matter of public expediency,' he carefully avoids putting it upon the ground taken by Mr. Wirt, that the word 'happen' may be construed to mean 'happen to exist,' which, as was too plain, at once revolutionized not only the letter but the apparent intention of the clause; but, with a far more adventurous spirit of interpretation, puts the claim of power upon the provision that the President 'shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed.'"

Mr. Legaré puts it upon that clause of the Constitution, as if under that the President of the United States derived any authority to appoint men to office in a different mode from that specifically and in the very terms provided by the Constitution itself. I will not read the whole of this report though it argues more clearly than I can do in any extemporaneous remarks, the meaning of this clause of the Constitution, and comes to the conclusion that the vacancy must begin to exist during the recess of the Senate in order to authorize the President to issue a commission. In reply to the question of inconvenience which was put by the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. DOOLITTLE,] the committee show that there is no force in that, because the same inconvenience arises now, when the Senate is in session. Nobody will pretend that the President can issue a commission to fill an office while the Senate is in session. Suppose that the postmaster in the city of Washington dies to-day, does anybody pretend to say that the President can issue a commission to a man to fill his place to-morrow?

Mr. COWAN. Yes.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Do I understand the Senator from Pennsylvania to say that he can do that when we are in session?

Mr. COWAN. Yes.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Well, sir, I undertake to say that there is not an instance in the history of the Government where ever an attempt was made to do it. Nobody ever pretended that it could be done, and there is not an instance of its having been done in the history of the Government. I venture to say that where a death occurs while the Senate is in session the office cannot be filled in any way until the President nominates to this body and we advise and consent to the nomination. I undertake to say it has never been done, and no President has ever attempted to do it.

Mr. COWAN. What is to become of the office in the mean time?

Mr. TRUMBULL. The office is vacant until the President nominates, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate appoints, some one to fill it. There is no pretense of any authority in the Constitution for the President to appoint a man to an office while the Senate is in session; that is, to an office that requires the advice and consent of the Senate; I am not speaking of inferior officers whom the law has authorized the President to appoint without the advice and consent of the Senate. There is no pretense that he can do it, and during the nine months we are in session if a judge of a court, if a postmaster, if a receiver of public lands, if any officer dies or resigns the office is necessarily vacant until by the advice and consent of the Senate some person is appointed to fill that place.

Mr. HENDRICKS. For my personal satisfaction I wish to ask the Senator if we have got to stay here nine months this session. There is an anxious inquiry about the time when we are likely to adjourn. The Senator suggests nine months, and I want to know if that is the time we are to stay here.

Mr. TRUMBULL. We have sometimes staid here nine months. I was speaking of a hypothetical case; I supposed an instance of the postmaster in Washington dying. I hope he is to live many years, and I hope that we may have no occasion to confirm anybody to fill the office in consequence of his death, either during this or any subsequent session as long as the Senator from Indiana and myself may be here. I spoke of what would have to be done in consequence of his decease. But the Senator is well aware that sessions of Congress do sometimes last nine months. The first session of Congress in which I had the honor to serve did not adjourn, I think, until September, and we had met in the December previous.

Mr. HENDERSON. With the Senator's permission I will state that his whole argument, although of course it is in support of the proposition, goes much further than I pretend to go. I may concur with him in many of the positions taken by him, but I have drawn the amendment with a view to the opinions of the Attorneys General, taking it for granted that they were the law. I concur with him in many of the points made rather than with the Attorneys General, but he is mistaken when he supposes that no opinion has ever been given to the point that where the President fills a vacancy during the recess of the Senate and the Senate adjourns without having acted upon it the President cannot thereafter fill it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I did not say that.

Mr. HENDERSON. Then I misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I said that while the Senate was in session if a vacancy occurred it had never been pretended that the President could fill by appointment that vacancy without the advice and consent of the Senate while we were in session.

Mr. COWAN. Even temporarily?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Even temporarily; and I instanced a case. Suppose to-day that the postmaster in Washington city were to die; I undertook to say that the President would have no authority temporarily to appoint a successor without the advice and consent of the Senate while we are here, and nobody ever contended that he would.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am not aware of any opinion on that point, and I agree with the Senator in regard to it as a question of law.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Constitution is very clear. The President has no authority to fill an office that becomes vacant during the session of the Senate. It is only when the vacancy happens during the recess that he can give a temporary commission; and if you construe those words, as the Attorneys General have done, to mean a vacancy existing during the recess, you cannot by possibility extend them, as I say, by any legitimate construction, to a vacancy which occurs while the Senate is in session; and hence we have provided in our laws for cases of this kind, by providing that the chief clerk, or some designated officer, shall take charge of the papers, and perform the duties until an appointment is made. That is sometimes done when a vacancy happens during the recess. I think the collector in the city of New York died during the recess of Congress, and by a provision of our law some person in that office—I think without appointment, but I am not sure as to that point; an appointment may have been made there—took charge of the office for the time being. There is a case of the same kind in the city of Chicago. Mr. Haven, the collector of that port, died since Congress assembled. One of the officers under him as cashier or chief clerk—

Mr. COWAN. Usually the surveyor of the port.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think not the surveyor of the port, but some person connected with the office has been discharging the duties for several weeks. That is a provision to guard against this very difficulty, but the President has not appointed that person collector, nor issued any commission to him.

Mr. MORGAN. He did in the case in New York.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. King died during the recess, and the President had authority to appoint in that case. This, then, I think is a perfect answer to the suggestion made by the Senator from Wisconsin. He supposed the case of an officer dying on the last day of the session of the Senate, and, before we had any information of it, the Senate adjourned; and then, said he, the President, according to this construction, could not fill that place. I answer to that, if on the first Monday of December, when we meet here, an officer dies, the President cannot fill that place without our advice and consent until we adjourn, and I say he cannot do it then. I say the vacancy happened during the session of the Senate, and not during its recess, and he can never fill it except by the advice and consent of the Senate.

I did not mean to take up so much time in arguing this proposition. I am aware that it goes further than the Senator from Missouri has provided, and I am for going further if it is necessary; I am for providing that no man shall receive compensation in any shape or form out of the money of the people for exercising the duties of an office to which he has no constitutional right.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I did not intend to say a word in this discussion, and if I had not spoken out of meeting I should not be called upon to do so. I did remark, intending it as a side remark to the Senator from Illinois, that I held that if the vacancy which existed in the representation from New Jersey was not occasioned by the displacement of Mr. Stockton, it might be filled by the Governor of New Jersey. I am not called upon to defend that proposition, not having very well considered it. The Senator, however, quoted me as making the statement, and I will say now that I do hold that the vacancy which exists in the representation of the State of New Jersey here is a vacancy which happened, not in consequence of the vote of the Senate upon the right of Mr. Stockton, but happened by the expiration of the term of service of Mr. Ten Eyck, the last Senator chosen by the Legislature of that State to sit in this body. How the fact is—whether that term expired during the recess of her Legislature, or during the term of the sitting of the Legislature—I do not know. I supposed it happened during the sitting of the Legislature, and therefore was a vacancy to be filled by the Legislature, and not by the appointment of the Governor; but if it happened during the recess of the Legislature, I think it is a vacancy to be filled by the Governor, and that his authority to fill it is not abrogated by the fact that a session of the Legislature has intervened, inasmuch as that Legislature did not fill the vacancy. I have not examined the question at any length, and therefore am not prepared to argue it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to call the attention of the Senate, and of my friend from Wisconsin, to the case of Mr. Phelps, a Senator from Vermont in 1853. A vacancy in the representation from Vermont occurred by the death of Mr. Upham. Mr. Phelps was appointed by the Governor to fill the vacancy; and the Legislature at its next session, on a political contest, failed to agree upon any person to fill the unexpired term. Mr. Phelps again took his seat in the Senate in the December following—December, 1853—and the question arose as to whether the appointment of the Governor had expired, or whether the Governor had further power, and it was decided after full debate and not upon political grounds, as the Senate was divided irrespective of politics upon the question, by a vote of 26 to 12, that Mr. Phelps was not entitled, under the appointment of the Governor, to sit. I believe that has been followed since.

Mr. HOWE. I was not aware of any decision on the point. The opinion which I submitted to the Senator from Illinois was an off-hand opinion. The language of the Constitution is that "if vacancies happen by resignation or otherwise, during the recess of the Legislature of any State," which I understand was the case in Vermont in the instance alluded to, "the Executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the Legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies." I suppose the decision alluded to by the Senator from Vermont turned upon the force of this last clause of the section; and it may be correct. My own opinion was that if it was a vacancy that happened in any way during the recess of the Legislature, it was a vacancy to be filled by the Executive, and to be kept filled by the Executive until the Legislature shall have discharged the duty imposed upon it here. If the decision of the Senate has been to the contrary, I am rather inclined to believe that the decision of the Senate will stand, and that my own opinion will be overruled.

Now, Mr. President, I wish to say one word upon the pending question which I should not have said had I not taken the floor to explain myself. Touching the constitutional question which is argued here as if it were involved in the pending amendment, I have to say, in the first place, that it does not seem to me that there is any such constitutional question involved; but if it be, then I hold that under the first clause of this portion of the Constitution which has been referred to, the Senate is made by the Constitution a constituent portion of the appointing power. The language is, speaking of the President, that—

"He shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate shall appoint, ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law."

He shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate shall appoint, all these officers. I cannot have a doubt but what the framers of this article, the men who employed this language, meant to say to the President not merely that he shall present a man to the Senate for an office, but that he shall nominate a man who shall be approved by the Senate, and with the approval of the Senate shall appoint the men to fill these offices. In my judgment, the President does not discharge the duty which this clause of the section devolves upon him when he has simply sent a name to the Senate. His duty is discharged only when he shall have obtained the consent of the Senate to the nominee whose name he shall have sent in.

I know there have been industrious efforts made for very many years during our history to persuade the country that here was a prerogative vested in the President of the United States which made him really the appointing power, and which subjected every officer in the United States to his control. Such may be the effect of the interpretation placed upon this clause of the Constitution by the Attorney General from whose opinion the Senator from Maryland has read. I am inclined to think that is the effect which would follow if that interpretation were correct. That it is not correct seems manifest from the plainest and most natural interpretation of the words employed. But inasmuch as a vacancy may happen when there is no Senate in being to give its assent, there is another provision incorporated into the Constitution, and that provision, I think, authorizes the President to commission and thereby to fill up a vacancy which happens during the recess of the Senate, which happens at a time when there is no Senate in being to give its assent to a nomination. What is the tenure of the commission granted by the President under these circumstances? The language of the Constitution is that it shall expire at the end of the next session of the Senate. If there had not been any usage to the contrary, which I believe there has been, I should have supposed that a commission granted under these circumstances did confer an office upon the holder of the commission until the expiration of the next session of the Senate, and that any appointment made during the next session of the Senate by a nomination of the President would take effect from and after the expiration of the session of the Senate. If there had not been a usage to the contrary, I should have supposed that was the true interpretation of this clause, but I believe the usage is that this commission, which is granted to an officer in order to fill a vacancy happening during the recess of the Senate, is vacated the moment another individual or that same individual is nominated to the Senate and is confirmed by the Senate.

But, Mr. President, whatever may be the true interpretation of these clauses in the Constitution, whether they give to the President the right to dispense with the authority of the Senate altogether or not in making appointments, I take it there can be no manner of doubt that they do not give the President unlimited control over the finances, the resources, the revenues of the country. It is, it seems to me, optional with the Legislature how much they will pay the public servants, those of them whose compensation is not fixed by the Constitution, and when they will pay it, and what ones they will pay; and therefore it is that I said at the outset that I did not think there was any constitutional question really involved in the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri. I take it there is no question but what the Legislature may constitutionally refuse to pay any postmaster or any other officer. Of course they act at their peril. If they act on reasons which are not satisfactory to the country, they will suffer for it as they should; but they are the judges of the question what officers are to be paid, what offices are to exist independently of the offices named in the Constitution itself, how much each one of those officers should receive and when they are to receive it. It is in the exercise of this authority that we are called upon to adopt this amendment. It is by virtue of this authority that I take it we can clearly adopt this amendment without violating the Constitution. The question will still remain whether the fact that an officer has been nominated and has been rejected by the Senate, the coordinate branch of the appointing power, is of itself a sufficient reason for refusing to pay such an individual. For myself, holding that it is a sufficient reason, I shall vote for the amendment. I do not think the Legislature has a right to appropriate a dollar of the public funds for the payment of an officer who the Senate has said is unfit to hold office.

Mr. HOWARD. I do not know, Mr. President, whether I perfectly understand the provisions of this amendment. I beg leave to call the attention of the Senator from Missouri to it. The amendment speaks of "all cases in which persons have been appointed during the recess or during the session of the Senate as assistant postmaster or other civil officer under the Government," &c. Does he intend to say that where there has been a regular commission issued to fill a vacancy that occurred during the recess of the Senate no money shall be paid in compensation for services rendered under that commission in any case?

Mr. HENDERSON. No. I mean to permit the appointment to hold good until the adjournment of the succeeding session of the Senate; and after the last day of the succeeding session of the Senate I propose that he shall not be paid. The Senator will see, by reading the whole clause, that I submit to the opinions of the Attorneys General, who hold that appointments made under such circumstances are good. Of course, in some cases, the cases alluded to in the Constitution itself, there will be no doubt; but the Attorneys General have carried that doctrine much further; and I submitted to their opinions in the absence of the very able opinion that the Senator himself has given on the subject, for I really did not have time to examine it, and was not aware that a report had been made until the other day; and I have not had time to examine it since. I submitted to the opinions of the Attorneys General, and only carried it to the extent that I thought we properly could go in accordance with those opinions. The Senate will see that it only proposes to deny the salary after an adjournment of the Senate. I afterward inserted "after the expiration of thirty days;" and when the Senator from Indiana proposed an amendment in the twelfth line I made another modification. If the Senator from Michigan will permit me now to do so, I ask to withdraw the words "after the expiration of thirty days," because they are unnecessary now, since I submitted to the amendment suggested by the Senator from Maryland on the same subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is in the power of the mover, and those words will be stricken out.

Mr. HOWARD. I ask, then, that the amendment be read as it now stands.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

And be it further enacted, That in all cases in which persons have been or shall be appointed, either during the recess or session of the Senate, as assistant postmaster or other civil officer under the Government, whose appointments require the consent of the Senate, and whose appointments having been submitted to the Senate have been rejected or not consented to before the adjournment thereof, no money shall be drawn from the Treasury or used from any fund or appropriation made or created by law to pay the salaries of such persons under such appointments, or under any previous appointment to the same office, for services rendered after said adjournment. And if any such person so rejected by the Senate shall after such adjournment be appointed to the same office, no money shall be drawn or used as aforesaid to pay his salary until his appointment shall have been consented to by the Senate at its succeeding session.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, there are some things in regard to offices which I regard as certain and settled, and the first is, that no office can exist in the United States except under a law of the United States. The second is, that the President of the United States has the power of nominating candidates for office to the Senate, but that he has not the power of appointing them to office except by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, unless in cases of vacancy that may happen during the recess of the Senate.

I am aware, and so are we all, that the practice has been very common heretofore during the existence of the Government for the President of the United States to assume to fill vacancies by way of giving commissions where vacancies have occurred, not during the recess of the Senate, but during the session of the Senate; and it was on that particular point that the Senate saw fit to instruct the Judiciary Committee a few years ago to give their opinion, and my friend from Illinois has read to the Senate the result of their consideration on that subject.

Now, sir, I hold that it is the plain intention of the Constitution that where the President has authority to grant commissions for the purpose of filling a vacancy, that vacancy must have begun to exist, not during the session of the Senate, but after the close of the session of the Senate and during the recess of the Senate. I am quite aware that the Attorneys General of the United States, and I think perhaps without any difference of opinion among them as to the result at which they have arrived, have entertained the idea that a vacancy occurring during the session of the Senate may be filled by commission after the recess of the Senate has commenced. The Committee on the Judiciary took this question into consideration, and they held, and I think very properly held, that was a wrong and erroneous view of the Constitution. The Constitution declares that—

"The President shall have power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate, by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session."

An eminent Attorney General of the United States, Mr. Wirt, I think, took very great liberties with this language when he held that the word "happen" in its connection here may be so construed as to cover a case of vacancy where the vacancy in the office had begun to exist during the session of the Senate. That was the construction which he put upon that language—I think a very strained and untenable construction. The Attorney General, Mr. Legaré, in 1841, was called upon to give an opinion upon the same question, and he held, not that the word "happen" may receive that broad construction, not that it may be made in that connection to imply a continuation of an event, but that the President necessarily had this power to fill a vacancy that had occurred during the session of the Senate in virtue of his power to take care that the laws are executed—two very different sources of power. I do not agree with either of them. I think it is high time that the Senate of the United States should act upon this most grave and serious subject. I do not admit that the practical construction thus given by the executive branch of the Government, for a long time, indeed, is the true and accurate construction to be given, and in saying this I am not unaware, I trust, of the great weight which such a long-continued practical construction of the language of the Constitution is entitled to. Certainly very great inconveniences may arise, and often do arise, from a departure from the practical construction of the law; but in such cases as this it seems to me that the language of the Constitution is too plain to be mistaken. The report from which the Senator from Illinois read contains some further observations on this question of convenience, and with the leave of the Senate I will read a few paragraphs:

"We are aware that this construction has been, from time to time, sanctioned by Attorneys General, and, as recently as 1855, by Mr. Cushing, and that the Executive has, from time to time, practiced upon it. We are also aware of the great weight which such a continued practical construction is entitled to in considering the meaning and intent of a doubtful clause in a public act. But we have not been able to convince ourselves that such is the character of the provision. We think the language too plain to admit of a doubt or to need interpretation; and where such is the case, the language must not be wrested from its natural sense to avoid a supposed inconvenience.

"And it is quite apparent, from all the arguments of the Attorneys General, that the real foundation of their conclusions is the assumed inconvenience to the public service of permitting an office to remain vacant during the recess, where the vacancy has happened during the session and remains unfilled at its close.

"Cases, it is true, may occur, as they have occurred, where a vacancy may subsist after the session in consequence of the refusal of the Senate to consent to, or of its omission to act upon, a nomination; and exactly the same inconvenience may result, as it has on numerous occasions resulted, from the omission of the President to send in a nomination. It is also an inconvenience that a vacancy should continue for any length of time, whether occurring during the session or the recess, and yet vacancies must, from the very nature of the case, thus continue for a longer or shorter period. A similar inconvenience must necessarily have happened if the Senate had had no power whatever over appointments, and occurs from necessity in the most absolute Governments. It is unavoidable. All this, however, was clearly foreseen by the framers of the Constitution when they used the language giving the power; and it strikes us as far more rational to conclude that they regarded this temporary inconvenience as outweighed by the advantage they had secured by requiring all appointments to office, except in cases of vacancy happening in the recess, to receive the sanction of the Senate. The plan came as near to perfection as the nature of the case and the preservation of any effective power on the part of the Senate would admit."

Mr. President, I am for restraining, so far as is possible, the action of the executive branch of the Government to appointments to office within the strict limits of the Constitution. I think that during the last year or two we have had instances enough of an assumption on the part of the Executive to appoint to offices which had not even been created by law, and unless the Senate shall interpose effectually, and at a timely moment, to interrupt this current of events it is impossible to tell to what evils it may not lead. I shall, with a great deal of pleasure, vote for the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, because I think there ought to be just exactly that restraint imposed upon the appointing power.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, what I rise for the purpose of saying is not to discuss the particular amendment as now modified by the mover of it, but with a view merely to state the opinions which I entertain upon the questions discussed by the honorable member who has just taken his seat, and by the chairman of the Judiciary Committee. The honorable chairman, at the same time saying that it was not his purpose to weaken the authority of the Attorneys General, stated that perhaps their opinions were not entitled to the weight that should be otherwise accorded to them because they held their office under the President, and they may have fashioned their opinions to suit the views of the President.

Now, if the honorable member had had the experience which at one time it was my good or bad fortune to have had, I am sure he would not have indulged in a remark which was calculated to reflect upon the independence of those who have heretofore filled that high office. The Senate are aware, and the country is aware, that in former days it was filled by the most eminent men of the land; men as far incapable of being influenced by any political consideration, and certainly as far from being influenced by any opinion which the President might entertain, as the honorable member from Illinois, or anybody else, could be in any situation in which they might be placed. They are appointed under a law passed as far back as 1789 for the very purpose of being the legal advisers of the President and of the several heads of Departments. They are, therefore, quasi judicial officers, and as far as I am advised, without any exception, from the time of their appointment to the present hour, there never has been an opinion given by any incumbent of that office upon any question which he did not believe to be in itself sound. It is possible that party may have unconsciously influenced his judgment; but if it be true that officers of that kind might be influenced by party considerations, I suppose it is equally true that Senators of the United States may unconsciously be influenced by like motives; that their opinions, therefore, are to be taken with some allowance on that account. But the opinions which have been the subject of comment do not stand alone upon the authority of the eminent men by whom they have been given. They have had the sanction of Congress, the sanction of this great body, the sanction, of course, of the Presidents who held that high office during the period that the opinions were pronounced, the sanction of Washington, of Jefferson, of Madison, of John Quincy Adams, of Monroe—men not eminent on account of any military service, but eminent for their legal knowledge as well as for their undoubted, and now, (however it might have been attempted to throw spots upon their reputation during the period some of them held that high office,) now, in the opinion of the world, spotless reputation; and until the learned Judiciary Committee of the Senate upon the occasion adverted to by the honorable Senator, the chairman of that committee, deemed it their duty to express a different opinion, as far as I am advised the opinion pronounced by the law officers of the Government and acted upon by the several Presidents never was questioned.

Now the honorable members tell us—particularly the honorable member from Michigan, who has just closed—that the language of the Constitution is so plain that it admits of no doubt. The honorable member risks a good deal of his own reputation, high as that is, when he pronounces so authoritatively that the question is free from all doubt, when from the beginning of the Government up to the period when that report was made, founded upon the hypothesis that there was no doubt, the opinion of every branch of the Government was that the true interpretation of the Constitution was directly the reverse of what he supposes now to be its only admissible interpretation.

What is the inconvenience to arise from adopting the construction of the executive department of the Government? The honorable member supposes, and that is his proposition, that the vacancy, if existing in point of fact for the first time during the actual session of the Senate, cannot be filled by the Executive if the Senate fails to fill it. Now this may happen; this has happened: a man dies during the session of the Senate; his death is not known to the President, is not known to the Senate; but his death creates a vacancy, and if it cannot be filled one of two things will be the result: that the office, however important it may be to the due administration of the Government, is to remain vacant for the eight or nine months that may elapse from the termination of one session to the beginning of another, or that the President must call the Senate together.

Does the honorable member mean to assert that in a case of that description the President has no authority to appoint? If he will look at these opinions he will find that in a case of that sort it never was doubted that the President had the authority to appoint; and the same principle has been adopted in relation to that principle of the Constitution which relates to the filling of vacancies in this body. The language in one respect is the same—if a vacancy happens during the recess of the Legislature the Governor is to appoint. The honorable member says that the uniform construction of that clause has been that if in point of fact he who was Senator ceases to be a Senator by death or by any other cause while the Legislature of his State is in session the place cannot be filled. What is the case of my friend, the honorable member from Vermont, [Mr. POLAND?] I looked at it with some concern when I heard of his appointment. I knew his reputation before he came into the body, and I was exceedingly solicitous that it should turn out that there was no objection to the validity of his appointment. Judge Collamer died during the session of the Legislature of Vermont; but the fact was not known to the Legislature, and upon looking at the question with all proper solicitude, for the reason I have just stated, I found that it had been uniformly held that the authority of the Executive to fill a vacancy did not depend upon the mere fact of an existing vacancy, but depended upon the existence of two facts: first, vacancy existing, and second, the knowledge of the vacancy being possessed by the Legislature. Our friend from Vermont was received without objection on the part of anybody. Does any one doubt that he is entitled to his seat by virtue of that executive appointment? And yet, without giving a liberal interpretation to the word "happen," as it is found in that clause of the Constitution, he is not here by virtue of a valid appointment.

But there is a difference between the language of that clause and the language of the clause which is immediately before the Senate. The language of the clause before the Senate is:

"The President shall have power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate, by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session."

The language of the corresponding clause in relation to the filling of vacancies in this body is:

"If vacancies happen by resignation or otherwise during the recess of the Legislature of any State, the Executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the Legislature, which shall then fill such vacancy."

The appointment in that case terminates with the beginning of the session of the next Legislature; the appointments in the case under consideration do not terminate at the meeting of the next session of the Senate of the United States, but continue until the termination of that session. And there is a difference in another respect, a practical difference. Looking to the wholesome administration of the Government, the Government can go on without the Senate being full. Whether Vermont, for example, was represented as she is now represented, or was not represented until a Legislature met and should choose the same members or choose somebody else, was a matter, so far as the actual administration of the Government was concerned, of little or no moment; but how is the executive branch of the Government to be carried on upon any such doctrine? Your Secretary of the Treasury dies this morning; you do not hear of it; you adjourn before notice of the fact reaches you; are the finances of the Government to remain unadministered until we meet here next December? And so in relation to all the other appointments. The laws cannot be executed without your executive officers; the judgments of your courts cannot be enforced without your marshal; and if the Senate reject an appointment made by the President, or decline to act upon an appointment proposed by the President, and adjourn, are your courts to be practically closed? Certainly that will be the result if it be true that in such case there is no authority in the Executive to supply the vacancy unless the Senate shall be called together again, and the practical result might be that we might be called together from month to month. The mischief arising from that, the inconvenience resulting from that, the expenditure consequent upon that, is infinitely greater than to give the President the power to appoint a marshal or a Secretary of the Treasury, and to have the judgments of the courts, in the case of the first of these officers, executed; and so in relation to all other departments of the Government.

But my friend from Illinois and I, and perhaps for the same reason, have been very fond in past times of the niceties of special pleading, and he does not seem to have gotten rid of his love of them yet. He seems given over to technicalities, and pushes them to an extent in the construction of the Constitution even further than I have heard them applied to the construction of a plea in abatement. Now, what does he tell us? The power of appointment is not conferred upon the President; the clause relied upon for the purpose of showing that he has any power of appointment was not intended to accomplish any such end; the word "appointment" is not in the particular clause; the word "appointment" is to be found in the clause which relates to what he may do with the advice and consent of the Senate; and because the word "appointment" is not in the one and is to be found in the other, the power of appointment in the one does not exist, although it exists in the other. What is the power, Mr. President? If vacancies exist they shall be filled by commissions issued by the President. That is the power conferred upon him. When the vacancy existing by the death or the resignation of the antecedent officer is filled, does not the incumbent hold his office by virtue of that commission? Does he not hold it, therefore, by the appointment of the Executive just as substantially as if the word "appointment" was to be found in the particular clause? Who can doubt that? He who did fill it filled it by virtue of the authority of the President to appoint, by and with the consent of the Senate. He who succeeds him in filling it fills it by virtue of the appointment of the President alone during the period for which he is authorized to fill it; so that in both cases the incumbent is in office by virtue of an appointing power.

I therefore submit, upon either of the two questions to which I have addressed myself, first, that a long-settled interpretation by every branch of the Government of the meaning of this clause is not to be unsettled now by the opinion of any committee of this body. No one has greater confidence than I have in the particular committee by whom the report relied upon was drafted or in the draftsman of that report; but I am sure he will not take it at all in an offensive sense, nor will any member of that committee consider me as meaning to disparage the authority to which each one of the committee is entitled, when I say that perhaps it may be that Pinkney and Wirt and Taney and Legaré and Berrien and Cushing may be right and this committee wrong; and more especially when what Pinkney and Wirt and Taney and Berrien and Legaré and Cushing have said upon the subject has received the sanction of every department of the Government until it first fell under the kind and critical censure of the members of this committee.

Mr. SUMNER. It seems to me, Mr. President, that if the question were now about forming the Constitution, and we were to consider where this power should be lodged, much of the argument of the Senator from Maryland would be very applicable; it would certainly be entitled to very great consideration, but he will allow me to say that he seems rather to have addressed himself to what in his opinion ought to be the Constitution than to what the Constitution is. Now, sir, I prefer to call the attention of the Senator precisely to what the Constitution is. I therefore, if the Senator will pardon me, put aside his very elaborate disquisition on the inconvenience that may ensue if we do not adopt his view. Even assuming that all that inconvenience might ensue, with regard to which the Senator will pardon me if I express great doubt, he will allow me to say that that cannot be an excuse to us for setting aside the text of the Constitution. There is the instrument. The Senator has quoted the words; he will pardon me if I quote them:

"The President shall have power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate."

Are not the words plain?

Mr. JOHNSON. That is a question.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator says that is a question, but I put it, are not the words plain?

Mr. JOHNSON. If the Senator wants me to answer his question, I should say no.

Mr. SUMNER. Very well; the Senator has already answered the question in advance by an elaborate speech. His whole speech was a long "no" on that question. He says that the words are not plain; but he will allow me to say, in reply, that to my apprehension they are plain. And I submit to the Senator that even in his opinion they would not be otherwise than plain if he were not led astray by that line of names to which he has so often alluded, beginning with that name which we all respect so much—William Wirt. Mr. Wirt, in his opinion, as the Senator reminds us, has undertaken to give an interpretation to the phrase "that may happen." Permit me to say that in my opinion that interpretation is latitudinous beyond apology. There is nothing, according to my mind, in any rule of construction or interpretation that will justify such a definition as he has chosen to attach to that phrase. And permit me to say that that definition begins with William Wirt. The other names cited by the Senator simply follow Mr. Wirt; they say ditto to Mr. Wirt. Therefore, if Mr. Wirt was wrong they were all wrong, for I do not think that any one of them, in the opinion that he gave, added to the original authority of Mr. Wirt. They added nothing in reason, in history, or in exposition of any kind. I say, then, I must carry you back to the very text of the Constitution, anterior to the opinion of Mr. Wirt; and if I could get my learned friend from Maryland to go back of Mr. Wirt, and just put him face to face with this text of the Constitution, without Mr. Wirt as the torch to light the way and then all these other torch-bearers after him, I believe there can be no doubt how that learned Senator must pronounce, because he has in him too much knowledge of the Constitution, too much knowledge of law, and too much common sense to attach such a definition to that phrase as he now willingly adopts on the authority of these names. I say from the authorities of these names, not from the text itself, and not from the reason of the case. Why, sir, what is the natural signification of the term? The language is:

What is a vacancy? It is where the office is empty; and that emptiness of the office must come about, must occur, must fall in, if I may so say, during the recess of the Senate. If it does not occur during the recess of the Senate, if it does not fall in during the recess of the Senate, if it is all anterior to the recess of the Senate, then, allow me to remind the Senator, it does not come within the text of the Constitution. It is in vain for him to cite the authority of Mr. Wirt and to give a new-fangled definition to words which are so plain as to require no definition. We all know what the phrase "may happen" means. It is a commonplace phrase of every day use. Its signification is perfectly plain. It must mean that the vacancy in every respect completely must occur during the recess of the Senate.

But now, sir, if I can have the attention of my honorable friend from Maryland, allow me to cite authority against authority. I should prefer to treat this text on the basis of reason alone. Looking at it through reason, independent of authority, I say the conclusion is clear; but against the Senator's authorities I adduce an authority which I know that Senator will listen to with respect. I adduce the authority of one of the founders of this Constitution, one of the ablest of all those who assisted in building this frame of Government, and one of the ablest also of those who assisted in its early administration, the friend and companion of General Washington in his first administration. I mean Alexander Hamilton, who was called expressly to deal with this very question, and who in advance has given the authority of his name to that interpretation of the text which I have already shown reason requires. Now, listen to what Alexander Hamilton said, in a letter to James McHenry, Secretary of War, dated May 3, 1799:

"In my opinion, vacancy is a relative term, and presupposes that the office has been once filled. If so, the power to fill a vacancy is not the power to make an original appointment."

All that is clear. The Senator, of course, will not dissent from that. Then he comes to the precise point:

"The terms, which may have happened"— quoting the words of the Constitution.

Mr. JOHNSON. Does he say "may have happened?"

Mr. SUMNER. He says "may have happened."

Mr. JOHNSON. That is not the precise language.

Mr. SUMNER. It is not, but is as he quotes it. The Senator will see that the meaning must be the same, though the quotation may not be strictly accurate. There is no difference which disturbs the sense.

"The terms, which may have happened, serve to confirm this construction. They imply casualty, and denote such as having been once filled have become vacant by accidental circumstances."

Then he goes on; and now I must have the attention of the Senator:

"It is clear that independently of the authority of a special law the President cannot fill a vacancy that happens during the session of the Senate."

That will be found in the fifth volume of Hamilton's Works, page 258. Now, sir, I adduce that as authority in reply to the authority adduced by my honorable friend from Maryland; for he himself, from his very argument, I think, showed us that, independent of authority, he must be with us in our interpretation of this language. I do not doubt that if I could carry my friend back of William Wirt, and put him face to face with this text, he would join with Hamilton, and, as I have already said, with the reason of the case in giving the same signification to this text which we do.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move as an addition to the amendment now pending the following:

"That no person exercising or performing the duties of any office which by law is required to be filled by the advice and consent of the Senate, shall, till he is confirmed by the Senate, receive any salary or compensation for his services, unless he be commissioned by the President to fill up a vacancy which has begun to exist during the recess of the Senate and since its last adjournment."

Mr. SHERMAN. There is, it is manifest, a difference of opinion upon the question of the pending amendment between members of the Senate. This amendment would be just as proper and just as effective offered as an amendment to any of the appropriation bills. It is more pertinent to the legislative bill or the general civil appropriation bill than it is to this appropriation bill. It is a subject that has already excited some discussion and elicited some difference of opinion. Now, rather than choose between the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois and that offered by the Senator from Missouri, I suggest to the Senate whether it would not be better to let this subject drop now and let a well-considered proposition be submitted as an amendment to one of the other appropriation bills. We must make some progress with the various appropriation bills. This amendment may just as well be considered at a later stage. For us now to choose between these different propositions would be to prolong the discussion; and I think we had better let both of the amendments drop and pass this appropriation bill and let the amendment be considered at some future stage of our session. I make this suggestion merely to expedite the business of the Senate, for I do think we ought to pass this bill to-day for we have a special order to-morrow and there are other important appropriation bills behind. I did hope that this afternoon we could be able to take up the Army appropriation bill and make some progress with it, but I have already despaired of that. I hope the suggestion I now make will be adopted.

Mr. COWAN. Mr. President, I agree entirely with the Senator from Ohio. I have considered the law as pretty well settled, and it had better remain as it is. If it is to be determined by this body, if it is to be a rule on the subject, we should take a little more time for its consideration than we can on an amendment springing up in this way. I do not see that there is any necessity for determining the matter just at the present time.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope that we may get rid of this appropriation bill. This question may come just as well on some other appropriation bill.

Mr. WILSON. If the Senator withdraws the amendment we can do that.

Mr. HENDERSON. I do not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts withdraw his motion for an executive session?

Mr. WILSON. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois will require some further examination and discussion, and if it is to be pressed I certainly think we had better not attempt to pass the bill to-day. We had better let it go over and reflect upon it.

Mr. HENDERSON. I have no objection to that course. I have another amendment that I propose to offer to this bill, and perhaps it is an amendment that ought to be printed and that Senators would like to consider. I do not desire to put myself in the way of the passage of the appropriation bills. If it is absolutely necessary, if the public service requires that the bill should be passed immediately, I shall not stand in the way.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is a bill for the next fiscal year, and will not go into effect until July next.

Mr. HENDERSON. That is what I supposed, and therefore it is not at all necessary that it should be hurried through immediately. I desire to offer another amendment, to insert the following as an additional section:

SEC. —. And be it further enacted, That in all cases in which the incumbents of civil offices shall be permitted to perform the duties of their respective offices after their successors shall have been appointed and confirmed by the Senate, and after such successors shall have offered to qualify as provided by law, such incumbents shall not be paid any salary or other compensation, nor shall they be permitted to receive any emoluments of office for services rendered after the expiration of thirty days after the adjournment of the session of the Senate at which the appointment of their successors may be confirmed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. HENDERSON. I ask that the amendment which I have just read may be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It can only be received by unanimous consent. The Chair hears no objection. The amendment is received, and the order to print will be entered.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That order to print, I presume, will also include the amendment that I offered.

Mr. HENDERSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. CONNESS. I also propose offering an amendment, and I may as well offer it at this time. It is to come in at the end of the first section.

Mr. WADE. I also offer an amendment, to be added as an additional section, with a view to have it printed when the bill comes up again.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. WILSON. I renew the motion for an executive session.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and, after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Monday, April 23, 1866.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by Rev. GEORGE F. MAGOUN, President of Iowa College.

The Journal of Saturday last was read and approved.

The SPEAKER stated as the regular order of business the calling of the committees for reports to go upon the Calendar, and not to be brought back into the House on a motion to reconsider, commencing with the Committee of Elections.

No reports were made.

EIGHT-HOUR SYSTEM.

The SPEAKER. The next business in order is the calling of the States and Territories for resolutions, the pending question being upon the resolution offered on Monday last by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. INGERSOLL.] On the demand for the previous question on Monday, no quorum voted. A motion to lay the resolution on the table was lost, and the question now recurs on seconding the demand for the previous question.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Whereas it is one of the paramount duties of all legislative bodies to lighten as much as possible the burdens resting upon the laboring classes and promote the general welfare: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives, That the Committee for the District of Columbia be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing by law the eight-hour system, as it is called, as constituting a day's work in the District of Columbia, and that said committee be authorized to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. KUYKENDALL. I see my colleague is not in; can it be informally laid over?

The SPEAKER. It can be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I object. There are other resolutions to be offered; I want to get several in.

Mr. KUYKENDALL. If the previous question is not seconded, will the resolution go over?

The SPEAKER. It would not under the rule.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. I propose to debate the resolution.

The SPEAKER. This is not the day of its introduction; therefore rising to debate it does not carry it over.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

EVENING SESSION ON TUESDAY.

Mr. BIDWELL offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the House will hold a session to-morrow (Tuesday) evening, the 24th, commencing at half past seven o'clock, for the purpose of hearing reports from the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

Mr. PRICE. I move to reconsider the vote by which the House agreed to the resolution; and to lay that motion on the table.

The question having been put on laying the motion on the table, no quorum voted.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I ask the gentleman from California [Mr. BIDWELL] what particular object he has in holding a session to-morrow evening.

Mr. PRICE. I will answer that question. The Committee on the Pacific Railroad has not been called for two months, and from the course of business it will be two months longer before it will be called. Some members will have to be absent in a few days, and the committee are very desirous of making a report.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Do the committee want an evening session for the purpose of passing their bills?

Mr. PRICE. For the purpose of acting upon them.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I consider these Pacific railroad bills as most important, granting as they do some sixty million dollars, and I trust that this House will not consider them in an evening session. There is no necessity for evening sessions now. The House is far ahead of the Senate, and I trust we will consider this matter only when the committee is called in order for reports.

Mr. CONKLING. Does the resolution admit the construction that action is to be taken on the bill to-morrow night?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the resolution.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. CONKLING. Now, I ask the Chair whether the proper construction of that resolution is that a bill may be put upon its passage when reported to-morrow evening.

The SPEAKER. It may, under the rule, as found in the Digest, which states that consent to report a bill carries with it the right to consider the bill.

Mr. CONKLING. I understand that; yet I should think that leave being asked to hear reports of a committee hardly conveyed to the House fairly the idea that we were to be called on to vote on the passage of the bills when reported.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not so understand it now. I understand the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PRICE] to have meant nothing more than to bring these bills before the House and have them postponed until a proper time for consideration.

Mr. PRICE. My intention was that these bills should be acted upon to-morrow night, if the House agreed to the resolution. And, Mr. Speaker, I see no force in the objection of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURNE] or that of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CONKLING.] If it is proper to act upon these bills at any time, they can be acted upon to-morrow just as well as three months hence.

The Committee on the Pacific Railroad has not been called for two months; and in the course of the regular call of committees that committee will not, in all probability, be called for two months to come. I have said to the House, and I say again, that there are some members of the committee who wish to be absent for a few days, and who do not feel at liberty to be absent until this committee has been called.

Now, the call of a committee for reports involves the necessity of acting upon the reports when made, although, as a matter of course, the bills reported may be postponed by the House until a day certain.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will read the rule, on page 58 of the Digest:

"The right to report at any time carries with it the right to consider the matter when reported. And where authority is given to a committee to make a report at a particular time, the right follows to consider the report when made."

Mr. PRICE. Certainly.

Mr. STEVENS. I suggest to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. PRICE,] that he consent, or if necessary put it into the resolution, that, although the bills may be discussed, yet no vote shall be taken upon them to-morrow night.

Mr. PRICE. I have no objection to that, if the vote can be taken—

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I desire to inquire into what position a bill would be left if it should be discussed to-morrow night without a vote being taken.

The SPEAKER. It would come up the next morning as unfinished business.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. By that means, then, the Committee on the Pacific Railroad would come in ahead of all other committees. I object to that, as it would be unfair to other committees. The Committee on Commerce, having very important business to report, has not had an opportunity to do so for some weeks.

Mr. PRICE. It is a little too late now for the gentleman from Illinois to object, and I will say to him that the very reason why I desire to have to-morrow night fixed for the hearing of reports from the Committee on the Pacific Railroad was that it would not interfere with any other business.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I object to debate.

The SPEAKER. The motion to reconsider is not debatable, and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] objects to debate.

On the motion to lay on the table the motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to, there were—ayes 40, noes 33.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 61, nays 40, not voting 82; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Anderson, Delos R.

Ashley, Baker, Baxter, Beaman, Benjamin, Bidwell, Bingham, Blow, Boutwell, Bromwell, Broomall, Bundy, Dawes, Deffrees, Deming, Donnelly, Driggs, Ferry, Grinnell, Henderson, Higby, Holmes, Asahel W. Hubbard, Hulburt, Ketcham, Kaykendall, Laffin, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Loan, Longyear, McKee, McKuer, Miller, Moorhead, Morris, Moulton, Myers, Orth, Patterson, Ferham, Plants, Price, John H. Rice, Rogers, Rollins, Schenck, Smith, Stevens, Thayer, Upson, Burt Van Horn, Warner, William B. Washburn, Wentworth, James F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—61.

YAYS—Messrs. Ancona, Boyer, Chanler, Reader W. Clarke, Conkling, Delano, Dixon, Eggleston, Eldridge, Eliot, Farquhar, Finck, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Hale, Aaron Harding, Abner C. Harding, Hayes, Chester D. Hubbard, James R. Hubbell, James M. Humphrey, Jencks, Julian, Latham, Marshall, McCullough, Mercer, Paine, Ritter, Ross, Scofield, Shanklin, Sitgreaves, Spaulding, Taber, Taylor, Francis Thomas, Trowbridge, Ward, and Elihu B. Washburne—40.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Banks, Barker, Bergen, Blaine, Brandegee, Buckland, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coffroth, Cook, Culom, Culver, Darling, Davis, Dawson, Denison, Dodge, Dumont, Eckley, Farnsworth, Garfield, Grider, Griswold, Harris, Hart, Hill, Hogan, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, James Humphrey, Ingersoll, Johnson, Jones, Kasson, Kelley, Kelso, Kerr, Le Blond, Lynch, Marston, Marvin, McClurg, McIndoe, Morrill, Newell, Niblack, Nicholson, Neell, O'Neill, Phelps, Pike, Pomeroy, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, Rousseau, Sawyer, Shellabarger, Sloan, Starr, Stilwell, Strouse, John L. Thomas, Thornton, Trimble, Van Aernam, Robert T. Van Horn, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, Whaley, Williams, Stephen F. Wilson, Winfield, and Wright—82.

So the motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

CUSTOM-HOUSE FRAUDS, ETC.

Mr. HIGBY submitted the following resolution, upon which he demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Expenditures be instructed to investigate the compromises of frauds upon the revenue which are alleged to have taken place in connection with the custom-house at Boston, and to ascertain what disposition has been made of the moneys paid under such compromises; also, to investigate such other alleged frauds upon the customs or internal revenue as they may deem advisable, and whether any vexatious suits have been commenced against importers and others brought or instigated by any person or persons connected with the customs or internal revenue service in the cities of Boston or New York; and that the committee be authorized to send for persons and papers; and if, in their judgment, it shall be necessary and most economical to take testimony in Boston or New York by such members of the committee as they may designate, not exceeding five in number, such designated members of the committee may have leave to sit during the recess of Congress for the purpose of such investigation, and with the aforesaid powers and authority.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. That resolution embraces very broad powers. If the subject is to be investigated at all, it ought to be investigated by a special committee appointed for that specific purpose.

Mr. HIGBY. I have demanded the previous question on the resolution.

Mr. CHANLER. This resolution touches large commercial interests. The gentleman from California is undoubtedly in earnest in this investigation.

The SPEAKER. If debate arises on the resolution, it goes over under the rule.

Mr. CHANLER. Well, I wish to debate the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California has demanded the previous question.

Mr. CHANLER. Can the gentleman yield the floor under that call?

The SPEAKER. He cannot. A single objection would take the resolution over.

Mr. HIGBY. If the House would permit me to send a paper to the Clerk's desk and allow it to be read for information, I think gentlemen would change their minds about this resolution.

Mr. SPALDING. I object to debate unless the gentleman withdraws the demand for the previous question.

Mr. DAWES. I hope the gentleman will not press the demand for the previous question upon a resolution like this and allow no one to be heard upon it.

Mr. CONKLING. I rise for information. I would inquire if it is not in order, as a matter of right, for the gentleman from California, [Mr. HIGBY,] in offering this resolution, to have read any papers that accompany it.

The SPEAKER. It is not; that is in the nature of debate.

Mr. DAWES. It is due to the character and object of the resolution that it should not be passed under the previous question.

Mr. SPALDING. I object to debate.

Mr. DAWES. I hope the previous question will not be sustained.

The question was put on seconding the demand for the previous question; and there were—ayes 17, noes 43; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. HIGBY and CHANLER were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 35, noes 62.

So the House refused to second the demand for the previous question.

Mr. DAWES. I rise to debate the resolution.

The SPEAKER. Then the resolution goes over under the rule.

COMBUSTIBLE MATERIALS.

Mr. McRUER, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the subject of the storage and transportation of combustible and explosive materials, and to report at any time, by bill or otherwise, what measures, if any, are necessary to secure better protection to life and property.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I desire to say that after the morning hour I shall ask the attention of the House to that very subject from the Committee on Commerce.

AGRICULTURAL DEPARTMENT.

Mr. DONNELLY submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Whereas one great object contemplated in the establishment of the Agricultural Department was the distribution of valuable seeds and plants among the people of the United States; Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Agriculture be directed to inquire into the money value of the quota of seeds and plants received by the members of Congress from the Department; what proportion the same holds to the whole appropriation for that purpose; whether a much larger quota could not be obtained by advertisement and contracts with the gardeners and nurserymen of the country; and generally what steps are necessary to increase the efficiency of the Agricultural Department.

RECONSTRUCTION—TENNESSEE.

Mr. LATHAM submitted the following preamble and resolutions:

Whereas the committee on reconstruction has reported that the people of Tennessee are found to be in a condition to exercise the functions of a State within this Union; and whereas, by the information received through the investigations of said committee and through other channels, it is the sense of this House that the people of said State are entitled to representation herein: Therefore,

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring), That the committee on reconstruction be, and the same is hereby, relieved from the further consideration of all matters pertaining to the representation of the State of Tennessee in this House.

Resolved, That the credentials of the Representatives-elect from said State be, and the same are hereby, referred to the Committee of Elections, with leave to report at any time, and with instructions to report as soon as practicable upon the elections, returns, and qualifications of each of said Representatives-elect.

Mr. BROOMALL. I would ask if that does not go to the committee on reconstruction without debate.

Mr. LATHAM. The resolution is to relieve the committee from the further consideration of the subject so far as the State of Tennessee is concerned.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will examine the resolution.

Mr. BROOMALL. I hold that the concurrent resolution of the two Houses cannot be repealed in this way.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would rule that the first resolution offered by the gentleman from West Virginia, [Mr. LATHAM,] being a concurrent resolution, is in order. But the second resolution, being a simple resolution of the House, would not be in order at present. If the first resolution should be concurred in by the Senate, being a concurrent resolution, then the committee on reconstruction would be required under it to report back the credentials of Representatives-elect from Tennessee; and then the House would take such action as they pleased in regard to them.

Mr. LATHAM. I will withdraw the second resolution.

Mr. BROOMALL. Can that be done now?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has the right to withdraw his resolution or to modify it before any vote has been taken.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I understand the Speaker to say that if the Senate should concur in the resolution then this committee on reconstruction would be discharged from the further consideration of the credentials in question. I rise to a point of order, that the Senate has nothing to do with credentials of members-elect to this House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order. The resolution reads, "the Senate concurring," and the gentleman who offered it has thus submitted it as a concurrent resolution.

Mr. BROOMALL. Is that resolution in order under this call?

The SPEAKER. It is. A resolution of the House can be rescinded by a subsequent resolution of the House, introduced by any member under the regular call of the States. But this is a concurrent resolution, and though offered in order, requires by its language the action of the Senate.

Mr. CONKLING. I rise to a question of order.

The whole subject of the resolution having been referred to a committee, I allude to the joint committee and to the joint action of the two Houses, and that committee not having asked to be discharged, and the time to reconsider the reference having passed, it is not now in order, by a new resolution, passed by a mere majority, and not under a suspension of the rules, to bring the matter back into the House for consideration. If the point of order is not supported by the ground I have stated, I submit another ground.

The committee having possession of this subject has made a report to the House. That report is still pending. A motion to recommend the report was adopted, but a motion to reconsider the recommendation was entered and still stands. This arrested the subject on its way back to the joint committee, and left it before the House. Thus it is out of order to discharge the committee of the subject, because the House and not the committee has possession of it now. It cannot be brought up in the manner proposed.

Mr. ROSS. Is it in order for the gentleman from New York [Mr. CONKLING] to make a speech now?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that the gentleman from New York has not gone beyond fully stating the point of order.

Mr. ROSS. He seemed to me to be making quite a speech.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the first part of the point of order, and sustains the second part, which is that the committee on reconstruction have reported on the credentials from Tennessee; that the report was recommended to that committee, and that, while a motion to reconsider is pending, the report is before the House and not before the committee. The question in regard to Tennessee is not before the committee on reconstruction, but before the House.

Mr. FINCK. I rise to a point of order. Has not the report of the committee in regard to Tennessee been recommitted?

The SPEAKER. It has; but the motion to reconsider is pending, which arrests the action of the House.

Mr. FINCK. Is it not always in the power of the House to discharge a committee?

The SPEAKER. It is, if the matter is before the committee; but, as stated by the gentleman from New York, the matter is not before the committee, but before the House, pending a motion to reconsider.

Mr. LATHAM. What will be the first vote taken on the motion to reconsider?

The SPEAKER. The first vote will be on the reconsideration of the vote by which the subject was recommitted. The Clerk will read from page 164 of Barclay's Digest.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"49. When a motion has been once made, and carried in the affirmative or negative, it shall be in order for any member of the majority to move for the reconsideration thereof—on the same or succeeding day—and such motion shall take precedence of all other questions, except a motion to adjourn, and shall not be withdrawn after the said succeeding day without the consent of the House; and thereafter any member may call it up for consideration."

Mr. LATHAM. My inquiry is, what will be the first vote taken by the House on the motion to reconsider?

The SPEAKER. To reconsider the vote by which the report in the Tennessee case was recommitted to the committee on reconstruction. That can be called up at any time when the House is not engaged in the transaction of other business.

Mr. LATHAM. If the House reconsider that vote, what would be the next vote?

The SPEAKER. The subject would be before the House—not recommitted to the committee.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Does the Chair decide that the committee have not the subject in charge?

The SPEAKER. The subject is not before the committee pending the motion to reconsider, which can be called up at any time when the House is not engaged in other business.

Mr. ROSS. Is there no chance by which the House can get rid of this committee?

The SPEAKER. That is not germane to the question before the House.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. DELANO. I take an appeal from the decision of the Chair in reference to the Tennessee credentials.

The SPEAKER. The appeal is entertained but is not debatable, as it has been made at a time when debate is not in order, and upon a question growing out of an undebatable subject.

Mr. CONKLING. I move that the appeal be laid upon the table.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. DELANO. As the appeal is not debatable I withdraw it.

INDIAN DEPREDACTIONS.

Mr. HITCHCOCK, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to provide for the relief of persons for damages sustained by reason of depredations and injuries by certain bands of Arrapahoes, Cheyenne, and Sioux Indians; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

FIRST REGIMENT COLORADO MILITIA.

Mr. BRADFORD, by unanimous consent, submitted the following preamble and resolution; which were read, considered, and agreed to:

Whereas it is represented that a certain regiment of militia, known as the first regiment of Colorado mounted militia, was in the winter of 1865 mustered into the service of the United States by order of Colonel Thomas Moonlight, then commanding the district of Colorado, and that they remained in the service for several months, the horses and a portion of the equipments being supplied from private means, and that said regiment was discharged without compensation; Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the facts, and if they find them to be substantially true as stated, to report a bill providing such compensation as may be just and proper.

SUPPORT OF INDIAN TRIBES.

Mr. BURLINGHAM, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be requested to furnish this House with a full statement of all money on hand, on the 10th day of July, 1865, applicable to the support of the various Indian tribes, and for all other purposes connected with the Indian service. Also, the entire amount which has been expended since that time and up to the 20th day of April, 1866, and the objects for which such expenditures have been made, together with the amount now on hand applicable to said service under the following heads. Also the amount which has been expended, over and above the appropriations already made, namely:

Pay of superintendents and agents, pay of sub-agents, pay of temporary clerks by superintendents, pay of interpreters, pay for presents to Indians, pay for provisions for Indians, pay for agency buildings and repairs, for contingent expenses of the Indian department, for making treaties with Indian tribes, for transportation of Indian annuity goods, support of refugee Indians in the southern and middle superintendencies, amount expended for support of refugee and other Indians over and above the amount heretofore appropriated.

TRIAL OF JEFFERSON DAVIS.

The SPEAKER. The next business in order is the following resolution offered by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. JULIAN,] which was laid over one day under the rule:

Resolved, (as the deliberate judgment of this House,) That the speedy trial of Jefferson Davis, either by a civil or military tribunal, for the crime of treason or the other crimes of which he stands charged, and his prompt execution, if found guilty, are imperatively demanded by the people of the United States in order that treason may be adequately branded by the nation, traitors made infamous, and the repetition of their crimes, as far as possible, be prevented.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I suggest to the gentleman to refer that to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. JULIAN. Mr. Speaker, is this resolution now debatable?

The SPEAKER. It is; it was laid over under the rule for debate.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. The morning hour will expire in one minute.

Mr. JULIAN. I demand the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. SMITH. I desire to debate it.

The SPEAKER. If the previous question is not seconded it will then be open for debate.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask that the resolution be again reported.

The SPEAKER. It will again be reported if there is no objection.

Mr. JULIAN. I object.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Has not the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. Not yet.

The previous question was seconded—ayes 50, noes 42.

Mr. ANCONA. I demand tellers on seconding the demand for the previous question.

The SPEAKER. It is too late.

Mr. ANCONA. Then I demand tellers on ordering the main question.

Mr. HARRIS. Is the resolution debatable?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. CHANLER. Is it in order to move to lay the resolution on the table?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. CHANLER. I make that motion, and demand the yeas and nays upon it.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I again ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JULIAN] to permit this to go to the Committee on the Judiciary, who are now investigating that charge and taking testimony.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. I do not see that this resolution involves any doubtful question upon which we need the advice of the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Is it in order to move an amendment?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JULIAN] to allow the word "military" to be stricken out, so as to leave it that he shall be tried by a civil tribunal. Then there will be no objection to it.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope it will not be stricken out, but that we shall have full power to try him.

Mr. HARRIS. I rise to a point of order, that the resolution presents a question which this House has no authority whatever to pass upon.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the question of order. It is not a question of order; it is a matter for the discretion of the House.

Mr. JULIAN. I conceive no possible reason for declining a direct vote on the proposition, and I therefore ask for a vote of the House on the resolution as it stands.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Is it in order to move as an amendment to refer the resolution to the Judiciary Committee?

The SPEAKER. It is not, the previous question having been seconded.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Does the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JULIAN] decline to modify his resolution?

The SPEAKER. He does; and it would require unanimous consent to modify it.

Mr. BINGHAM. Is it in order to move to reconsider the vote by which the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The motion to lay on the table prevents it.

Mr. BINGHAM. I hope the gentleman from New York [Mr. CHANLER] will withdraw that motion, in order that I may move to reconsider.

Mr. CHANLER. What is the motive of the gentleman in making that motion?

Mr. BINGHAM. If the gentleman will withdraw his motion to lay the resolution on the table, I will move to reconsider the vote by which the previous question was seconded, so that I may move to refer the resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CHANLER. Then I withdraw.

The question being put on the motion to reconsider the vote by which the previous question was seconded, there were—ayes 80, noes 33.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman cannot demand the yeas and nays on this motion. He may demand tellers.

Mr. COBB. I call for tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

The SPEAKER accordingly declared the resolution reconsidered.

The question recurred upon seconding the demand for the previous question; and being put there were—ayes 21, noes 71.

So the previous question was not seconded.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired.

Mr. SCHENCK. I call for the regular order of business.

THE TEST OATH.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to make an adverse report on the message of the President, with accompanying communications, recommending a modification of the test oath, that it may be laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER. That can only be done by unanimous consent or under a suspension of the rules.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Then I move to suspend the rules so as to enable me to make the report. [Cries of "There is no objection."]

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I merely ask that the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from the further consideration of the subject and that the report be laid upon the table and printed.

Mr. ROGERS. I desire to present a minority report in favor of the recommendation of the President.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I object to the reception of the report.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I move a suspension of the rules.

The question was taken; and two thirds voting in favor thereof, the rules were suspended.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, the Committee on the Judiciary was discharged from the further consideration of the message of the President of the United States transmitting communications from the Secretary of the Treasury and the Postmaster General, requesting a modification of the oath of office prescribed by the act of Congress approved July 2, 1862, and the same was laid upon the table, and the report of the committee ordered to be printed.

Mr. ROGERS submitted a minority report upon the same subject; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, moved to reconsider the vote by which the report of the Committee on the Judiciary was disposed of; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PREVENTION OF CHOLERA.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move to suspend the rules to enable me to report from the Committee on Commerce, for action at this time, a joint resolution to prevent the introduction of cholera into the ports of the United States.

The question was taken; and two thirds voting in favor thereof, the rules were suspended.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, then, from the Committee on Commerce, reported the joint resolution; which was read a first and second time.

The joint resolution authorizes the President of the United States to make and carry into effect such orders and regulations of quarantine as in his opinion may be deemed necessary and proper, in aid of State or municipal authorities, to guard against the introduction of cholera into the ports of the United States.

It further authorizes the President to empower military and naval commanders in ports and places in States that have been or are in insurrection to enforce such quarantine regulations as may be deemed necessary for the purpose of guarding against the introduction of cholera or yellow fever, and providing for a proper course of treatment of patients.

The resolution also appropriates such amount of money as may be necessary to carry the joint resolution into effect.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I rise to a point of order. I submit that, as the joint resolution makes an appropriation, it must have its first consideration in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will observe that the suspension of the rules suspended that rule as well as all others. The motion was to suspend the rules that the joint resolution might be considered in the House at this time.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Then I wish to suggest to the gentleman from Illinois that there ought to be some limit to the amount of the appropriation.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The committee considered that point, and they did not fix any limit to the amount of the appropriation because it was impossible to tell how much or how little would be needed. It is a matter which must necessarily be left to the discretion of the Departments. I would be in favor of fixing a very small sum if the object could be accomplished. But the yellow fever is now prevailing in some of the ports and in other places in the South, and the Secretary of War has issued an order rather outside of his authority, and unless some provision of this kind shall be made he says he will have to revoke that order. I hope, therefore, the House will pass the joint resolution, and I demand the previous question upon it.

The previous question was seconded and the main question was ordered.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NITRO-GLYCERINE.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, gave notice that the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the subject of the necessary legislation to protect life and property from the dangerous explosive properties of nitro-glycerine, with leave to report upon the subject at any time, would probably be prepared to report on Thursday next, at which time they would ask the action of the House upon the subject.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing was here received from the President of the United States, by Hon. EDMUND COOPER, acting Private Secretary; also a message that he had approved and signed bills and joint resolutions of the following titles, namely:

An act (H. R. No. 18) to authorize the sale of marine hospitals and of revenue-cutters;

An act (H. R. No. 25) for the relief of Thomas Hurly;

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 88) expressive of the thanks of Congress to Major General Winfield S. Hancock;

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 102) for the relief of Alexander Thompson late United States consul at Maranham; and Joint resolution (H. R. No. 108) appointing managers for the National Asylum for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers.

REORGANIZATION OF THE ARMY.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 361) entitled "An act to reorganize and establish the Army of the United States."

The following section was under consideration:

SEC. 16. And be it further enacted, That the quartermaster's department of the Army shall hereafter consist of one quartermaster general, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a brigadier general; six quartermasters, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of colonels of cavalry; ten quartermasters, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of lieutenant colonels of cavalry; fifteen quartermasters, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of majors of cavalry; forty-four quartermasters, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of captains of cavalry; and at least two thirds of all original vacancies in each of the grades of lieutenant colonel or major, and all original vacancies in the grade of captain shall be filled by selection from among those persons who have rendered meritorious service as assistant quartermasters of volunteers in the Army of the United States in the late war. But after the first appointments made under the provisions of this section, as vacancies may occur in the grades of major and captain in this department, no appointments to fill the same shall be made until the number of majors shall be reduced to twelve and the number of captains to thirty, and thereafter the number of officers in each of said grades shall continue to conform to said reduced numbers.

The following amendment had been moved by Mr. DAVIS:

Strike out all after the enacting clause of the section and insert the following:

That the quartermaster's department of the Army shall hereafter consist of one quartermaster general, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a brigadier general; four assistant quartermasters general, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of colonels of cavalry; eight deputy quartermasters general, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of lieutenant colonels of cavalry; sixteen quartermasters, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of majors of cavalry; and forty-eight assistant quartermasters, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of captains of cavalry, and the vacancies hereby created in the grade of assistant quartermaster shall be filled by selection from among the persons who have rendered meritorious service as assistant quartermasters of volunteers during two years of the war.

The pending question was upon the following amendment proposed by Mr. SCHENCK to the original section:

Add to section sixteen the following:

But nothing in this section shall be construed so as to affect the commission of any officer now commissioned, either as acting quartermaster general or as deputy quartermaster general or as assistant quartermaster general, but only to change the title to quartermaster in the case of those who rank as colonels, lieutenant colonels, majors, and captains, without affecting in any way their relative positions or the time from which they take such rank.

The question was taken, and the amendment of Mr. SCHENCK was agreed to.

The question recurred upon the amendment of Mr. DAVIS.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to amend the amendment by adding the following:

But as vacancies may occur in the grades of major and captain in this department no appointments to fill the same shall be made until the number of majors shall be reduced to twelve and the number of captains to thirty, and thereafter the number of officers in each of said grades shall continue to conform to said reduced numbers.

The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. THAYER] and accepted by the gentleman from New York [Mr. DAVIS] in lieu of one he had offered does not conform, as I will hereafter show, to what was recommended by the military officers to which this matter was submitted. There has been a great deal of misapprehension upon that matter, which has been persistently pressed upon this House, all of which I mean to clear up by the record.

But I confine myself now to proposing to amend the substitute by adding to it that which I have read, and which is contained in the original section, eventually reducing the number of those officers with a view to guarding against the continued increase of the force in the quartermaster's department, and bringing it down, even in case the substitute should be adopted, to the point to which the committee think it should be brought, by legislation looking to the future sufficiency of the quartermaster's department.

Now, I have already said to this House that there has been a continued effort made to increase the number of officers and to increase their rank in the different bureaus or staff departments stationed here at Washington. And I have said to the House that I was prepared to expect that, whenever any committee felt it their duty to report against this gradual progress in the increase of numbers, rank, and pay in these staff departments, there would be a general outcry from those departments, which would be felt in its influence upon this House; and, as I once before said, that influence has gone far beyond my expectations. This House has already passed upon the Adjutant General's department, and has added two colonels and one lieutenant colonel beyond what was ever recommended by anybody outside of this House, and beyond what was asked for by the Adjutant General's department itself. That the House has already done.

Mr. CONKLING. If the gentleman will allow me, I desire to say that I have no doubt the fact is precisely as he states it; and I wish to say for one that, such being the effect of the section, I voted under an entire misapprehension; I understood the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. THAYER] to receive from a member of the committee the assurance that the effect of the amendment would be to leave the matter precisely as it stood; and when afterward the chairman of the committee showed us the effect of that amendment, I am satisfied that it took entirely by surprise a large number of those who had voted for it.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am assured by two or three gentlemen around me that they voted under a misapprehension; and I desire to prevent any such misapprehension in the future.

Mr. THAYER. Will the gentleman allow me to correct an erroneous statement?

Mr. SCHENCK. I will give the gentleman an opportunity to make the correction when I get through.

Now, sir, I think myself that the House, in voting upon the proposition made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, did not understand that he had accepted a modification proposed by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE], which introduced an entirely new feature. I am sorry that the gentleman from Maine, my colleague on the committee, is not present at this time, because I wish that the history of this matter shall be fully understood. It was proposed by the gentleman to go further than the Department itself had asked, because if we did not do so, certain friends of his would not get promotion. He urged that we must provide for two additional colonels and one lieutenant colonel; otherwise there would not be the promotion which he desired; and he accompanied this suggestion with the very persuasive remark to me that his proposition would also promote a friend of mine from my own State, in the Adjutant General's Office, Mr. Vincent, an officer well deserving promotion. But I preferred to adhere to what I thought right for the bill and for the country, not yielding to my personal predilections. The House, however, was more liberal, and concluded to make a couple of colonels and a lieutenant colonel that had never been asked for by anybody prior to the proposition of the gentleman from Maine. And so the matter now stands. I desire that no more such mistakes shall be made; and none shall be, if I can prevent it.

Now, sir, the committee, in examining with reference to the quartermaster's department and other bureaus, have become satisfied that there is a tendency to concentrate too great a force of officers in all the different staff departments, and that this abuse ought to be stopped. They have therefore proposed that as vacancies occur the number of quartermasters in two of the lower grades shall be reduced by not filling the vacancies until the number of those officers comes down to a point which the committee are satisfied will furnish a sufficient number of officers of this department to take charge of all the different posts, to supply all the troops, and to take care of matters here at the center.

Mr. Speaker, there is something to be learned upon this subject by comparing different departments of the Government; and I mean to do it here this morning with a view to showing the extent to which this evil has grown in the War Department. I have long been aware that in the Navy Department, where there is not the temptation for officers to seek to be brought here because of commutation of quarters, commutation of fuel, and other little advantages which pertain to the position of an Army officer here, everything has been conducted upon a very much more economical scale, by calling a very much smaller number of officers into the different bureaus here. But I was not prepared to find so great an inequality as is shown by an investigation which I made on Saturday last.

Leaving out the steam engineering department, where fifteen men are necessarily employed professionally in drafting plans relating to the construction of steam engines, and coming to the bureaus proper in that Department, I find that the Bureau of Medicine is managed by four officers only; the Bureau of Provisions by four; the Ordnance Bureau by one, its chief; the Bureau of Navigation and Detail by six; the Bureau of Equipment, the Bureau of Yards and Docks, and the Bureau of Construction by one each, their respective chiefs. Thus eighteen officers only take charge of seven bureaus in the Navy Department.

Now, there is not a single bureau in the War Department that has not twice as many officers to look after it.

Why do they come here? I admit the chief of each bureau ought to be a professional military man; I admit the heads of divisions might properly be; but I contend it is not necessary to have a lieutenant colonel, so far as absolute rank is concerned, a brevet major general, employed to keep the records in any one of these offices simply as a clerk, and yet I say that is done. I say all through these departments—in the Adjutant General's department to a certain extent, still more in the quartermaster's department, and still more, perhaps, in the other departments—men are employed, receiving commutation of quarters, commutation of fuel, professional men, men who have been educated for the most part at four years' expense at West Point in engineering, gunnery, and military tactics, acting as clerks.

I want to know whether the committee will be sustained in bringing down these contract bureaus to such a point as will be sufficient to supply each staff department all the officers needed so as to send some of them out into the field with troops and to posts, diminishing the number there and supplying, if need be, intelligent clerks at less expense and without military education for that purpose. The committee came to this conclusion, and they made it a feature of their bill. I move the same feature to the substitute offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. THAYER,] in order, if his substitute prevail, as I hope it will not, it shall not prevail without having this appended to it providing for a diminution of unnecessary number of officers employed in the staff departments.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania desires to make some reply in explanation of what was said by the gentleman from New York, and I yield for that purpose.

Mr. THAYER. I prefer to wait until the gentleman has finished what he has to say.

Mr. SCHENCK. I yield the floor, then, altogether.

Mr. THAYER. Mr. Speaker, I will, in the first place, clear up the matter referred to by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CONKLING.] The House will remember that when I proposed as a substitute for the section of the bill now under consideration the corresponding section of the Senate bill No. 138, relating to the Adjutant General's department, a suggestion was made by a member of the Military Committee, the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE,] to modify the substitute which I had offered. The effect of that modification was to increase the rank of three of the officers in the Adjutant General's department. It did not occur to me on the instant, (although if there had been opportunity for reflection it would probably have occurred to me) that the effect of the modification proposed was to increase not only the rank but the pay of those officers also. The modification having been offered by a member of the Military Committee I was induced to accept it. I was led to suppose by its proceeding from that source that it was a modification favored by that committee, and it did not strike me as particularly objectionable. Subsequently, when my colleague [Mr. STEVENS] pointed out the fact to the House that it would increase the expenses of the Government, and when it was too late for me to get rid of the modification, I distinctly informed the House of the then existing position of the question.

I told the House at that time that if I had been aware that the effect of the modification proposed by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] was to add to the expenses of the Government I would not have accepted it; and I gave the House notice that if they chose to vote down the modified substitute then pending I would immediately offer my original substitute without the modification. The substitute went to the House in that shape with full notice of the existing state of the question, and the substitute as modified by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] was adopted by the House.

I have alluded to this because I do not wish it to be understood that if there was any misapprehension on the part of the House in the vote which was cast upon that occasion, the blame of it can in any measure be laid at my door.

I desire now to say a few words upon the question now before the House. I am well aware, sir, that the proposition contained in Senate bill No. 138, with regard to the organization of the quartermaster's department, is not the precise proposition which was indorsed and approved by the distinguished generals who were consulted upon these questions. I refer to Lieutenant General Grant and to Generals Sherman, Thomas, and Meade. What they did approve was the organization of the Army as proposed in Senate bill No. 67, known as Mr. Wilson's bill, for which Senate bill No. 138 was offered as a substitute, and was finally adopted by that body.

What I wish to call the attention of the House to is the fact that the organization of the quartermaster's department, which was approved by the distinguished generals referred to, was the organization contemplated in Senate bill No. 67.

Now, I have prepared a comparative statement showing the organization of this department of the Army at the present time, what it would be under Senate bill No. 67, approved by the generals of the Army who had this matter under consideration, what it would be under Senate bill No. 138 which passed the Senate, and what it is proposed to be under the House bill now under consideration. It is as follows:

Present organization.		Senate bill No. 67.		* Senate bill No. 138.		House bill No. 381.
Quartermaster General.....	1	Quartermaster General.....	1	Quartermaster General.....	4	Quartermaster General.....	1
Assistant Quartermaster Generals.....	3	Assistant Quartermaster Generals.....	6	Assistant Quartermaster Generals.....	4	Quartermasters (colonels).....	6
Deputy Quartermaster Generals.....	4	Deputy Quartermaster Generals.....	12	Deputy Quartermaster Generals.....	8	Quartermasters (lieutenant colonels).....	10
Quartermasters.....	11	Quartermasters.....	20	Quartermasters.....	16	Quartermasters (majors).....	15
Assistant Quartermasters.....	46	Assistant Quartermasters.....	48	Assistant Quartermasters.....	48	Quartermasters (captains).....	44
Total.....	65	Total.....	87	Total.....	90	Total.....	76

At the present time the number of quartermasters is sixty-five, including the Quartermaster General and all the members of his staff. Under Senate bill No. 67, the total number of the staff would be eighty-seven. That was the bill approved by Generals Grant, Meade, Sherman, and Thomas. Under Senate bill No. 138, Comparison of the present and of the proposed organization of the quartermaster's department of the Army, according to the bills which have been presented by the Military Committees of the Senate and House of Representatives.

which passed that body, the number is eighty, or seven officers less than the bill recommended by those generals.

Mr. SCHENCK. Will the gentleman allow me to ask upon what authority he states that those generals recommended eighty-seven?

Mr. THAYER. I state it on the authority of a letter which I hold in my hand written by the chairman of the Military Committee of the Senate.

Mr. SCHENCK. I state on the authority of the bill which I hold in my hand that it is not so.

Mr. THAYER. Then the issue is between the two chairmen, and I shall not undertake to settle the difference between them.

Mr. SCHENCK. No, sir, the issue is between the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate, I insist, and his own bill which I hold in my hand.

Mr. THAYER. There is no issue between the Senate bill No. 67, and the statement which I have made. The statement in the letter accords with Senate bill No. 67, which was Mr. Wilson's bill, and the gentleman is incorrect in undertaking to deny that it is so. If there is an issue between the gentleman from Ohio and the chairman of the Military Committee of the Senate, I have nothing to do with that. I shall not undertake to settle the differences between the two committees of the respective Houses any more than I shall undertake to settle the differences which notoriously exist in the gentleman's own committee. That is a matter which I leave to him to adjust. I am now engaged in pointing out to the House the fact that in the Senate bill approved by the major generals who had these subjects under consideration, the number of officers proposed for the quartermaster's staff was eighty-seven, that in the bill now before the House the number is seventy-six, and that in the substitute for the section which I offered it is seventy-seven. So that the House will perceive that the number of officers embraced in the Quartermaster General's staff by the bill which passed the Senate, No. 188, and which is the same as my substitute, excepting that in the latter the three chief assistant quartermasters are omitted is seven fewer than was contained in the Senate bill 67, which was approved by the generals who had this matter under advisement.

Now, sir, from the remarks that were made by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs when this bill was last under consideration, one might be led to suppose that the substitute which I have offered for this section, which is the Senate section with the alterations that I have adverted to, provides for a larger and more expensive staff than that which is recommended by the Military Committee of this House. I wish, by a very few figures, to point out the total incorrectness of any such representation.

Now, it will be perceived by any gentleman who will take the trouble to analyze these two bills—I mean Senate bill No. 188, which passed that body, and the bill now before the House—that although by the Senate bill, with the three chief assistant quartermasters left out, as in my substitute, there is one more quartermaster in the department than is provided for in the House bill, yet the expense of the number provided for is actually less, and I can demonstrate it to the satisfaction of the House in a very few moments.

The gentleman's bill provides a staff for this department of six colonels, each of whom receive $211 a month; ten lieutenant colonels who receive $187 apiece per month; fifteen majors who receive $163 per month apiece; and forty-four captains who are paid $129 50 apiece per month. The aggregate monthly expenditure, therefore, of the gentleman's bill for quartermasters (I leave out, of course, the Quartermaster General in these calculations, because he is in both bills,) will be $11,279 per month.

Now, if you take the substitute, you will find that, instead of providing for six colonels, it gives only four colonels; that it gives, instead of ten lieutenant colonels, only eight lieutenant colonels; that it gives you instead of fifteen majors, sixteen majors—one more than is provided for in the House bill; and that it gives you forty-eight captains instead of forty-four captains.

The pay of the four colonels provided for by the Senate bill at $211 per month amounts to $844; the pay of eight lieutenant colonels at $187 a month to $1,496; the pay of sixteen majors at $163 a month to $2,608; and the pay of forty-eight captains at $129 50 per month to $6,216. The aggregate monthly expense, therefore, of the officers called for by the substitute I have offered amounts to $11,164, being exactly $115 less per month than the expense under the House bill, although the substitute provides for one officer more. The annual difference between the two propositions is, therefore, $1,380 in favor of the substitute which has in it one more quartermaster than is provided for in the House bill.

Now, if there is any mistake about this, I invite the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs to this calculation, and ask him to point out, if it is possible for him to do so, wherein this calculation is erroneous. I state without any apprehension of denial that the result is as I state it.

The gentleman made a great display on Friday last in a comparison which he instituted between my proposition and his own bill, and he gave the impression to this House that the former created a more numerous and expensive organization than his own bill; instead of which, in point of fact, it now appears by figures that the former, although it provides for one more quartermaster than the gentleman's bill, is cheaper than his bill by $1,380 per annum. So much for that. I think I have disposed of the argument which rests upon the assertion that the substitute proposes any expense on the part of the Government exceeding that contemplated by the bill of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. PAINE. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania allow me to inquire whether in his estimate of the comparative cost of the quartermaster's department, as provided in the Senate bill and in the bill now reported by the committee, he has allowed for the three brigadier generals in that department?

Mr. THAYER. No, sir.

Mr. PAINE. Well, he has spoken of the bill which he has been comparing with the House bill as the Senate bill. I ask him if that bill does not provide for three brigadier generals.

Mr. THAYER. I will answer the gentleman. The bill as it passed the Senate did so provide, as I have repeatedly said, but I hope the gentleman will now understand that in the substitute which I have offered, I struck out the three chief assistant quartermasters, who are brigadiers.

Mr. PAINE. Will the gentleman permit me to ask whether he is not comparing the section of the bill now before the House with his own section rather than with the section of the bill which passed the Senate?

Mr. THAYER. When I speak of the Senate provision upon this subject, I speak of the substitute which I offered, and which is the precise language of the Senate bill, with the provision relating to the three chief assistant quartermasters stricken out.

Mr. SCHENCK. As the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. THAYER] is giving us his calculations, will he tell us at what he puts the pay of a colonel?

Mr. THAYER. At $211 a month.

Mr. SCHENCK. What yearly pay and compensation?

Mr. THAYER. The gentleman will observe that I have made my comparison by the monthly pay.

Mr. SCHENCK. I undertake to say that somebody has very greatly imposed upon the gentleman. I say that every colonel on duty here in the quartermaster's department receives $4,630 81 a year, including his forage in kind, which is $417. Taking that out, and it will leave him $4,213 81. And I say every portion of the pay furnished to the gentleman, and upon which he has based his calculations, is utterly wrong.

Mr. THAYER. Does the gentleman mean to deny that $211 per month is the pay allowed by law to a colonel?

Mr. SCHENCK. What is called "pay proper" is one thing; the actual pay and allowances is another and quite a different thing.

Mr. THAYER. The "pay proper" is what I mean.

Mr. SCHENCK. That is a small matter. And a colonel on service in the quartermaster's department gets more than a colonel of infantry on duty elsewhere, for he draws pay as a colonel of cavalry. He is allowed commutation for two servants at thirty-two dollars a month or $384 a year; clothing for two servants, thirteen dollars a month or $156 a year; subsistence for three hundred and sixty-five days at six rations a day for himself, and two rations a day for servants, two thousand nine hundred and twenty rations, or $876 a year. He is also allowed forage in kind for two horses, which, at the present estimate at the quartermaster's department, will amount to $417 a year. And then he is allowed as commutation for fuel $397 81 a year. And he is also allowed for quarters, which in Washington is at the rate of eighteen dollars a room per month, while elsewhere it is nine dollars a room, except in New York where it is twelve dollars, the sum of $1,080 a year, making in all $4,450 81 a year. Then there is the difference between a colonel of infantry and a colonel of cavalry, $180; making the whole pay and allowances of a colonel of cavalry in the quartermaster's department $4,630 81. From this may be deducted forage, which is in kind, while all the rest is in money, $417. And to be very exact about it, that will give the amount of money paid to a colonel in the quartermaster's department as $4,213 81 a year. Now, I am stating some things here which have not been furnished to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. THAYER] upon which to base his calculations.

Mr. THAYER. If the gentleman's furniture is as good as mine he will have no reason to complain of its quality.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mine is from the pay department.

Mr. THAYER. I am much obliged to the gentleman for the statement he has made, for he has furnished me with an additional argument against his bill. He says that I have not included in my calculations the allowances to these officers; and he speaks of the large allowances made to these colonels and lieutenant colonels. Have I not told the House, and does not the House perceive, that the gentleman's bill provides for six colonels, while my substitute proposes only four colonels? The gentleman's bill provides for ten lieutenant colonels, while my substitute proposes only eight lieutenant colonels.

Mr. SCHENCK. The gentleman will not be so much obliged for the argument he says I have furnished him if he will look at the lower grades of majors and captains. The allowances made to the lower grades are greater in proportion to the pay proper than those made to the upper grades.

As, for instance, a major of infantry gets $864 for quarters, and $359 31 for fuel; being thirty-eight dollars less than the allowance to a colonel for fuel, and a little more than one hundred dollars less for quarters. The same thing is found to be true all the way down. The lower you get as to grade the larger in proportion to pay are the allowances. I am speaking of that for which I have the figures. A second lieutenant stationed at Washington gets $2,088 41, some five or six hundred dollars more than the amount received by a second lieutenant in the field.

Mr. THAYER. If the gentleman shall succeed in convincing this House that a captain gets more in the way of commutation and allowances than a colonel or a lieutenant colonel, then there will be some force in the remarks which he has made. But I apprehend that he will run against very hard facts and figures in attempting to sustain any such position. Everybody knows that the contrary is true, and that the higher officers get more by way of allowances than the subalterns. The gentleman is, in my judgment, very bold in undertaking a denial of this.

Mr. SCHENCK. What I said was that the lower the grade the greater are the allowances in proportion to the pay.

Mr. THAYER. Now, sir, I have pointed out to the House the fact that the amendment which I have offered as a substitute proposes but one more officer than the gentleman's bill. The gentleman's bill provides for seventy-six quartermasters; the substitute provides for seventy-seven. And I affirm, with entire confidence in the accuracy of my calculation, that the seventy-seven quartermasters, with the ranks which are assigned them in the substitute now before the House, will be less expensive to the Government than the seventy-six quartermasters provided for in the gentleman's bill. He may figure all day and he cannot make the contrary appear. The reason is that his bill increases the number of the higher grades of officers on the staff.

Now, sir, a few words more and I have done. The gentleman has proposed this morning an amendment looking to a reduction of the staff. For one I am opposed to that reduction. I am opposed to it because I do not believe that the present force is too large for an army upon the present scale. If you desire to organize an army of smaller dimensions than that proposed in this bill, if you will cut down your Army from fifty thousand to thirty thousand men, or if you will to any extent materially reduce its numbers you may diminish the staff. But what I say is, that these distinguished generals, with all their vast experience and personal knowledge, recommended for an army of forty-five thousand men, contemplated by bill No. 67 of the Senate, eighty-seven quartermasters for the staff. The number proposed in my substitute is seventy-seven, being, as I have already several times remarked, the same number proposed in Senate bill No. 138, with the three chief assistants stricken out.

Now, sir, I am willing to stand upon the opinions of those distinguished military officers. I say that if in their judgment a staff of eighty-seven officers in the Quartermaster General's department was a sufficiently small staff for such an army as was contemplated by Senate bill No. 67, then it is impossible for me to conclude that seventy-seven, exactly ten officers less, is an immoderate number for a bill which contemplates the organization of an army with, I believe, five thousand more men as a minimum, but which, you will bear in mind, it is possible to expand, under the provisions of the gentleman's bill to, I believe, eighty thousand men.

Now, sir, why legislate upon a contingency which may not exist? If you contemplate a general reduction of the Army, you cannot properly reduce it piecemeal in this way. This is not the way, in my judgment, to begin to reduce an army. You must make the reduction consistent in its details. You must first ascertain the size of your Army; and then when you have concluded upon the extent of the reduction you may set yourself to work to reduce all the several staff corps proportionally. I do not find that the gentleman proposes a general reduction of the other staffs or a reduction of his proposed force. On the contrary, the gentleman's bill proposes an army for a peace establishment. If the Army should be reduced at any time in the future, it will be perfectly competent for Congress to proceed to rearrange the several staff corps, and to adapt them in numbers and details to any reduction which may be made in the force; but why provide for a reduction of the staff corps when you do not provide for a reduction of the Army?

Mr. CHANLER. I feel much gratified, Mr. Speaker, in being able to unite with the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs in his laudable efforts to reduce the organization of the Army. I understand the gentleman's motive, as he has asserted, to be one based upon the peace establishment. I have no doubt that this section is fair. It stipulates the manner in which the reduction is to take place. The reduction, however, seems to be not so much of a consolidation as promotion of officers from the rank they now hold in the Army Register of 1865, promotion from the rank of major to colonel and lieutenant colonel.

Now, the point of issue between the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. THAYER] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] seems to be "whittled down" to the question of two captains of cavalry. The reduction of the armies of the United States is to take this form, with an expenditure of $33,000,000 per annum to support an organization of seventy-two regiments. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] proposes to change the present organization of the Army by simply promoting in the different bureaus different officers from the rank of captain. It seems to me to be reduced to a point of but little difference to the tax-payers, except as to the increase of officers who are promoted.

The number of officers employed in the quartermaster's department, as recorded in the Army Register for 1865, is seventy-eight. The number as suggested by the substitute of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is seventy-seven, and the number suggested by the gentleman from Ohio is seventy-six, a mere reduction of two in the Army of the United States, in face of all the eloquence of the gentleman from Ohio. We have spent two whole days in regard to the propriety of a reduction in the quartermaster's department of two officers holding the rank of captain, while the gentleman proposes an increase in that bureau of the rank of two officers, so that there shall be two colonels. In the section now before the House we have six quartermasters, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a colonel, while in the present organization we have only three. That is a reduction ad absurdum. There are also ten quartermasters with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a lieutenant colonel of cavalry. That is in the pending section of the bill offered by the gentleman from Ohio. The lieutenant colonels in the present organization are four. There happens to be eleven majors in the present organization and fifteen in this bill, while the number of captains is diminished.

Again, sir, by this bill we have a reestablishment of this bureau whereby all the precedents on record in the War Office are changed, whereby all the routine of that Department is threatened with discord and confusion, while the whole question of retrenchment is forgotten in the question of promotion.

Who are to be benefited by this system? Is the object of this bill as has been charged here by gentlemen on the Administration side, not upon this side of the House? The charge has been made specifically and directly that this is a personal question. If there were wanted ground or proof, it would be found in this section, unless refuted by the gentleman from Ohio. Why, sir, under the plea of a peace establishment, should there be promotion of officers in this department unless called for? Where is the necessity? You reduce the Army from its present vast proportion down to seventy-two regiments, and while reducing it you promote the officers left in the organization, and you increase their salary by their promotion.

Sir, a standing army may be a necessity; I mean a standing army of the size suggested by Lieutenant General Grant and the Secretary of War. I do not presume to criticize that necessity, but upon the general argument, whether we should or should not have a large standing army, I stand arrayed against any system which leaves us incumbered with the expense of $33,000,000 per annum for that organization.

We are entitled, the people of the country are entitled, to more consideration after their losses, and with the heavy burdens of taxation imposed upon them.

The period has never existed when a standing army, so far as fitness of the people to protect themselves is concerned, was less needed than at present. The people of the country, on both sides of the Potomac, are an armed militia, ready at the first sound of the bugle or of the drum to fall in line, as they have been in face of each other, against the common enemy.

For the suppression of insurrection there is now, happily, no need. For protection on our borders the force we now have is amply sufficient. And the gentleman on the other side who spoke so eloquently the other day [Mr. HARDING, of Illinois,] and took the lead on this question on the Administration side against a large standing army, said he would undertake with a division of cavalry and of infantry to hold this country in perfect security for all time to come. I understood the gentleman to say that, and I believe he is right. And I hope he will have an opportunity of testing the fact by a proper reduction of the standing Army. Then we will see whether the people of this country are not capable of self-government without the aid of a military organization of such gigantic proportions—gigantic, not in the case of the late struggle, not in consideration of the armies which we have lately had in the field, but gigantic as compared with what has been required in the past history or by the present condition of this country. In view of the fact that peace lies at the bottom of our institutions and that the people are willing at all times to hold themselves in readiness for the defense of the country, standing as the people do to-day, educated to govern themselves, educated in military matters by the militia law in every State, ready to go to the front at their country's call, we need, in my humble opinion, no such gigantic military organization as is proposed by this bill.

Sir, the defense of this country at this time does not depend upon your Army. Admit that the threatened invasion of the northeastern border may be well founded, that cannot be used as a pretext for a large standing army. There is not force enough in the British Provinces to call for such an army as this. A war with Great Britain, if it should ever come, would have to be waged mainly at sea.

And I maintain that this system of retrenchment of the Army is in direct contradiction of the system adopted in regard to the Navy. This is a retrenchment whereby officers are promoted, whereby gentlemen are charged with advancing the interests of their special favorites. But there is a great favorite of this country which won for us much honor, and which has placed our flag as high as it ever floated even in the late civil war, and which has never been treated by this body or by this Administration with due respect. The knife has been applied there without scruple and without consideration. I refer, sir, to the Navy.

I do not know why the gentlemen on the Military Committee should be called upon to state that in the organization of the bureaus of the Army such an immense force is necessary to carry it on, while the Navy requires but a minimum of the same number. That may be the secret. Patronage may underlie it all. It may be that the Army organization is a better machine for political purposes than the Navy can be. If so, so much the greater necessity for retrenchment. I will admit that the necessity of promotions arises in an inverse proportion, but it cannot be that political patronage is the secret of this promotion. It cannot be that, using the position of the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] has been misled from any personal feelings in this question.

Mr. PAINE. As I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. THAYER,] whose amendment we are now considering, and as I believe the House understood him, he bases his proposition upon the supposed approval of the generals whose advice has been brought before both Houses. I may have misunderstood him in this, but I certainly understood him to ask the House to adopt his amendment because it was in substantial conformity with the advice of those generals. I desire now to ask him whether his amendment comes nearer to the form of the recommendation of those generals to whom he alludes.

Mr. THAYER. I think the substitute is much nearer; and if the gentleman will allow me I will correct him a little. What I stated was simply this: that the distinguished generals to whom I referred had recommended Senate bill No. 67, and that that provided for a staff in the quartermaster's department of eighty-seven officers, whereas the substitute does not call for as many by ten; and I used that as an argument with which to rebuke the argument brought forward by the chairman of the committee, [Mr. SCHENCK,] that the number called for in my substitute was an unnecessary number. I did not say nor intimate that the generals had had under consideration my substitute. The gentleman was mistaken if he understood anything of that kind. Nor did I say that they had considered the Senate bill No. 138. If the House will look at Senate bill No. 67, and then look at the gentleman's bill, they will find the greatest discrepancies. The generals did not recommend the abolition of the office of assistant quartermaster general, as the gentleman's bill does, or of the office of deputy quartermaster general. And as to the number of officers, I wish to say to the gentleman from Wisconsin, that they recommend, upon the quartermaster's staff, eighty-seven officers, instead of the much smaller number provided for in the substitute.

Mr. PAINE resumed the floor.

Mr. CONKLING. I want, at some time or other, a little information, and I do not know any gentleman who would be better able to give it to me than the gentleman from Wisconsin. I ask him, therefore, to indicate some point in his remarks when it will be not inconvenient to him that I ask him a question or two.

Mr. PAINE. I will do so with pleasure.

Mr. Speaker, I hold in my hand the bill now before the House reported by the Committee on Military Affairs. I also hold in my hand Senate bill No. 67, which, as I now understand, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. THAYER] embodies substantially the recommendations of the generals.

I find that in the bill now before us there are provided for six quartermasters, with the rank of colonel; in the Senate bill, recommended by the generals, there are also six quartermasters, of the rank of colonel. I find that in the bill before us there are ten quartermasters provided for with the rank of lieutenant colonel; but I find in the Senate bill, No. 67 there are twelve officers of that rank provided for. I find that the bill now before the House provides for fifteen majors, while the Senate bill, to which the gentleman refers, makes provision for twenty officers of that grade. I find that of captains in this service the bill before the House provides for forty-four, while in this Senate bill, which the gentleman says embodies the recommendations of the generals, there are forty-eight officers of that grade provided for.

Now, it seems to me that if the gentleman has presented an amendment here which reduces the number of officers of these several grades below the number provided for in the bill reported by the committee, he is still further from following the recommendations of the generals than the committee itself.

It may be true, as the gentleman has said, that the generals have recommended different titles for these several grades of officers to those the committee of this House have recommended, and in that respect, so far as the mere nomenclature goes, it may be true that the amendment offered by the gentleman, or rather the Senate bill No. 67, is nearer the recommendation of these general officers than the proposition of the House committee. But, leaving out of view the mere question of nomenclature, it appears to me to be very plain that the House committee has approximated vastly nearer to the recommendations of those distinguished generals, in the bill which they have introduced, and which is now before the House, than the distinguished Representative from Pennsylvania has done in the amendment which he offered.

I will now yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CONKLING] for his question.

Mr. CONKLING. I understand that the effect of the section as it is in the House bill is to legislate out three assistant quartermasters general, four deputies quartermasters general, and forty-six assistant quartermasters; making in all fifty-three officers legislated out of the Quartermaster General's Office. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Wisconsin whether the information I have thus received is correct, and if it is, what is the excuse for this indiscriminate slaughter?

Mr. PAINE. In reply to the interrogatory of the gentleman from New York, I have to say this: that I believe it to be pretty nearly the unanimous opinion of those members of this House who have given the question their attention that the change in the title of one of these officers would, without some opinion of law to meet the case, or save the officer, abolish that office. But, if I understand correctly the posture of this question, as it is now before the House, there was a proposition introduced by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs which prevents such an effect.

Mr. SCHENCK. Such a proposition was offered, and was adopted by the House, and it is a part of the section as it now stands.

Mr. CONKLING. Shall we understand, then, that as the section now stands, it does not legislate out anybody?

Mr. SCHENCK. With the permission of the House, I will ask for the reading of the section as it was amended this morning. It legislates nobody out; it is particularly provided that it shall not affect the title to their offices of all of these men.

Mr. CONKLING. Is that true of all of them?

Mr. SCHENCK. It is true of all of them.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I rise to advocate the section proposed by the Military Committee in preference to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. THAYER.] I concede that the figures presented by that gentleman give the advantage to the section as proposed in the bill from the Senate. That, however, I do not understand to be the important question involved as between the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the section in the bill reported from the Committee on Military Affairs of this House.

The main point involved is the matter of economy. The gentleman claims that by his amendment the saving on the pay proper of colonels is $115 per month. Now, the matter of true economy is presented to us by the section reported by the committee of the House, and it consists in the fact that there is to be an actual reduction in the officers of this staff department, to be accomplished by refraining from filling vacancies as they occur until the number of majors has been reduced to three, and the number of captains fourteen; or a reduction of seventeen officers in all.

Mr. THAYER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. FARQUHAR. Certainly.

Mr. THAYER. If it is important that the number of officers in this department should be reduced, then why not favor the reduction at once? Or if this number be necessary now for an army of this size, how can a less number discharge the duties for an army of the same size when vacancies shall have occurred?

Mr. FARQUHAR. I would not decrease the number now for the very reasons suggested a few moments ago by the interrogatory of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CONKLING.] There is no disposition on the part of this House, I think, to reduce the number of these officers at this time and turn them adrift. But the proposition of the committee is, that as vacancies occur by death, resignation, or otherwise, those vacancies shall not be filled until there has been a reduction of three majors and fourteen captains.

Mr. PAINE. I would ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. FARQUHAR] if he does not find in the present business of this department, resulting from the war, a necessity for the temporary continuance of the present number of officers in the department.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I am obliged to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PAINE] for his suggestion; that is true. There is an immediate and present necessity for retaining the officers now on duty, and it is only proposed that in the case of vacancies by death, resignation, or otherwise, no appointments to fill such vacancies shall be made until the number of majors is reduced from fifteen to twelve, and the number of captains from forty-four to thirty.

And there is another reason why I favor the proposition as presented by the committee of the House, in this section. It provides that of the original appointments to be made under this bill, two thirds of the lieutenant colonels and majors and all of the captains shall be from volunteer officers who have performed meritorious services during the late war; that is, that two thirds of the ten colonels, two thirds of the fifteen majors, and all of the forty-four captains shall be appointed from officers of the volunteers.

Mr. THAYER. Will the gentleman allow me to call his attention to the fact that the substitute does the same?

Mr. FARQUHAR. I have not been able to see it. All I find in the substitute, which is section thirteen of the Senate bill, is that all vacancies thereby created in the grades of assistant quartermasters shall be filled by selection from among the persons who have rendered efficient and meritorious services as assistant quartermasters of volunteers during the war. I see no more than that.

Mr. THAYER. There can be no other vacancies.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I have been informed that there are other vacancies to arise besides the three assistant quartermasters general there referred to. If there are not, then in that respect the section of the committee's bill might have no advantage over the substitute. Still I prefer the section as reported by the committee.

Mr. SCHENCK. The Senate bill everywhere provides that these appointments shall be made from quartermasters and others who have served during the late war. But the House committee has preferred to take them all from our side, and to say that the appointments shall be made from among volunteer officers who have served in the Army of the United States during the late war.

Mr. THAYER. Will the gentleman allow me, for the sake of accuracy, to call his attention to the concluding language of the substitute, which provides that these positions shall be filled by selection from among persons who have rendered meritorious service as assistant quartermasters of volunteers during two years of the war?

Mr. SCHENCK. Exactly.

Mr. THAYER. Now, I would like to know where there is any discrimination in favor of the regular Army.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am not speaking about the regular Army. I am speaking about the rebel volunteers and the Union volunteers. We have preferred to require that these officers should have served on our side in the war. That is one difference between the two bills.

Mr. THAYER. That is a very nice criticism.

Mr. SCHENCK. It is a somewhat material point, it seems to me.

I wish now to call the attention of the House to the fact that the question now before us is the amendment to the amendment, proposing to attach to the substitute of the gentleman from Pennsylvania the retrenchment in number proposed in the House bill. That is precisely the retrenchment to which the attention of the House has been called by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. FARQUHAR,] reducing the number of captains and the number of majors, so as to make an aggregate deduction of seventeen from the whole number. And the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PAINE] rightly apprehended the motive of the committee in not making that reduction immediate. They provide that now, while we are winding up the vast business of the late war, this reduction shall not take place; but that hereafter, as vacancies occur in these lower grades, the reduction shall take place. The House is now called upon to say whether it will or will not sustain the committee in the proposed reduction.

As to the substitute of the gentleman, I desire to make but one or two remarks; for probably the discussion on this subject has already been protracted to a greater extent than is profitable. First, one word upon the general proposition which the gentleman makes—and which I think he cannot well have considered, or he would not have made it—that just in proportion as you increase the Army, you must increase its staff corps. I deny it. I say that in proportion as you increase an army, you may increase and ought to increase somewhat your staff corps, but not in equal ratio. You must increase your line officers in equal ratio. Every gentleman who knows anything about a turnpike company or a railroad company or a banking association will understand the principle involved here. A railroad company, with a road one hundred miles long, has its president, its vice president, its board of directors, its treasurer, its secretary. If that road be extended to the length of two hundred miles, no increase in the number of managing officers of the company is necessarily required, although a larger force is necessary to do the work along the line. So, if you increase the capital of a banking association from $500,000 to $1,000,000, you do not need to increase in the same proportion the number of the general supervisory officers—the staff, as it may be called. You may need to increase somewhat your agencies in that direction, but by no means in proportion to the increase of capital. The case is precisely the same with an army. The staff is the general supervisory power—the board of directors as it were, in a certain sense, of the Army; and you do not need to increase the staff just in proportion as you increase the rank and file, just as you increase the number of regiments, brigades, and divisions. You must increase your line officers, your field and company officers, in the same proportion in which you increase the rank and file; but the staff does not need to be increased except in a comparatively small degree. Hence the remarks of the gentleman imply a very grave mistake in reference to this matter.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let me say in reference to this discrepancy, that within my experience we have never legislated under such peculiar circumstances. Instead of being met here with argument, instead of being met with facts, we are met with some shadowy reference to something that has been done by some general officers, or by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate, who has written a letter, if I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania correctly, to explain to him what this House ought to do.

Mr. THAYER. The gentleman will permit me to say that I said nothing about that letter until I was asked upon what authority I made the statement that the general officers to whom I referred had approved a similar proposition to that embodied in my amendment.

Mr. SCHENCK. Very well; I should like to see that report of the general officers produced here, instead of being talked about in this way. I undertake to say this: that in the Senate the bill No. 67 was first introduced, and afterward another Senate bill No. 67, with a good deal of creeping up as to numbers and rank; that when the board of officers met here they took this bill No. 67, went over it mainly with reference to the general size of the Army and some special provisions and other amendments and suggestions, as, for instance, fifteen new brigadier generals not agreed to by the House or Senate committee. As to the organization including the quartermaster's department, I mean these general sections, they simply pass them by, making no recommendations in regard to them.

That is what I undertake to say. I say further, when the Senate came to bill No. 138 they changed to a considerable extent, even that section relating to quartermasters, as it was before that council of military men. When the gentleman from Pennsylvania here undertakes to introduce his substitute he departs still further from it. Take his own statement. He says this House must not make any reduction, that it must not follow its own committee because that committee has departed from what was recommended by a board of officers, and in the same breath tells the House this same council recommended eighty-seven, and he recommends seventy-six, that is that he may depart from the recommendation of these officers, that he may come down from eighty-seven to seventy-six, but it will not do for the Committee on Military Affairs of the House, looking over the same matter, to come to the same conclusion.

Again, in regard to what the Senate has done. The Senate adopts the important feature of three brigadier generals. He abandons that, and yet he quotes the chairman of the Military Committee of the Senate.

I trust this House, whether it has or has not faith in its own committee, which has bestowed not a little time and attention on this matter, not only to see how far we can bring down the number of these officers now, but in regard to a future reduction of them to the needs of the country—I hope, whether they place confidence in the committee or not, they will look at these things themselves, and not let gentlemen lead them away by what some board of officers has done or what some chairman of committee in another body has thought may be done, gentlemen who quote persons outside and in the same breath refuse to consider them as any authority.

I believe this matter has been sufficiently discussed, and I therefore demand the previous question upon the section and pending amendments.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The question recurred on Mr. SCHENCK's amendment.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 50, noes 12; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER ordered tellers; and appointed Messrs. GARFIELD and THAYER.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 58, noes 35.

So the amendment was adopted.

The question then recurred on the substitute of Mr. THAYER, as amended.

Mr. SCHENCK. If the substitute be voted down the section will be left as reported from the committee?

The SPEAKER. It will.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 33, noes 38; no quorum voting.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania, demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 44, nays 70, not voting 69; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Bidwell, Boyer, Chandler, Sidney Clarke, Conkling, Defrees, Dixon, Dodge, Eldridge, Finck, Glessbrenner, Goodyear, Grider, Griswold, Aaron Harding, James M. Humphrey, Jenckes, Kelley, Latham, George V. Lawrence, Loan, Marshall, Marvin, Myers, Niblack, Nicholson, Samuel J. Randall, John H. Rice, Ritter, Rogers, Ross, Shanklin, Sitgreaves, Spalding, Taber, Taylor, Thayer, Thornton, Robert T. Van Horn, Elihu B. Washburne, James F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—44.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Ancona, Baker, Banks, Baxter, Beaman, Benjamin, Bingham, Blow, Boutwell, Brewwell, Broomall, Buckland, Bundy, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Deming, Donnelly, Elliot, Farquhar, Ferry, Garfield, Grinnell, Hale, Abner C. Harding, Hayes, Henderson, Higby, Holmes, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, James R. Hubbard, Hulburd, Ketchum, Kuykendall, Laffin, William Lawrence, Longyear, Marston, McClure, McKee, McKuer, Mercer, Miller, Morrill, Morris, Moulton, Newell, Orth, Paine, Patterson, Perham, Plants, Price, William H. Randall, Rollins, Rousseau, Schenck, Scofield, Shellabarger, Smith, Stevens, Trowbridge, Upson, Ward, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, and Williams—70.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Barker, Bergen, Blaine, Brandegee, Cc'roth, Cook, Cullom, Culver, Darling, Davis, Dawes, Dawson, Delano, Denison, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eggleston, Farnsworth, Harris, Hart, Hill, Hogan, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, James Humphrey, Ingersoll, Johnson, Jones, Julian, Kasson, Kelso, Kerr, Le Blond, Lynch, McCullough, McDoe, Moorhead, Neill, O'Neill, Phelps, Pike, Pomeroy, Radford, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, Sawyer, Sloan, Starr, Stilwell, Strouse, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Trimble, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Warner, Wentworth, Whaley, Stephen F. Wilson, Winfield, and Wright—70.

So the substitute was rejected.

The Clerk read the following sections:

SEC. 17. And be it further enacted, That the number of military storekeepers shall hereafter be as many as shall be required, not exceeding sixteen, who shall have the rank, pay, and emoluments of captains of infantry.

SEC. 18. And be it further enacted, That the provisions of the act for the better organization of the quartermaster's department, approved July 4, 1864, shall continue in force so far as they do not become obsolete and unnecessary upon the disbandment of the volunteer forces.

SEC. 19. And be it further enacted, That the subsistence department shall hereafter consist of the number of officers now authorized by law, namely, one commissary general, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a brigadier general; two assistant commissary generals, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of colonels of cavalry; two commissaries, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of lieutenant colonels of cavalry; eight commissaries, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of majors of cavalry; and sixteen commissaries, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of captains of cavalry. But, after the first appointments made under the provisions of this section, as vacancies may occur, reducing the number of officers in the several grades below that of brigadier general of this department, no appointments to fill the same shall be made until the number of colonels shall be reduced to one, the number of majors to five, and the number of captains to ten. And thereafter the number of officers in each of said several grades shall continue to conform to such reduced numbers. And hereafter no graduate of the United States Military Academy, being at the time in the Army of the United States, or having been therein at any time for three years next preceding, shall be eligible to appointment as an officer in the subsistence department.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I move to amend section nineteen by striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

That the subsistence department of the Army shall hereafter consist of the officers now authorized by law, namely, one commissary general of subsistence, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a brigadier general; two assistant commissary generals, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of colonel of cavalry; two assistant commissary generals, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of lieutenant colonel of cavalry; eight commissaries, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of majors of cavalry; and sixteen commissaries, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of captains of cavalry.

The amendment proposed as a substitute, is a section taken from the Senate bill, and in my judgment is preferable to the one introduced by the Committee on Military Affairs. In regard to the titles it follows what the committee of the House adopted respecting the Adjutant General's department, and leaves the offices, titles, and rank the same as at present.

I would like to know from the chairman of the committee if he proposes to introduce an amendment to this section similar to that which was made to the thirteenth section, relating to the Adjutant General's department.

Mr. SCHENCK. Yes, sir.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. Then the argument that this bill would legislate out certain gentlemen now holding rank in the department is not necessary; so that the only differences between this amendment and the original section are, first, that hereafter, if my amendment is adopted, as vacancies occur they will be filled and the force in the department will not be diminished; and second, that when vacancies do occur they may be filled by graduates of West Point. Whereas, if the original proposition is adopted, whenever vacancies occur graduates of West Point cannot be commissioned to fill them.

I desire to have read a communication from the chief of the bureau respecting the necessity of retaining the force as it now exists.

The Clerk read the communication, as follows:

OFFICE COMMISSARY GENERAL OF SUBSISTENCE,
WASHINGTON CITY, April 16, 1866.

SIR: In reply to your note of this date calling my attention to the provision of H. R. bill 361, section nineteen, reducing the number of officers of the subsistence department, after being first filled to its present strength, and asking my views thereon, I have the honor to state that the number of officers of the subsistence department now authorized is twenty-nine, which number it is proposed by this bill to continue until reduced by the occurrence of vacancies to nineteen.

In my judgment, the subsistence departments should not be reduced below its present number of officers, nor their grade or designation changed.

All of the twenty-nine officers (except Captain Turner, brevet major general of volunteers, who is in command of the district of Henrico, Virginia,) now composing the department, are at present on duty at points where their services cannot be dispensed with without detriment to the service, which the accompanying list will in a measure explain. As soon as officers can be spared from their present positions, the service of one will be required in Arizona, another in Utah. One is (brevet Major Cushing) now on his way to the department of the Platte.

The Army is necessarily so widely scattered over the whole country of the United States that twenty-nine officers are not too many to give one officer to each important purchasing point and point of general supervision.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

A. B. EATON,

Commissary General of Subsistence.

Hon. ROBERT S. HALE, House of Representatives.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. Here we have a statement from General Eaton, who, during the last war, has won laurels for himself and his department by the readiness and facility with which he furnished supplies, giving his reasons why there should be no diminution of the force in his bureau, and his reasons are good. He is supposed to know what the wants of his department are, and he says that owing to the great extent of our country, requiring so many military divisions, even now, with the present force, there are two highly important stations not occupied.

Now, I understand from the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs that this department does not need many men, and that clerks can perform a large proportion of the duties required. Why, sir, what is the history of the commissary department? It was formerly on the civil list of the United States, and in the war of 1812, when those holding civil offices were invested with the duty of supplying the Army, it was found that it was impossible to secure that order and regularity of supply which is necessary to keep an army successfully in the field. Accordingly, in 1818, the department was made a portion of the military arm of the Government, and from that time to the present it has always been so considered. Throughout the Mexican war, and the various Indian wars, its organization and efficiency have been admirable, and certainly during the rebellion it has been a matter of amazement to all European officers who have been here to see how the immense armies we have kept in the field have been supplied, having everything in the way of material that an army could need.

We are told by my friend from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] that there are too many officers hanging about Washington in this department. If the gentleman had read the returns made by the department he would have seen that that is not so; because, of the twenty-nine officers connected with the department, there are only five to-day performing duty at Washington. The others are at Boston, Philadelphia, New York, New Orleans, San Francisco, and in various other portions of the country where purchases of supplies are absolutely demanded, so that we have not a bureau filled up with men who are seeking advancement and not performing duty. Of the twenty-nine men all but five are distributed in various sections of the country. I know of one lieutenant colonel who, instead of being in Washington, as the gentleman says, having nothing to do but to sport his gold buttons, had three horses shot under him in the field, as a commissary in the Army, and in one year disbursed over forty million dollars in the city of New York. And, sir, you find nowhere, either in the quartermaster's or in the commissary's department, where the offices are filled by men who have been educated where personal honor is the first law of their observance; you find nowhere complaints or charges against such men that their accounts are wrong or that they have disgraced themselves and injured the country by misappropriating the moneys placed in their hands for the purchase of supplies.

Why, sir, there is another lieutenant colonel in this bureau, I will not call his name, who graduated at West Point, served throughout the Mexican war, led the forlorn hope at Chapultepec, and greatly distinguished himself in his early professional career. At the commencement of the rebellion he desired to take the field, but his experience and usefulness in the department were such that he was obliged to abandon the prospect of honor and promotion in the field for the less fascinating but no less honorable duties of the office.

Now, sir, if it is true, as I believe it is—for I am one of those who believe in the integrity of such men as General Eaton—that the force cannot be diminished, why does the gentleman from Ohio insist on reducing the number of officers from twenty-nine to nineteen? Before the war there were twelve or fourteen officers in this department, with an army of only seventeen thousand men. During the war, with an army proper of probably forty thousand, these twenty-nine officers have been required, and in addition to that some four or five hundred officers have been detailed from the volunteer service to fill various positions in the commissary department. With an army of fifty thousand at the minimum, with power of expanding it to eighty thousand, or thereabouts, and with all of these volunteer officers mustered out of the service, the whole duty will fall upon these twenty-nine men. And here is an attempt to reduce the number from twenty-nine to nineteen. It looks to me, sir, as "penny wise and pound foolish."

Again, sir, an objection is made to West Point graduates being permitted to have promotion in this department. That seems to me to be unjust toward West Point. We are told in this House that West Point has been a school where treason has been nurtured. Well, sir, if there have been men there who have been taught treason, it was because they were appointed by such men as until recently occupied the War Department, and who had early had instilled into them this pernicious doctrine of State rights. But take the record, and you will find that not one third of the graduates of West Point either resigned or joined the rebel army; while one half of the civil appointees in the regular Army deserted their flag and went over to the rebels.

Sir, it is not, and it has not been, a nursery of treason. It is, and it has been, a nursery of honorable, high-toned, high-minded, and educated gentlemen. And if there is a place under heaven where personal dignity and personal honor, under all circumstances, are inculcated, it is at West Point. Her course of education to-day is equal to that of any other institution in this country; and the courses of study in our colleges have been improved by borrowing from West Point.

Mr. SCHENCK obtained the floor.

Mr. THAYER. Will the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] give way to allow me to move that the time of the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. WOODBRIDGE] be extended?

Mr. SCHENCK. Certainly; I have no objection to that.

Mr. THAYER. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. Wood-BRIDGE] have his time extended until he shall have concluded his remarks.

There was no objection.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I do not believe in long speeches, either before Congress or before courts. It is a great deal easier to tire people out than it is to secure their attention.

I was merely going on to say that this argument respecting West Point is one that is unjust toward that institution and toward the men who have been educated there.

Another feature of this bill, to which we shall come hereafter, divorces West Point from the Engineer corps, where it always has been, and where in my judgment it always should be, because the engineer officers are placed in that department by reason of their superior attainments in all the various branches of military knowledge.

Mr. SCHENCK. We are not considering the engineer department now.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] objects to my remarking upon any other portion of the bill, and I will not pursue the argument further.

After the revolutionary war was over, Washington saw the importance of a military education, and West Point was established. Through the war of 1812 she carried us successfully; and in the war with Mexico, West Point obtained the most triumphant victories, and made the most triumphant marches that at that time were on the record of history.

And during this great rebellion, what has been the record of West Point? Look at her Grants, and Shermans, and Sheridans, and Meades, and her dozens and scores of others who covered themselves with glory during this last controversy. The heroes of the war that came from West Point challenge to-day the admiration of the world. They are the men whose names are written highest on the scroll of honor.

Sir, I would not depreciate the efforts of other officers, or detract from their merit. The volunteers of this country are entitled to the lasting gratitude of the country; they have made their record high and heroic. But, sir, war is a science, and the man who has been educated to the profession is the more likely to excel. And when in addition to that education, he is trained in those high notions of personal honor which West Pointers are trained in, you may put your Treasury in his hands and every dollar will be accounted for.

Mr. SCHENCK. The proposition of the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. WOODBRIDGE] is to strike out the House section and to insert the Senate section as a substitute. He admits the differences to be three, the first of which is in the titles given to these officers. The House bill proposes to get rid of the titles of assistant commissary generals of subsistence and assistant commissaries of subsistence, and to provide for them by a couple of assistant commissary generals, and call all the rest commissaries. This is, as it was in regard to the quartermaster's department, a matter of taste. The House has concurred with the committee, by adopting the section which they have reported in regard to the quartermaster's department, and I hope they will agree with the committee to apply the same rule to commissaries of subsistence.

The gentleman admits that there is no question between us as to the legal effect of that part of the bill, because I have ready an amendment precisely similar to that which was offered to the other two sections of the bill—an amendment of such a character as to avoid effectually any such legal consequence as to deprive these officers of their commissions. I leave, then, as a mere matter of taste or a mere matter of convenience—for it is nothing more—the question whether these officers shall be called "assistant commissaries general" down the line till you come to the lowest, the captains, and then "commissaries of subsistence," or whether they shall all, except the two principal assistants, be called commissaries.

The next difference between the gentleman's substitute, borrowed from the Senate bill, and the provision of the House bill which we have reported, is that we propose to provide that, as vacancies occur, the number of these officers shall be reduced, so as to take away one of the colonels, three of the majors, and six of the captains, making a total reduction of ten. Sir, what is the fact in regard to the present number of officers in the commissary department? There are now twenty-nine officers, from the highest to the lowest, in the subsistence department proper of the regular Army. The Senate adopts that number; the House committee adopt that number, legislating nobody out. The Senate proposes that the number shall always continue twenty-nine. The House committee propose that, after the winding up of the business of this war, as vacancies occur, there shall be an omission of one of the colonels, three of the majors, and six of the captains, until the whole number shall be brought down to nineteen.

How many officers did we have in that department before the war? I hold in my hand the Army Register for 1860. At that time there was one Commissary General, with the rank only of a colonel; there was one assistant commissary general, with the rank of lieutenant colonel; there were two majors and eight captains. Those constituted the whole of the subsistence department—twelve officers in all, and only four of them above the grade of captain. We now have in that department a brigadier general, two colonels, two lieutenant colonels, a number of majors, and a number of captains, the whole number being twenty-nine. This is the force of that department as it now stands upon the Register.

Now, is it necessary to retain twenty-nine officers in that department forever? If twenty-nine officers will be required two or three years hence, when the business of winding up the operations of this war shall be all over, then the department ought to have more than twenty-nine officers now. But it is not contended that more than twenty-nine are needed now. General Eaton is satisfied with twenty-nine now; but he wishes that the department shall still embrace twenty-nine officers after all the present pressure of work shall have gone by. There seems to be some inconsistency in this. Either there are too few now, or there will be too many hereafter. There is no escape from this proposition. The adjustment of commissaries' accounts, and the other duties connected with the winding up of the vast business arising out of the war, have thrown a great burden for the next two or three years upon each one of these departments. But, I repeat, there is no escape from the proposition that if twenty-nine officers in that department be sufficient now, as General Eaton admits, then twenty-nine will be too many when this surplus business shall be disposed of.

Before the war, I repeat, the officers in that department were but twelve. During the war the number has been more than doubled, being now twenty-nine. Gentlemen may say this was on account of the war. But the regular Army has not been much increased during the war. And while this increase from twelve to twenty-nine was going on, five hundred and fourteen commissaries of volunteers were given to that department to help in the work. The gentleman takes no account of these five hundred and fourteen commissaries of volunteers who have helped to do the increased work consequent upon having millions of men in the field. The five hundred and fourteen that did the work consequent upon the vast army brought into the field, exceeding the old regular Army, are now mustered out or immediately to be mustered out. What is left? Twenty-nine, more than double as many as they had before the war commenced, and that is because of the increase of the Army we propose in this bill.

I say we have too many now. I say their own records prove that. I say that twenty-nine has been because of the increase of the regular Army, and made necessary by the increase of business, and as that business decreases you may fall back, not to twelve, but to nineteen.

As I intimated a moment ago, you do not require increase of staff in proportion to increase of line officers. As you increase the Army increase of staff need not be in arithmetical progression at all. Increase of staff, rather, need not be in that exact ratio at all. Increase of line officers must be. As they had twelve before the war, we propose they shall keep twenty-nine now, never to be reduced below nineteen in the new Army we propose to establish.

I see, therefore, no argument in what came from the gentleman, nor any in the communication of General Eaton, except an honest intention, honestly entertained, a mistaken idea of every one of these men that they can never spare an officer after they have once had him.

If they have increased to twenty-nine with five hundred and fourteen volunteers, if you muster out the five hundred and fourteen volunteers they must have the twenty-nine now with increase of the Army. The proposition, therefore, we make is not to cut down the twenty-nine now, but, as the Senate proposes, to leave it as it is, reducing as the business of the war is closed up until you come down to nineteen, but not to go below nineteen, seven more than they ever had before prior to 1861.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. Any one of these officers may be ordered off.

Mr. SCHENCK. I admit all that. I admit they may be detailed to business outside, but others may be detailed in their places. A man will not be ordered away without having his place supplied. So there is nothing in that.

With nineteen you will probably have one for every brigade in the field when troops are in service and leave the chief and three or four others to assist him. I think the chief with three or four here, and the others at posts and with brigades in the field, are quite enough. If the gentleman doubts that he can test the question upon each part of this proposition instead of a substitute by moving to strike out each one of these particular propositions.

Now, sir, it is proposed that we strike out the section reported by the House committee and substitute something entirely different instead of trying the question on each one of these propositions. And why? Because there is a third objection to the House bill upon which the gentleman is eloquent which he wants to get rid of by his substitute and that is this one in the bill:

And hereafter no graduate of the United States Military Academy, being at the time in the Army of the United States, or having been therein at any time for three years next preceding, shall be eligible to appointment as an officer in the subsistence department.

What led the committee to propose that? Not that these gentlemen were loafers. We never said that, and once for all I desire to say to my friend from Vermont, and to all others, that I believe the subsistence department has been exceedingly well managed all through this war, and the officers employed here have done their duty well, whether they came from West Point and had their education there, or were appointed from civil life. That is to create the impression we are making an attack on West Point. No such thing. That we are making an attack upon the subsistence department as loafers. No such thing. I say the subsistence department has done well through all of its officers, and I say none probably have done better than the graduates of West Point in that department.

What, then, do we mean? We mean this: that when we have educated a man for four years at West Point and made him skillful in engineering, gunnery, and general tactics, we do not want him to inspect biscuit and make contracts for beef. The gentleman challenges the world to produce any others who shall equal the glory that has been maintained upon stricken battle-fields by graduates of the United States Military Academy. I make no issue with him, but how much they come down from their glory when they depend for a living upon inspecting "sow belly" and "hard tack." That is the point which the gentleman utterly avoids. We have educated these men for something else. Civilians can do that work. Five hundred and fourteen civilians have proved they can do the work, and there is no more necessity for having a man educated at West Point to make him a competent commissary of subsistence than to be a chaplain or paymaster, or to discharge any other duties which require a knowledge of accounts and skill and ability to make contracts, to keep his accounts square, to pay over money received, and make purchases according to his orders in good faith. The very thing that should characterize West Point proves my argument. The more of a soldier you make of every graduate there the more incongruous it is that a man covered all over with glory, the rival of Mars, should condescend to weigh crackers and contract for beef.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. Why is it not quite as necessary that West Point men should be in the commissary department where they buy beef, as that they should be in the quartermaster's department where they buy horses' tails?

Mr. SCHENCK. I believe the same provision ought to have been made in the section relating to the quartermaster's department. It was thought, however, by the majority of the committee that there were some advantages in a military education in that department—for instance, as connected with the transportation of troops, and making corrections—which were not required of paymasters and commissaries of subsistence.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. SCHENCK. I hope I may be permitted to go on a moment more.

No objection was made.

Mr. SCHENCK. Now, I hope that gentlemen will see the propriety of the remarks which I am making. They are made in no spirit of opposition to West Point, but rather on behalf of West Point. They are not made with a desire to decry the advantage of a military education. No man can have had anything to do with military affairs without having felt the importance of a good military education in order to do the best service in any line of duty. But the point I make is that it is not necessary to educate these men at the United States Military Academy to perform these particular duties.

Now look at their appointment. As I said before, when the war commenced there were but twelve in the whole subsistence department, and they ran up to twenty-nine. Where did they come from? Out of the whole twelve there was but one man to be found who had no military education, who was fit to go into the subsistence department and make contracts in reference to supplies. There must have been something marvelous in that. And even he was a son of the chief of the department.

The war went on, and continued through 1861, 1862, and 1863, and nobody could get in from civil life. But who did get in? Second lieutenants of artillery. From certain circumstances, which I could explain if I would, the artillery always seem to have a particular hold on the subsistence department through its head on a former occasion; and thus as fast as these young fledglings come from West Point they are called upon to furnish brevet second lieutenants for officers in the subsistence department, and all at once they are made captains.

Mr. HALE. I think the gentleman is laboring under an entire mistake. I think there has never been an instance in the history of the United States Army of a brevet second lieutenant of the artillery being transferred and appointed to the office of commissary of subsistence, with the rank of captain.

Mr. SCHENCK. All I have to say in answer to that is that George Bell and J. D. Hawkins were.

Mr. HALE. I beg pardon. George Bell was made brevet second lieutenant, July 1, 1863, served through the grades of second and first lieutenant, and was appointed captain and commissary of subsistence on the 3d of August, 1861, more than eight years after he became a brevet second lieutenant of artillery. And just so with every officer in that department.

Mr. SCHENCK. Not every officer. I happen to know the fact as regards Mr. Sullivan whom I myself sent to West Point. Being a first lieutenant, he was made commissary of subsistence at the beginning of the war, and if he had remained with his battery, good officer as he was, he would probably have become a brigadier or major general of volunteers, or lost his life, instead of which he remained only a captain and commissary of subsistence.

Mr. HALE. He was not made commissary from brevet second lieutenant.

Mr. SCHENCK. No; he was a first lieutenant.

Mr. HALE. That was the case with all these men.

Mr. SCHENCK. I may have been mistaken in speaking of the first entry here as brevet second lieutenant; but that does not alter the fact. Here is a case of a second lieutenant of the first artillery who was not graduated until 1861, and two years after that we find him a captain in the commissary department.

Mr. HALE. I know the officer to whom the gentlemen refers, for he comes from my section of country; it is Lieutenant Elderkin. He stood at the head of the list of first lieutenants in his regiment, the first artillery, and had served gallantly and nobly for three years in the field. And from the first lieutenantancy in his regiment he was appointed a commissary.

Mr. SCHENCK. That does not alter the principle. Suppose that instead of being second lieutenants, as dated on the list, they went through the intermediate grade of first lieutenant, what then? I say there were artillery officers who, to get another step in promotion, consented to go into the subsistence department. Now, I find no fault with these young men, and especially not in time of peace, when promotion is slow; but I do say the probability is, that if these men had remained with their batteries, and fought it out during the war, most of them who consented to become captains in the subsistence department would have been at the head of brigades, or divisions, or corps before the war ended. And I say that it is not our policy to educate men, either to be first or second lieutenants or captains, or to hold any other rank in the artillery, infantry, cavalry, or engineers, and then let them become merchants to feed the Army. That is the point that I am making, and that is the point that I would have the gentleman meet, if he can.

Now, sir, I have said that there was not an opening until 1863. The door was then thrown a little ajar; and it was so amusing, on account of the way in which it was thus thrown ajar, that I will give you an account of it, subject, of course, to correction by my friend from New York, [Mr. HALE.]

There was a commissary of subsistence, a volunteer, in Boston, and a very excellent commissary he was, and has continued to be, and is still. His name is Brigham. He was a commissary of subsistence stationed at Boston, not in the field, and he has remained there, and has got into the regular Army. How did he get into the regular Army? It would not do to put him into the regular Army by direct transfer; for that would have been declaring to the country that it is possible for a man outside of the "charmed circle" to get in. What did they do? They required him to enlist as a common soldier in the eleventh infantry of the United States Army, which he did. He was immediately made a non-commissioned officer, and thus rendered eligible to promotion to a second lieutenantancy, and then, having been made a second lieutenant—mark you, all this time not having resigned his commission as commissary of volunteers—he was washed with the proper waters, baptized into the regular Army, and was then competent to be made a commissary of subsistence. This little, close corporation made an excellent officer go through all this farce of turning common soldier, sergeant, and second lieutenant while yet a captain and commissary of volunteers, in order that he might creep into the subsistence department without that horrible and shocking thing, direct transfer from the volunteers to merchandising in crackers and beef, and taking charge of the provisions for the Army!

Since then they have made some very good appointments from the volunteer service—one recommended by myself, Mr. Crane, who headed the list of ten named for promotion, and had done most gallant service in the field. Another was a gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. Penrose, and there have been two or three other appointments of that kind made since that time.

But the objection I make is, that we do not need to educate men at West Point to make chaplains of them, or paymasters, or commissaries of subsistence, but that they have higher and more important duties in the art of war to perform, in heading brigades and divisions, and commanding their batteries; and that when we make them, at great expense and cost of time and money, military engineers, artilleryists, skilled in infantry tactics, and good cavalrymen, it is better and more proper that you should leave open to them staff appointments and other positions among the engineers, the cavalry, the infantry, and the artillery, and that these places of commissaries of subsistence and chaplains and paymasters, which require no more skill and knowledge than is developed at any school in the country or by the business pursuits of life, should be filled up by men who are just as well qualified and will answer every purpose.

I will not stop to argue the question whether the difficulty is that you cannot get "gentlemen" if you go outside of West Point, though that was a part of the argument of my friend from Vermont, [Mr. WOODBRIDGE.] I do not want to impeach the gentility of West Point; neither do I wish to impeach the gentility or integrity of the business men of the country who are willing to accept positions of this kind upon proper recommendations and with proper examinations, which they will all have to obtain and undergo. I think they will be found to fill the bill quite as well as if they had been educated on the banks of the Hudson.

Mr. HALE. If I understand the proper course of parliamentary proceeding, it is, before the vote shall be taken upon the substitute, to submit any amendments which may tend to perfect the original section of the bill. If I am correct in that, and the chairman of the Military Committee [Mr. SCHENCK] is now prepared to offer an amendment to obviate the difficulty in regard to mustering these officers out of the service, I would be very glad to have him move it at this time.

Mr. SCHENCK. I will move to amend section nineteen of the bill by adding the following:

But nothing in this section shall be construed so as to vacate the commission of any officer now commissioned either as assistant commissary general or commissary of subsistence, but only to change the title to commissary in the cases of those who rank as lieutenant colonels, majors, and captains, without affecting in any way their relative position or the time from which they take such rank.

Mr. CONKLING. For the benefit of those who do not understand this thing better than I do, I would ask how this amendment will leave the subsistence department practically.

Mr. HALE. I would say to my colleague, [Mr. CONKLING,] that I have one or two other amendments which I propose to move to this section, as soon as the vote is taken upon the amendment moved by the chairman of the Military Committee.

Mr. CONKLING. That is very likely. But I want to know how this amendment is to affect the personnel of the commissary department.

Mr. HALE. It leaves that matter precisely as it is now.

Mr. SCHENCK. It legislates out nobody at all.

The question was upon the amendment of Mr. SCHENCK.

Mr. SMITH. I desire to make a few remarks in reply to something that was said by the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. WOODBRIDGE] a few minutes ago, not to touch probably directly or indirectly upon the question now before the House.

I understood the gentleman from Vermont to say in the conclusion of his remarks that the entire credit of the successes of the Union Army and the downfall of the rebellion was attributable to those who had graduated at West Point.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. Will the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SMITH] allow me a moment?

Mr. SMITH. When I have concluded my sentence I will. And that almost all the reputation that had been earned during the war belonged to the men who had received their education at that institution. While I give full credit to all those who distinguished themselves, who came from that Academy, and would not detract in the slightest degree from any one who won laurels on any field at any time, I must be permitted to dissent most emphatically from any such expressions emanating from any gentleman upon this floor, and going out to the country.

I will now yield a moment to the gentleman from Vermont.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. My friend from Kentucky [Mr. SMITH] most certainly misunderstood me. There probably is not a man in this House who has a higher respect for the volunteer service of the country than I have; there is probably no man who would award them more credit than I would award them. They distinguished themselves with great honor to themselves and to the country; and they certainly did all which human energy and skill and foresight could do to save this country from the ruin which threatened to befall it from the rebellion.

But I did say, and I say it now, because I believe it to be true, not only in this case, but as a principle almost necessarily true in all cases, that the men who achieved the most distinguished military honor were the men who had graduated at West Point. There was Grant, and Sherman, and Sheridan, and McPherson—

Mr. SMITH. And Hancock.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. Yes, and Hancock, and scores of others whose names I need not mention, who have risen to the very highest rank in the Army, and who really, by reason of their education, did achieve the highest reputation that was achieved in the field and in any of the departments connected with the Army.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. Speaker, my friend from Vermont has omitted to mention a great many officers who graduated at West Point.

A MEMBER. McClellan.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. One of the twelve disciples did not come out all right; and hence you must expect that there shall be once in a while a similar occurrence in modern days.

Mr. SMITH. I do not intend, Mr. Speaker, to disparage in the slightest degree the reputation of any gentleman who graduated at West Point. I do wish, however, to state a fact which I believe to be a matter of history, and which the records of this war will establish for all future time. It is well known to the House and the country that when this war began the regular Army was composed of about five thousand men, rank and file. General Scott, who was not, I believe, a graduate of West Point, was the commander-in-chief. Few of the men who have distinguished themselves in this war were then in the Army. Those of the West Point graduates who stand highest to-day among the distinguished men of this war had at the opening of the war been long away from that institution, and were most of them engaged in the civil pursuits of life—some in agriculture, some in mercantile business, some in the professions of law, medicine, &c. The man who stands to-day at the head of the Army was, I believe, when the war broke out, a tanner at Galena, Illinois. All right; there is nothing wrong about that.

I wish to call the attention of my friend from Vermont to this additional fact: that when President Lincoln issued his call for seventy-five thousand men to defend the capital of the nation and put down insurrection, those seventy-five thousand men came almost entirely from the civil pursuits of life. They were, almost without exception, men who had never seen West Point; and hundreds and thousands of them perhaps did not know that there was such a place.

I wish to state this further fact: that while there were a large number of the graduates of West Point who went into our Army and distinguished themselves, there were, I am sorry to say, numbers of men trained in that institution who took up arms on the side of the rebellion—men who had been educated in their secession doctrines by reading Rawle on the Constitution.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I beg to state that when that call for seventy-five thousand men was issued, the quota of Vermont was led by a graduate of West Point—as gallant a man as ever bore a sword—General Phelps.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman cannot have any controversy with me about the gallantry of West Pointers; I concede all that. I continue, therefore, the line of remark which I was presenting.

Now, sir, before the expiration of the three months for which those seventy-five thousand men were called out, President Lincoln issued a call for three hundred thousand men, to be enlisted for three years or the war. The volunteers who responded to that call were composed of every description of men. The officers who commanded those men took the raw material into the field. They drilled those men; they worked with them; they fought with them. When the rebellion was at its strongest stage, when the rebel forces in the field numbered one hundred and fifty or two hundred thousand men, well drilled and well equipped, those forces were arrayed on many a well-fought field against our noble army of volunteers, men who had, previous to the war, no military education, but who by thorough drilling and hard work became efficient soldiers, so that they were, it might almost be said, qualified to fight our battles without a commander. Then it was that our volunteers achieved their great victories, and won their great renown. It was then that a large proportion of the volunteer officers were set aside and West Pointers put in their places.

When the war had continued for three years and more, our army of volunteers had been so thoroughly schooled by the actual work of war that they were able to take any fort, to do any fighting, to whip any of the rebel armies "on their own hook," without a commander, for every man was a well-trained soldier. All that was necessary for such an army was the mere form of having a commander.

There was one grand and glorious thing about General Grant, which distinguished him from many of his predecessors. He had a tenacity of purpose which ever prompted him to keep on following the enemy, and to keep on fighting, and to keep on whipping. When a shell exploded upon his front, he did not retire, saying that something had occurred to intimidate him. This untiring persistency of purpose has been one grand cause of General Grant's success.

But, sir, the volunteers of this country have saved it. While you can go over the catalogue of West Pointers who have distinguished themselves, the catalogue of volunteers is much longer and larger and will swell out in history giving to these men a higher, grander, nobler position. Why, this one came from the plow, this one from the desk, this one from the counting office, this one from the lawyer's office, this one from the medical office. In a little while they proved their efficiency, not only leading regiments and brigades but divisions and corps successfully through the conflict which has but recently ended. Why, sir, where is there a West Pointer who stands higher as a corps commander than Major General John A. Logan? I do not intend to mention a whole lot of men who sit round me in Congress. When did he lose a fight? Where is the State that has not presented volunteers, from privates to major generals, who have shown their ability in the field?

I have believed in a regular army. I have thought it was well to have a strong army. But, sir, I believed it more before the war than since the war. Before the war we did not anticipate war with all its sorest trials. When it did begin, and when a million men arrayed themselves against the Government, we found two millions and more of volunteers willing to risk their lives to defend the country.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I move that the gentleman have leave to finish his speech.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. Speaker, the record of the volunteers is so bright, so glorious, and so grand, it cannot be destroyed.

I am unwilling to say, because a number of men have come from West Point and distinguished themselves, they should be set up as the only ones who can save the country in time of war. The record of West Point shows that as many men from West Point went into the rebellion as were in our Army. Now, West Point does not make a man brave. West Point does not make a man good. West Point may educate as well as men can be educated. But it does not put fight into him. What does put fight into the American citizen? It is the country, her soil and institutions, which make him a fighter and qualify him for great deeds of daring.

I do not care whether you have five or ten thousand in the regular Army, this country is safe, to use the language of Mr. Seward. I do not care whether Congress passes a bill to increase the Army to seventy-five thousand or rejects it, the country is safe. I do not care whether Congress agrees with the President or the President disagrees with Congress, the country is safe. The great courage, the great intelligence, the great conservatism, and everything grand and good are behind Congress, with the people, and the people will save the country. I have little confidence in anything which belongs to political position, at this time especially. I believe in the faithfulness and integrity of the people.

In conclusion, I would like to say, if this House will only wait until we get the militia bill they will get rid of this great establishment and none the less save the country, when they will have an establishment that will only cost $500,000, while this costs $30,000,000. All you have to do is to rely upon the people, the great defenders of liberty in war as well as in peace.

Mr. NIBLACK. I have reasons which will convince me that it is not the intention of the House to pass this bill at this time. If that be so, we only waste time in considering it section by section. With a view to testing the sense of the House upon this bill I move that its further consideration be postponed to the first Monday of December next.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I ask leave to introduce a resolution calling on the President for information.

Mr. NIBLACK. I am willing to yield for that purpose.

REPORT OF GENERAL SMITH, ETC.

Mr. FARNSWORTH, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

REVENUE ASSESSORS.

Mr. MILLER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to allow United States revenue assessors to appoint deputies; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I call for the reading of the bill in full.

The bill was read. It authorizes United States assessors to appoint deputies in the same manner as collectors of revenue.

The bill was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DUTIES ON IMPORTS.

Mr. KETCHAM. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill to increase temporarily the duties on imports.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, objected, but subsequently withdrew his objection.

Mr. ALLISON renewed it.

INTERNAL REVENUE FRAUDS.

Mr. HIGBY. I ask unanimous consent to introduce the following resolution:

Whereas it is alleged in responsible public journals and elsewhere that in the enforcement of the revenue laws at the custom-houses in Boston and New York, and the adjustment of claims for the violation thereof, frauds have been committed upon the United States, and parties involved in said alleged violations; and whereas it is in like manner alleged that similar frauds have been committed in the enforcement of the internal revenue laws, and in the adjustment of claims for the violation thereof in said cities: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Expenditures be instructed to investigate all such alleged frauds, and that for that purpose they be authorized to send for persons and papers, and, if necessary, to sit during the recess of Congress, at such place as they shall deem most economical and efficient, and by such number, not exceeding three, of said committee, as they may deem advisable.

Mr. ROSS. I object.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, April 24, 1866.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. H. GRAY. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of the 18th instant, a communication from the Secretary of War, covering a copy of the proceedings of a board of officers in relation to brevet appointments in the regular Army; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the memorial of Dr. Henry Clok, late veterinary surgeon in the United States Army, representing that he has had large experience in the treatment of the disease known as rinderpest, or cattle plague, and that he is in possession of a reliable means of cure, and also of a powerful preventive to the spread of the disease, and tendering his services wherever they may be required in arresting the progress thereof; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. WILSON presented the petition of Sewall H. Fessenden, and others, who represent that they were the owners of the schooner William Carleton, which, when sailing down the Chesapeake on her way to Sandwich, Massachusetts, with a cargo of coal, was run into by the United States steam ram Stonewall and destroyed, and praying for compensation for the loss sustained by the destruction of the vessel; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SUMNER. I present the petition and memorial of citizens of the United States and of the State of Pennsylvania, representing literary and learned societies of that State, in which they set forth that it is desirable that every reasonable facility be furnished to the several historical societies and public libraries of the United States to enable them to increase the number of their books, pamphlets, and historical papers; that the present law which requires the person who sends documents and papers to such societies to prepay the postage, tends greatly to diminish donations; and that many of the papers and documents referred to, although of an ephemeral character, are yet important as historical memorials, and should be preserved. These petitioners, therefore, pray Congress to modify the existing laws, so as to permit postage on papers, documents, and books forwarded to the societies above named to be paid on delivery; and they further pray that the present rate of postage charged on such papers and documents be reduced fifty per cent. below the present charges to such societies.

This petition and memorial, as it is called, is signed by J. Francis Fisher, president of the Philadelphia Athenæum; T. Morris Perot, president of the Mercantile Library Company of Philadelphia; W. E. Whitman, secretary of the Library Company of Philadelphia; Howard Malcolm, president of the Baptist Historical Society; Joseph R. Ingersoll, president of the Historical Society of Pennsylvania, and several others. I move its reference to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana, presented the petition of William A. Phillips, late commanding officer of the Indian brigade, and others, praying for a bounty for the men of the first, second, and third Indian regiments, under the act of July 22, 1861; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. CLARK, it was Ordered, That the memorial of Margaret A. Laurie, praying for compensation for property destroyed by the United States forces in the District of Columbia, be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Claims.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SHERMAN, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 261) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending 30th June, 1867, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 397) to authorize the coinage of five-cent pieces, reported it without amendment.

Mr. CHANDLER, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 196) to extend the port of entry of the collection district of the State of Oregon, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. CLARK, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of George Mack, and others, enlisted men of company G, eighth regiment United States Veteran volunteers, praying for the payment of bounty due to them which was lost through the carelessness or fraud of a Government officer, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. POMEROY. I ask leave to introduce a joint resolution to go with that report in the case of George Mack, and others, and that it be printed, so that when the subject comes up for consideration I can move this joint resolution as a substitute for the resolution of the committee.

There being no objection, leave was granted to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 72) for the relief of George Mack, and twenty-four others; which was read twice by its title, and ordered to be printed.

INTERIOR DEPARTMENT CLERKS.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am directed by the Committee on Finance to report a bill to reorganize the clerical force of the Department of the Interior, and for other purposes. This bill was framed by the Interior Department, and the Committee on Finance are of opinion that they ought not to consider it, because it does not fall within their appropriate duties, but that they thought the subject was of sufficient importance to have the matter referred to a select committee to be composed of the chairmen or representatives of the various committees of this body having charge of the respective bureaus of the Interior Department. If such be the pleasure of the Senate, I ask that the bill be read twice, and referred to a select committee.

The bill (S. No. 282) to reorganize the clerical force of the Department of the Interior, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that this bill be referred to a select committee of five members; and I make the suggestion, simply on behalf of the Committee on Finance, that the select committee be composed of the chairmen of the several Committees on Indian Affairs, Public Lands, Pensions, Patents, and Printing. These subjects are all referred to in the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the bill be referred to a select committee consisting of the gentlemen named by the Senator from Ohio.

The motion was agreed to; and Messrs. DOOLITTLE, POMEROY, ANTHONY, LANE of Indiana, and COWAN, constitute the select committee.

PRINTING APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 500) making appropriations to supply deficiency in the appropriation for the public printing for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1866, have instructed me to report it back without amendment, and as we are informed by the gentleman at the head of the Printing Bureau that the money is immediately needed to pay current expenses of public printing, I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

By unanimous consent, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It appropriates, to supply deficiencies for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1866, for the public printing, $115,000; for paper for the public printing, $450,000; for the public binding, $95,000. It also proposes to empower the Superintendent of the Public Printing to employ an additional clerk, of class four.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. LLOYD, Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. R. No. 116) to prevent the introduction of the cholera into the ports of the United States, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed the following enrolled bills; which were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. No. 146) for the relief of Thomas F. Wilson, late United States consul at Bahia, Brazil;

A bill (H. R. No. 472) for the relief of George R. Frank, late captain thirty-third regiment, Wisconsin volunteer infantry; and

A bill (H. R. No. 500) making appropriations to supply deficiency in the appropriation for the public printing for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1866.

CLAIMS OF LOYAL CITIZENS.

Mr. WILLEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 73) for the relief of loyal citizens of the counties of Berkeley and Jefferson, in the State of West Virginia; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. WILLEY. With the indulgence of the Senate, I desire to make a remark or two in reference to this resolution; but before doing so, with the permission of the Senate, I ask for the reading of the resolution at large.

The Secretary read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, &c., That the second and third sections of the act entitled "An act to restrict the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims and to provide for the payment of certain demands for quartermasters' stores and subsistence supplies furnished to the Army of the United States," approved July 4, 1864, be, and the same are hereby, made applicable to, and shall include, claims of loyal citizens of the counties of Berkeley and Jefferson, in the State of West Virginia.

Mr. WILLEY. The second section of the act of July 4, 1864, referred to in this resolution, is in these words:

"SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That all claims of loyal citizens, in States not in rebellion, for quartermaster's stores actually furnished to the Army of the United States and receipted for by the proper officer receiving the same, or which may have been taken by such officer without giving such receipt, may be submitted to the Quartermaster General of the United States, accompanied with such proofs as each claimant can present of the facts in his case; and it shall be the duty of the Quartermaster General to cause such claim to be examined, and if convinced that it is just and of the loyalty of the claimant and that the stores have been actually received or taken for the use of and used by said Army, then to report each case to the Third Auditor of the Treasury with a recommendation for settlement."

The third section refers to subsistence supplies, and is of like tenor with the second section, referring them for proof to the Commissary General of Subsistence. It seems that the quartermaster's department, for some cause unknown to me, have excluded the counties of Berkeley and Jefferson from the operation of these two sections of the act of 1864.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senator from West Virginia will allow me, I will state that this subject has been before the Committee on the Judiciary, and a bill has been reported from that committee, and is now pending in the Senate, recommending the extension of the provisions of the act which he has just read to loyal persons in all portions of the United States. I apprehend that would cover the object which the Senator has in view. Perhaps that bill has escaped his notice. It is on the table, and it is the intention of the committee to call it up at the very first opportunity.

Mr. WILLEY. I was aware of the bill referred to by the Senator from Illinois. That bill embraces loyal citizens throughout the entire South, and will perhaps lead to some discussion and some delay. The resolution which I now offer is confined in its operations exclusively to the counties of Berkeley and Jefferson, in the State of West Virginia. Allow me to state, Mr. President, that the people of West Virginia feel somewhat chagrined that a part of her territory, the counties of Berkeley and Jefferson, as much a part of her territory as any other counties in the State, the loyal State of West Virginia, should have been excluded by one of the subordinate departments of the Government from the operation of the act of July, 1864. Why these two counties are excluded I cannot understand. Why a part of a loyal State should be excluded and another part allowed to be brought within the operation of this act, I cannot understand. Every other department of the Government has recognized these two counties as belonging to West Virginia, as a part of the territory of that loyal State; the Executive has recognized it; the head of the War Department has recognized it; and recently, it will be in the recollection of the Senate, Congress by its action recognized the annexation of these two counties to the State of West Virginia, so that these two counties are now, and always have been, a part of that territory; since 1863 at any rate. Before the passage of the act of July, 1864, and ever since the passage of that act, these two counties have been as much a part of the State of West Virginia as any other counties within its limits.

We feel somewhat aggrieved that this discrimination should be made against them. There are not many claimants in these two counties; and fearing that the bill referred to by the Senator from Illinois might, perhaps, lead to some extended discussion and to some delay, I have thought it proper to introduce this resolution, supposing that there would be no objection to it, inasmuch as it simply places these two counties on an equal footing with all the other counties of the State; and if there be no objection I would be glad if the Senate would take up the resolution and consider it now. I have stated all that there is in the joint resolution. It seems to me there can be no earthly objection to it; and therefore I should be glad if the Senate would put the resolution on its passage now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from West Virginia asks for the present consideration of the resolution introduced by him. Is there any objection? No objection being made, the resolution is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WILSON. The resolution is very brief, and I should like to hear it read again.

The Secretary read it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Is that resolution intended to be put upon its passage? It has not been referred to any committee. Has it come from a committee?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has not.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think such a resolution ought not to pass without consideration. This whole subject has been carefully considered during the present session; and the law to which reference has been made, the law of 1864, I think, has been somewhat modified in the bill which has been reported, and which is now pending before the Senate, and will embrace this case. I do not think we ought to act on a resolution opening the door for the allowance of claims any wider than it was opened by the previous act, until we consider the whole subject, as we shall do in the bill of which the Senator from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] has charge, and which will be called up on an early day. If this joint resolution passes, another joint resolution may be offered to-morrow to embrace some other county, and another the next day to embrace some other county, and another the next day. This joint resolution has not been considered by any committee, and I trust it will not be pressed to a vote at the present time. It has not even been printed. I move that the pending resolution be referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. WILLEY. It seems to me that the honorable Senator from Illinois could hardly have looked at the case as it actually exists. The act to which he refers is dated July 4, 1864. West Virginia became a State on the 20th day of June, 1863. The act of July 4, 1864, provides for claims of loyal citizens in States not in rebellion. At the time of the passage of the act of the 4th of July, 1864, these two counties were within a loyal State, and the claims of loyal citizens in the remainder of the counties in that State have met with no difficulty at the Department. It seems to me an unjust and offensive discrimination against the loyal citizens of two counties of the State, that their claims should not be heard, while the claims of the loyal citizens of the other counties in the State have been adjusted without any difficulty. West Virginia became a State on the 20th of June, 1863; this law was passed July 4, 1864, more than a year afterwards, so that these two counties were in point of fact a part of the State of West Virginia more than a year before this act was passed.

The object of the resolution is to correct this unjust discrimination and official misconstruction of the law as it really did exist. Congress has just given its assent to the annexation of these two counties to West Virginia. Therefore I trust, not merely for the sake of allowing the loyal men in these two counties to have their claims adjusted, but for the sake of a sense of pride on the part of the State of West Virginia, these two counties may be placed on an equal footing with all the other counties in the State.

Mr. CLARK. I have always been in favor of paying the claims of loyal men in the country wherever found; but I hardly see the necessity of the haste which the Senator from West Virginia manifests by desiring to have this resolution considered at the present time. I do not make objection to its consideration, but I think it should go to some committee who should make an examination of it. If it is all right, there will undoubtedly be a favorable report; and it would be more satisfactory to the Senate to know precisely where we are going. I do not desire to have it go to the Committee on Claims, but I think it had better go to the Committee on the Judiciary who had this whole matter under consideration. I have no doubt they will report at an early day, and perhaps that will be more satisfactory to the Senate.

Mr. WILLEY. There being objection on the part of Senators, of course I do not feel like urging it.

Mr. CLARK. I do not make an objection to its present consideration. I only point out the course which I think the resolution had better take; and I move its reference to the Committee on the Judiciary, if the Senator from Illinois will withdraw his motion, because that committee had the whole matter under consideration and they can report at a very early day, should the other bill not pass, which I think will be satisfactory.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I am not particular about the committee it goes to; but I do not wish to be understood by the Senator from West Virginia as at all opposed to the object he has in view. I presume I am for it; I agreed to the bill which has already been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary. I withdraw the motion to refer the resolution to the Committee on Claims. It is immaterial to me to what committee it goes.

Mr. CLARK. I move that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. So far as informed at the present time, I will say to the Senator from West Virginia that I think I am entirely in favor of it, but I desire simply to examine it and know where we are going.

The joint resolution was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 116) to prevent the introduction of the cholera into the ports of the United States, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

NAVAL OFFICERS VISITING WASHINGTON.

Mr. GUTHRIE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be requested to communicate to the Senate copies of any orders of the Departments which deprive officers of the Navy who are not on duty of the privileges of citizens of the United States with respect to their privileges of passing from one State to another or to the city of Washington; also, whether the Department has refused to permit officers to visit Washington for the purpose of personal appeal to the President of the United States or to Congress in their own cases, and if so by what authority this right is withdrawn from them as citizens of the United States.

CAPTURE OF JEFFERSON DAVIS.

Mr. HOWE. I offer the following resolution and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to communicate to the Senate all evidence upon which the award of the commission appointed to examine the different claims to the reward offered for the apprehension of Jefferson Davis was based, and especially copies of the reports of Lieutenant Colonel D. B. Pritchard, of the fourth Michigan cavalry, and of Lieutenant Colonel Henry Harnden, of the first Wisconsin cavalry, together with copies of the orders under which the above-named officers respectively acted.

Mr. COWAN. I should like to know if the purpose of the resolution is to assail the validity of the award.

Mr. HOWE. I want to get the evidence on which the award was made. I do not know whether I shall assail it or not until I see on what evidence it was made. I have some reasons to think, however, that the award is not justified by the evidence.

Mr. JOHNSON. Has the amount been distributed?

Mr. HOWE. No, sir, and cannot be, I take it, until there is an appropriation.

Mr. JOHNSON. I thought there was an appropriation in advance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will ask whether the present consideration of the resolution is objected to.

Mr. CHANDLER. I presume the Senator can get the information he desires by applying to the Provost Marshal General or to the Secretary of War. I do not know that there is any particular national importance in the question whether the lieutenant colonel of a Wisconsin regiment or the lieutenant colonel of a Michigan regiment receives the money. It has been carefully adjudicated and decided. I understand that there is a little conflict of opinion between these two officers as to which is entitled to the reward. The fact is that the Michigan colonel caught him and has been decided to be entitled to the money. I do not care who sees the evidence, but I do not see what importance it is to this body.

Mr. COWAN. If this information was communicated, and it may be very voluminous, it will have to be printed; and if printed, for what purpose? There is no right of appeal that I know of to this body unless it should arise when a question of appropriation comes up. I should suppose that then it would more properly come up than now. I have no disposition to enter into the controversy which exists between Michigan and Wisconsin on this subject. I hope the services of both in this behalf will be paid, and well paid, but I do not want to throw good money away after bad.

Mr. HOWE. I do not understand exactly the philosophy which controls this discussion. This resolution simply proposes to ask the Secretary of War to communicate to the Senate of the United States the evidence upon which that award was made. I take it that evidence will not hurt the Senate, and it will not hurt the country. The Senator from Pennsylvania suggests that there can be no possible good derived from communicating here the evidence, because there can be no appeal taken from the award of these commissioners. I think the Senator is mistaken about it. An appeal can be taken. I do not think the award of these commissioners binds the Congress of the United States to appropriate a dollar unless the Congress of the United States are satisfied that the award is correct and ought to be paid. There was a bounty offered to those persons who should capture Jefferson Davis in his flight. It has been decided by the officers who were detailed to examine the question that certain individuals are entitled to the award. I do not know that the decision is not just. I have an impression that it is not just. I think the public is in no sort of danger if the Senate is allowed an opportunity of looking at the evidence and determining for themselves whether it is correct or not.

I do not know that I shall dissent from the award. I do not know that the fourth Michigan cavalry did not earn it. I am advised officially that the fourth Michigan cavalry did not get it; only a small portion of the regiment. If it was earned by that part, my impression is it was earned by more of the corps than are allowed to participate in the reward. I do not undertake to say that the first Wisconsin cavalry is entitled to any portion of it. I have a decided impression that a portion of the first Wisconsin cavalry is. But let us see the evidence. My friend from Michigan does not object to that.

Mr. CHANDLER. Not at all.

Mr. HOWE. Then let us have it.

Mr. CHANDLER. It is very voluminous. I suppose it is a large volume, and it will cost several thousand dollars to publish it. If the Senator will change his resolution, and ask that the evidence be furnished to him in manuscript for his examination, I shall certainly vote for it. I am in favor of his having it all. I am satisfied with the award.

Mr. HOWE. The evidence, I think, will compose about as small a volume as you are in the habit of seeing, and whether we shall print it when we get it or not will be a matter for the Senate to determine when they have seen it. I think the evidence will consist mainly of a brief report from Lieutenant Colonel Pritchard, commanding the fourth Michigan cavalry, and quite as brief a one from Lieutenant Colonel Harnden, commanding the first Wisconsin cavalry. That is about all the evidence, I guess, there is on the point. If there is more, I shall be glad to see it.

Mr. CONNESS. There is much more.

The resolution was agreed to.

PAY OF ARMY OFFICERS.

Mr. WILSON. I move to take up House joint resolution No. 101, for the relief of certain officers of the Army.

The motion was agreed to; and the joint resolution (H. R. No. 101) for the relief of certain officers of the Army, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

In every case in which a commissioned officer actually entered on duty as such, and was entitled by law to be so mustered in, but by reason of being killed in battle, captured by the enemy, or other cause beyond his control, and without fault or neglect of his own, was not mustered according to the regulations within a period of not less than thirty days, the pay department is to allow to such officer full pay and emoluments from the date on which such officer actually entered on such duty, deducting from the amount paid in accordance with this resolution all pay actually received by him for such period.

Mr. RAMSEY. I propose to amend the resolution by striking out in the fourth and fifth lines the words "and was entitled by law to be mustered in as such;" and by striking out in the eighth line the words "according to the regulations," and then after the word "days," in the ninth line, by inserting "from acceptance of any appointment or actual entry upon duty, and who was afterward regularly mustered into the service of the United States." This amendment has been brought to the attention of the Committee on Military Affairs, and I believe I may say that the chairman is satisfied with it and thinks it meets a case which ought to be provided for. The resolution, if amended as I propose, would read thus:

That in every case in which a commissioned officer actually entered on duty as such commissioned officer, but by reason of being killed in battle, capture by the enemy, or other cause beyond his control, and without fault or neglect of his own, was not mustered within a period of not less than thirty days from acceptance of appointment or actual entry upon duty, and who was afterward regularly mustered into the service of the United States, the pay department shall allow to such officer full pay and emoluments from the date on which such officer actually entered on such duty as aforesaid, deducting from the amount paid in accordance with this resolution all pay actually received by such officer for such period.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to suggest that there is one difficulty in the resolution as it now stands. It speaks of an officer who has not been mustered in by reason of having been killed in battle; and then it goes on to provide that afterward, if regularly mustered into the service of the United States, he shall have his pay. Certainly the condition would not arise after he has been killed; he cannot then be mustered into our Army. The purpose may be good enough, but the language is liable to this criticism.

Mr. WILSON. I prefer that the resolution be passed over, in order that we may look at the exact bearing of the amendment which has been adopted. I did not see all of the amendment before it was offered.

Mr. GRIMES. I suggest that it be printed.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the further consideration of the resolution be postponed until to-morrow, and that it be printed as amended.

The motion was agreed to.

PROTECTION TO UNITED STATES OFFICERS.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. LLOYD, Chief Clerk, announced that the House had non-concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 238) to amend an act entitled "An act relating to habeas corpus and regulating judicial proceedings in certain cases," approved March 8, 1863, and requested a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. JAMES F. WILSON of Iowa, Mr. SAMUEL McKEE of Kentucky, and Mr. B. M. BOYER of Pennsylvania, managers of the conference on the part of the House of Representatives.

Mr. CLARK. I move that the Senate insist on its amendments to the bill just received from the House of Representatives and agree to the conference, and that the committee of conference on the part of the Senate be appointed by the Chair.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to ask the Senator from New Hampshire if he is advised upon what amendments there is a disagreement.

Mr. CLARK. There was but one amendment that was of importance, and I suppose it must be upon that. That was in regard to the time at which the bill should cease to operate, with the amendment proposed to it by the Senator from Indiana. I suppose that is the amendment upon which the House must have disagreed with us, because the others were merely verbal. I will say to the Senator from Indiana that there is but one course to be taken, and that is to insist upon our amendments and agree to the conference, or else to recede from our amendments, and I do not suppose the Senator would be willing to recede.

Mr. HENDRICKS. No, sir; I think the Senate ought to insist; but then the chances are that when the committee of conference is appointed we shall not see the amendments again. I wanted to know what questions were to be submitted to the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire.

The motion was agreed to.

CONTRACTORS FOR VESSELS AND MACHINERY.

Mr. NYE. I move to take up the bill for the relief of contractors for double-enders and iron-clads.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 220) for the relief of certain contractors for the construction of vessels-of-war and steam machinery, the pending question being on the motion of Mr. NYE to amend the amendment of Mr. GRIMES by striking out "twelve" and inserting "fifteen."

Mr. HENDRICKS. I had thought of submitting a very few remarks to the Senate with regard to this measure, but have concluded that it is better that we shall vote upon it, as the Senate very generally understand it. I suggest to the Senator from Nevada, in order that we may come to a vote upon it at once, that he withdraw his amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, and allow the Senate to vote upon that proposition.

Mr. NYE. I am ready to do so. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment being withdrawn, the question now is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, which will be read.

The Secretary read the amendment, which was to strike out all of the bill after the first clause, and in lieu of the words struck out to insert the following:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the several parties the awards made in their favor by the naval board organized under the resolution of the Senate, adopted March 9, 1865, the awards being made under date of December 23, 1865, and reported to the Secretary of the Navy: Provided, That the payment shall not in any case exceed twelve per cent. upon the contract price, except in the case of the Comanche, in which case the award shall be paid in full.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. I now offer this amendment to come in as a new section:

SEC. —. And be it further enacted, That in the cases of Donald McKay, of Boston, Massachusetts, who built the Ashuelot and machinery, and Miles Greenwood, of Cincinnati, Ohio, who built the Tippecanoe, whose contracts have been completed to the satisfaction of the Department, and who were prevented from appearing before the naval board, shall be entitled to the same rate of compensation as is authorized to be paid to other parties building the same class of vessels and machinery; and such payment to be made to them out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, under the supervision and direction of the Secretary of the Navy, provided the evidence submitted for his examination fully establishes the right of the said parties to compensation.

I believe there is no question on this amendment. I have conferred with Senators who are interested in this subject, and I believe I have their concurrence in moving the amendment. The Senator from Nevada who has the bill in charge is familiar with it, so is the Senator from Iowa, and I understand that the Navy Department also is familiar with it, and that it has the cordial concurrence of that Department. I think there is no question in regard to it.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HENDERSON. I now move to postpone the consideration of the bill and amendments until the first Monday of December next, and upon this motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. McDUGALL. I desire to inquire of the Senator from Missouri the reason why he asks this postponement. I should like to hear the reason.

Mr. HENDERSON. This subject was thoroughly discussed a few days ago. I had not examined the subject as thoroughly as I might have done, but I thought the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CLARK] clearly disclosed to the Senate reasons sufficient to postpone the consideration of this bill, not only until the first Monday of December next, but forever. I do not pretend to say that there are not meritorious claims in this bill, individuals named who are entitled to something at the hands of Congress. I would be perfectly willing to grant something to some of these parties, but even in the original bill those parties are mixed up with others, as was clearly shown by the Senator from New Hampshire, who are not entitled to one cent and ought not to be paid one cent; at least if they ought to be, I have seen no reasons for it; no reasons have been given. Why, sir, if I am not mistaken, it has been shown clearly to the Senate that the only consideration for their claiming anything at the hands of Congress arises from their own willful neglect to perform the work within the time that they stipulated to do it in.

If we are inclined to do anything for these men, I think we ought to open the Court of Claims to them and prescribe some rules by which these parties can enforce this just claim which it is said they have against the Government. I am totally opposed to voting anything to these contractors upon the report of this board—a board organized under a simple resolution of the Senate, passed without any notice whatever on the 9th of March, 1865, after the adjournment of Congress and during the executive session. The report of that board shows that they took no evidence whatever in order to ascertain the truth of the matter now before this body, and appealing to our generosity rather than to our justice, because, if I understand the report of that board, it was their generosity that gave us such a report, and not their sense of justice. I have heard no answer to the point made by the Senator from New Hampshire the other day. What is the proposition now made? It is a change simply from the award of the commission to twelve per cent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business of yesterday, which is the bill making appropriations for the benefit of the Post Office Department.

Mr. NYE. I hope we may be allowed to get a vote on this question. I trust the Senator from Ohio will permit us to come to a vote upon it.

Mr. POMEROY. There is a special order for to-day, which I should like to have the Senate proceed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is a special order, but the unfinished business of yesterday takes precedence of the special order.

Mr. POMEROY. I know that the unfinished business takes precedence, but it is within the province of the Senate to proceed with the consideration of the special order if they so determine.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business of yesterday is before the Senate, of course subject to the order of the Senate to be postponed or delayed at their pleasure.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish, almost as a personal favor, that this bill for the relief of these contractors could be disposed of this morning, as I desire to leave the city in a day or two, to be gone for a few days, and I should like to have it disposed of before I leave. I feel some little responsibility about it, as it was referred to myself and other gentlemen as a sub-committee. I believe the friends of the bill do not propose to discuss it at any length.

Mr. WILSON. How long will it take?

Mr. HENDRICKS. But a few minutes, I think. We do not wish to discuss it.

Mr. CLARK. I suggest to the Senator from Indiana that perhaps the bill had better go over until his return. I do not think it is likely to suffer from delay. I will say to him that I have never been so much embarrassed by any measure before the Senate since I have been a member of it, and that by reason of these cases being lumped together. I have no doubt there are some meritorious cases in the bill from the examination that I have been able to make, but they are loaded down by others that ought not to pass; and I think we should endeavor to see if we cannot contrive some way to relieve the Senate of this difficulty, so that we may have some discrimination in regard to these cases. I make this suggestion to the Senator in a friendly spirit, because I feel that some of these men should be relieved—I cannot say how many; but it seems to me to be the better way to legislate for individual cases, if we can contrive some way to do it. I have no personal wish about it. I make the suggestion to him as to the best course to be taken with it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I know that is the feeling of the Senator from New Hampshire, but it is doubtful if we can really get to understand this case any more thoroughly than we now understand it, and if it is postponed until late in the session, the difficulty would be to secure a consideration of it in the House of Representatives. These parties are much pressed, and ought to have some relief; and as this is not quite half as much as the board allowed them, I thought it certainly would be adopted by the Senate. If we could agree upon any plan safer to the Government and more just to the parties, I would be willing to do it. I have considered the subject in every light possible. I thought myself that the safer way was to adopt the report of the board, but as Senators for whose judgment I have a great deal of respect thought that was giving too much, and the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs proposes twelve per cent. on the contract prices, a reduction, I believe, of more than one half, I thought we might agree upon that.

Mr. CLARK. I will state to the Senator the difficulty which is likely to occur, and which will embarrass us, perhaps, to some extent. Here are some forty-two or forty-three of these claimants put into one bill. They do not include all this class of cases; and we are continually in the receipt of letters from other parties, who say, "We do not claim anything upon our contracts; we took a contract, we have fulfilled it, and though we have lost by it, we are bound by it; we do not ask anything; but if these parties are to be relieved by a general bill, we ought to be relieved also." How can the Senate resist such an application?

Mr. HENDRICKS. So far as my knowledge goes on that subject, I think this bill, with the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts, really covers about all the cases that have any equity. There is one case, I will state to the Senator, which is not here, but which I think will address itself forcibly to the Senate, and that is the case of Mr. Webb, who constructed the Dunderberg, a grand vessel, perhaps the greatest vessel-of-war in the world. I shall be in favor, so far as I know anything about his case, of giving him some relief. I think he has produced the greatest vessel, perhaps, in the world; but he could not present his case to the board, and he will have to appeal upon the merits of his separate case. I do not know of any other than that one.

Mr. POMEROY. I move that the Senate postpone the consideration of the present and all other orders, and proceed to the consideration of the special order, which is the bill for the admission of Colorado into the Union.

Mr. NYE. I hope the Senator from Kansas will withdraw that motion long enough to enable us to get a vote on this bill.

Mr. POMEROY. If the Senate is ready to vote on this question I am willing to allow the special order to be laid aside temporarily for that purpose; but if we are to have no vote upon it I think we had better proceed to the consideration of the special order.

Mr. CLARK. It is pretty evident, if the Senator will allow me, that we cannot come to a vote at once. There is pending the motion of the Senator from Missouri to postpone the bill until the first Monday of December next, and, then, if that is defeated, and the bill is to pass, I desire to propose an amendment to it before it does pass, and that will necessarily take some little time.

Mr. POMEROY. It could not be passed to-day, probably.

Mr. CLARK. I do not know, but I think we had better go on with the subject that is regularly before the Senate.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If that is the view of the Senator, I will move that this bill be made the order of the day for to-morrow at half past twelve o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion now before the Senate is to postpone the present and all prior orders and proceed to the consideration of the bill for the admission of Colorado into the Union.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move that this subject be made the special order for to-morrow at half past twelve o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is another motion before the Senate.

Mr. NYE. I hope the Senator from Kansas will withdraw his motion long enough to allow the motion to be put on postponing this subject until to-morrow.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope it will not be made a special order in the morning hour.

Mr. POMEROY. I have no objection to this bill being considered to-morrow, and I am willing to make it the special order for to-morrow at one o'clock; but I think we had better proceed now with the consideration of the special order. It has been postponed from time to time, and by a sort of unanimous consent it was agreed that it should be considered to-day.

Mr. HENDRICKS. There is nobody opposing that. My motion is that this subject be made the special order at half past twelve o'clock to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion before the Senate is to postpone the present and all prior orders and proceed to the consideration of the special order, and that motion must be put unless it be withdrawn.

Mr. POMEROY. I will withdraw that in order to allow the motion of the Senator from Indiana to be made.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Then I move that this subject be made the special order for to-morrow at half past twelve o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question really before the Senate is the bill making appropriations for the Post Office Department, but that bill will be considered as laid aside, if there be no objection, in order to entertain the motion of the Senator from Indiana, which is, that the bill recently before the Senate for the relief of certain naval contractors be postponed to and made the special order for to-morrow at half past twelve o'clock.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope it will not be introduced into the morning hour.

Several SENATORS. Say one o'clock.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Very well; I will say one o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

ADMISSION OF COLORADO.

Mr. POMEROY. I now renew the motion to postpone all prior orders and proceed to the consideration of the bill for the admission of Colorado.

Mr. SHERMAN. As the Post Office appropriation bill is the unfinished business, and I hope will take but little time, I think we may as well proceed with it. There will be time enough to pass both bills to-day. I hope, therefore, that the Post Office bill may be proceeded with for awhile, and if we find that it is going to take up much time we can then postpone it. It is now in order and is before us.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should like to inquire if the Colorado bill was not the order of the day at one o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was made the special order for to-day at one o'clock, by a vote of the Senate, but the unfinished business of yesterday, by the rule of the Senate, takes precedence of the special order, and the unfinished business is the Post Office appropriation bill.

Mr. McDUGALL. It is my opinion that is the ruling of the Chair in this particular case is not according to the law, and I will state my reason as a point of order. The special order supersedes the order of business, and if the Chair determine upon reflection to rule otherwise I shall be compelled to take an appeal; because these are laws that should be understood, and have to be studied to be learned. A special order overcomes the regular order of business, both in the House of Representatives and in this body, as I have understood it. I think if the President of the Senate will consider for a moment he will agree with me that a special order made by the Senate, for action upon a particular subject at a given hour, governs the regular order of business. In rising to question the judgment of the President I do not propose to reason; I rather rose to suggest that Senators may consider the subject, for it is a matter which, as a precedent, may be of great importance. When the Senate make a special order it is to be relied upon as the voice of the Senate, giving the right to the subject-matter at the hour appointed, independent of the ordinary course of business. So it has been understood always, as far as my knowledge runs, in regard to parliamentary law. I do not profess to be very highly versed in these things, but it seems to me that logically it must be true; and I think if the President will consider carefully he will agree with me. If the President insists upon the ruling which he has made I shall be compelled to take an appeal from the decision, for the purpose of ascertaining what is the law of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will call for the reading of the fifteenth rule of the Senate.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

"15. The unfinished business in which the Senate was engaged at the last preceding adjournment shall have the preference in the special orders of the day."

Mr. SHERMAN. There is no doubt at all about the rule. It is not only clear by the rule, but it has been the daily practice of the Senate ever since I have been a member of the body; probably fifty times in the session the unfinished business takes precedence of all other special orders. But I rose to say that I find it is the desire of the Senate, as this day was set apart for the consideration of the Colorado bill, to proceed with it, and I therefore have no objection to postponing the Post Office appropriation bill. I give notice that I shall call it up at an early day, in order to get it passed.

Mr. McDUGALL. "When ignorance is bliss, it is folly to be wise." My wisdom I withdraw.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on postponing the present and all prior orders to proceed to the consideration of the Colorado bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the motion submitted by Mr. WILSON to reconsider the vote by which the Senate rejected the bill (S. No. 74) for the admission of the State of Colorado into the Union, upon which the yeas and nays had been ordered.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, on the 13th of March last, after a debate of two days, the Senate rejected a bill for the admission of Colorado as a State into the Union. This was by a vote of 21 yeas to 14 nays, being a majority of 7. And now, after an interval of more than a month, a motion is made to reconsider that vote. An attempt is made to revive a question which at that time seemed to have been buried. Of course those who press this motion have a right to do so, if they are satisfied in their minds that the motion ought to be pressed. I do not complain of them. But I meet the proposition on the threshold. I do not content myself by waiting to another stage and entering into the discussion after we have allowed the reconsideration. I oppose the reconsideration. I insist that this subject, once closed by such a majority, and on such good grounds, as I shall proceed to show, shall not again be opened in this Chamber.

Sir, the proposition concerns the admission of a State into this Union. I need not remind you that in other days no such proposition could be made in this Chamber without exciting great interest. Some of the most remarkable debates that have occurred in the Senate have been on such propositions. The proposition has two aspects: first, as it concerns the people in the Territory itself, who, I submit, are not prepared to assume the responsibilities of a State government; and secondly, as it concerns the other States in the Union, who, I submit also, ought not to be obliged at this moment to receive this community into full equality as a State.

On another occasion I felt it my duty to remind you of the position, the responsibilities, the powers, and the prerogatives of a State in this Union. I held up before you what you would undertake to convey to this small community if you invested it with the character of a State. I showed you that you would impart to it a full equality in this Chamber with the largest States in the Union; with New York, with Pennsylvania, with Ohio, with Massachusetts; and that in the exercise of this equality the Senators from this small community on all questions of legislation, of diplomacy, and of appointments, might counterbalance the Senators of these large States. Assuming that this small community was already a State in the Union, I had no criticism to make on that equality of power; but I did present it to you as an unanswerable argument why you should not admit a community so small in the proper attributes of a State to the enjoyment of that high equality.

Permit me to say, sir, that you cannot adequately consider this question without giving your attention for one moment to the condition of the country at the moment when the question arises. We are happily at the close of a long, a bloody, and a most expensive war. Throughout that war, there was one question that entered into it, predominating over all others. It was the question of justice to the colored race. And now, sir, that the war is closed, that our soldiers are no longer in the tented field, that same question enters into your debates, and challenges your decision. You have before you at every stage of your legislation the question of justice to the colored race. And now, with this question staring you in the face, what do we see at this moment? A small community in a distant part of the country, small in population, even according to the statements of its friends not amounting in numbers to more than twenty-five or thirty thousand people; according to the statements of others, even as few in numbers as ten or fifteen thousand people; with agricultural resources that already begin to fail; with mining resources that during the last two or three years have been constantly failing; with accounts at the Post Office which during the past year have been failing; we have this small community coming forward and asking admission to equality as a State in the Union with a constitution that tramples on human rights. This new candidate, pressing for recognition, holds up a constitution which excludes all persons from the electoral franchise who are not white. It presents to you a constitution with a discrimination of the word "white;" and the question that you now have before you is, whether this small community, so slender in every respect, of such inferior condition, and coming forward with a principle of human inequality in its constitution, shall be admitted by you to the equality of States in this Union. You are not obliged to admit it. Your discretion is ample. The language of the Constitution is plain. "New States may be admitted into the Union," not must be, but "may be." You may exercise your discretion in the exercise of this prerogative. You may admit, or you may reject. Therefore when called to act, you must exercise your discretion. You cannot decline to exercise it. You must bring your judgment to bear upon the case; you must consider well all the facts and all the elements which enter into the civilization of this candidate community; you must consider of course its population, its resources, and also the character of its constitution. In doing so, you can have no feeling except of kindness and sympathy for the people there. God knows that I wish them well from the bottom of my heart. There is no aspiration which I do not offer for their welfare; but, on this occasion, we must consider the requirements of duty. And here the way is clear.

Now, sir, allow me to say, with these few words of introduction, that I present to you this proposition, that such a community as now exists in Colorado, deficient in population, failing already in agriculture, failing already in mineral resources, and with a constitution which sets at defiance the first principle of human rights, should not at this moment be recognized as a State of the Union. Mark me, if you please; I say at this moment and under these circumstances. The proposition that I present is compound or complex. I do not found my conclusion on any one of these elements or details, but I found it on the whole compounded together; and I say, sir, that at this moment, at the close of this war, when by every obligation we are solemnly bound to maintain the rights of the colored race, you will err if you give your hand to such a community as I have described, which, so inferior in population and resources, comes forward with a constitution denying those rights.

Thus much, sir, I have to say by way of introduction; all this is simply that I may open to you in one word the magnitude of the question and the general principles which underlie it; but before I sit down it will be my duty to consider with some minuteness the actual condition and the resources of this Territory. And here, at this stage of the discussion, I hope to be pardoned if I call the attention of the Senate to a document which I find on our tables and which has been read I dare say by Senators. It is a pamphlet entitled "Colorado," and is addressed "to the honorable the members of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States," and is signed "J. B. Chaffee and John Evans, Senators-elect." As I proceed it will be my duty to allude to statements in this pamphlet, which is the repository of facts and arguments for the admission of Colorado. I am reluctant to criticize it; but I believe if any Senator will canvass it from beginning to the end, he will find that there are very few of its statements which are entirely candid, very few which in point of fact can be relied upon in all respects. I said that it was signed by J. B. Chaffee and John Evans. Now, sir, I do not intend to introduce any personal question into this discussion so far as it can be avoided; but as this document is on our tables, and as it is here with a certain authority, in order to enlighten us as to our duty on this occasion, I think I shall not err if I call the attention of the Senate to the solemn judgment of one of the most honored committees of this body on the conduct of one of the signers of that document. I have in my hand the third volume of the Report of the Committee on the Conduct of the War, and I turn to the head of "the massacres of the Cheyenne Indians." That report, which is signed by B. F. WADE, chairman, after alluding to the testimony of Governor John Evans, one of the signers of the document now on your tables, proceeds as follows:

"His testimony before your committee was characterized by such prevarication and shuffling as has been shown by no witness they have examined during the four years they have been engaged in their investigations; and for the evident purpose of avoiding the admission that he was fully aware that the Indians massacred so brutally at Sand creek, were then, and had been, actuated by the most friendly feelings toward the whites, and had done all in their power to restrain those less friendly disposed."

Such, sir, is the language of your committee characterizing the testimony of the Governor of Colorado who now comes here to plead for the admission of that Territory as a State into this Union. His testimony is held up as "characterized by such prevarication and shuffling as has been shown by no witness they have examined during the four years they have been engaged in their investigations." It is that gentleman who now signs the paper I hold in my hand which is addressed to you in the expectation of influencing your votes on this occasion.

I shall not consider minutely the character of this pamphlet; but I will at this stage call attention to the very first proposition as an illustration of what seems to me the uncandid way in which the facts are presented. I may err; but this is the way it seems to me. For instance, here is a statement of the area of this Territory, which amounts, as it is said, to one hundred and five thousand eight hundred and eighteen square miles. Of this the pamphlet says that two fifths is east of the Rocky mountains, and that its agricultural and pastoral lands comprise forty-two thousand square miles, or over twenty-five million acres. That is the statement with which the pamphlet begins. Against this statement, which is not authenticated in any way, not supported by any authority, I oppose authority. I have in my hands a transcript from the report of the surveyor general of Colorado, dated August 15, 1865, addressed to the Commissioner of the General

Land Office, in whose annual report it appears. This authority is as follows:

"The extreme limit of the amount of land capable of cultivation in Colorado will not vary much from twenty-five hundred thousand acres."

Thus is the first statement in this pamphlet sweated down, if I may so express it, from twenty-five million to twenty-five hundred thousand acres.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. The Senator will allow me a moment. Will not the Senator find the statement he has just read from the surveyor general's report, word for word and letter for letter, in the paper submitted by Mr. Evans and Mr. Chaffee? Then wherein is the misrepresentation, I should be glad to know, when the very words read by the Senator from Massachusetts are in the report signed by those gentlemen?

Mr. RAMSEY. Does not the Senator recognize a difference between agricultural and pastoral lands?

Mr. NYE. The two and a half millions are agricultural, the other are pastoral lands.

Mr. SUMNER. But they are the same.

Mr. NYE. Not at all. They do not mean the same in the western States. One means sage brush, the other a place where things will grow.

Mr. SUMNER. They mean substantially the same; and it did seem to me that in the form of the statement there was a disposition to exaggerate uncandidly the actual condition of the Territory. And if I am mistaken, then I am happy to be corrected, and proceed at once to consider the important question of population. It will be remembered that when this enabling act was under discussion my excellent friend, the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. WADE,] who had the bill in charge, stated as follows. I quote from the Globe:

"I understand there must be now about sixty thousand inhabitants in Colorado. Some think a great deal more than that. That is the smallest number I find intimated by those who profess to know anything about it. It is a Territory which is filling up very rapidly. Judge Edmunds tells me that he has not the least doubt in the world that before they finish their arrangements and become a State, there will be sufficient population there for a Representative in Congress according to the ratio of representation fixed by the last census."

That was more than one hundred thousand. So that when the enabling act was passed the Senator from Ohio announced to us, on authority which he regarded, of course, as satisfactory, that there was a population there actually of sixty thousand. Now, the population, instead of increasing to one hundred thousand and more as the Senator triumphantly promised, has been constantly diminishing, growing smaller year by year according to all the evidence that comes to us, especially as shown in the annual elections. Thus, for instance, at the election for members of a Territorial Legislature in the autumn of 1861, the aggregate vote was 10,580; in December, 1861, a few months later, the aggregate vote for Delegate to Congress was 9,354, diminishing, you will observe. In October, 1862, the aggregate vote for a Delegate to Congress was 8,224, still again diminishing. In September, 1864, the aggregate vote was 5,769. In September, 1864, again there was a vote under the congressional enabling act to determine whether a State government should be adopted or rejected, and the aggregate vote was 6,192. Then, again, in September, 1865, only this last September, there was another vote on the adoption of the constitution now before us, when we have, all told, only 5,905. So that you will see that from 1861 down to the last evidence before us, the population of this Territory instead of increasing has been diminishing. Instead of rising to the proportions and the stature of a State, it has been gradually dwarfing into proportions, I might almost say, hardly fit for a Territory. It has shrunk inconceivably and beyond all precedent. I believe there is no other instance in our history where a Territory has gone backwards. Always before population has increased. It is the rule of this country; it is the tendency of our people. But here the reverse has occurred. If you ask the reason why, it is plain. The Territory of Colorado is vast in extent, situated on the two opposite sides of a chain of mountains, like Italy "parted by the Apennines," sparsely settled, with few centers, with scanty resources, so that emigrants arriving there from foreign lands or from the East, instead of being tempted to stay are seduced to go still further West.

"Westward the star of empire takes its way," and they finally plant themselves in Montana, or Idaho, or Oregon, leaving behind them Colorado, so that in point of fact this Territory can hardly be said at this moment to have what may be called a permanent population. It is a floating population not yet attached to the soil, but still subject to change, and still subject to the temptation of emigration to other Territories.

Thus, for instance, Hon. SAMUEL McLEAN, Delegate in Congress from the Territory of Montana, says in reply to inquiries addressed to him, that he was a resident of Colorado from 1859 to March, 1862; he then went to Montana, and in the fall of 1864 was elected Delegate. He estimates the population of Montana at nearly forty thousand, "one fourth of whom went there from Colorado and are still going."

Mr. POMEROY. I ask the Senator if there is any other way of getting to Montana from the East except by going through Colorado. Do not they all have to go through Colorado?

Mr. SUMNER. When he says they went there from Colorado I interpret that he meant that they made Colorado a temporary home.

Mr. POMEROY. They may have staid there over night.

Mr. SUMNER. He could not mean any such thing. That would be playing with words. He says he estimates the population of Montana at nearly forty thousand, "one fourth of whom went there from Colorado and are still going." What is the natural meaning of these words? Obviously that they are emigrating from Colorado to Montana.

Mr. POMEROY. They come to my own State in the same way from the East and from Europe. They go to Massachusetts in the same way, and then go on; but we do not argue from that that Massachusetts is not a State, or that Kansas is not a State. This star of empire goes westward. These emigrants stop for a time in all the States. That is what that means, that they staid for a time in Colorado and then they went on to Montana.

Mr. SUMNER. But the figures I have read it seems to me are sufficient. They explain themselves and answer the Senator from Kansas. They show this constant decrease; and thus, for instance, at the last election there were only 5,905 voters. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. NYE] refers me to a vote of 7,000 which occurred, as I understand, at the Governor's election. I have been told that there are some circumstances of a peculiar character, some persons call them frauds, which affected that vote, so that I have not undertaken to discuss it. It was not cited in our debates the other day, and I have not chosen to introduce it into the discussion now.

Mr. NYE. I have it here.

Mr. SUMNER. The statement that I have before me from a citizen of Colorado, I will read, then:

"The last vote in Colorado is not given for the reason that the canvassers threw out a great many of the ballots because illegally cast, or rather because of monstrous frauds. Over a thousand, it is currently reported, were thrown out from one district. The number returned from the several voting precincts was over 7,000."

Assuming that over 7,000 were returned and that 1,000 were thrown out in one district for fraud, you have that cut down at once to 6,000; but assuming that it is 7,000, what is all this compared to the original 10,000 votes with which the Territory began, and compared also to the splendid promises which the Senator from Ohio made with regard to the Territory when he first called the attention of the Senate to it? And how do you account for this falling off, except by the supposition that the population is tempted to other lands westward?

I have said that the Territory had been failing in population. I now remind you that it has also been failing in agriculture. On that head I quote the authority of the surveyor general of Colorado in his report dated August 15, 1865, as follows:

"No land can be cultivated without irrigation. The great drawback to the settlement of Colorado is the want of system in the method of irrigation."

"An emigrant generally leaves the Missouri river early in the spring, and arrives here in time to make a crop, provided he could find a farm already prepared for working; this he cannot do, and to dig the ditch necessary to irrigate a farm will consume the whole summer, and take more money than most emigrants have. The consequence is, that thousands come here, spend a few days trying to get a farm, and go on further west."

There, again, is an answer to the inquiry of my friend from Kansas, [Mr. POMEROY.] It seems that the surveyor general of Colorado says that these emigrants, after spending a few days at Colorado vainly trying to get a farm there, go on further west.

Mr. POMEROY. They do precisely that when they are in Illinois, and when they are in Missouri, and when they are in Kansas. Those men who are moving west only stop a little while. If they are not suited in one place they go on to another. That is precisely what this statement proves.

Mr. SUMNER. But the figures here show something more. We have also a statement in the same report of the surveyor general to the effect that grasshoppers have interfered with the products of the soil. Its agriculture has been essentially impaired by that insect. Here are his words:

"The only drawback to the cultivation of land is the grasshopper."

Again, speaking of the crop of 1865 he says: "The grasshoppers have destroyed all of two thirds of the grain crop."

As no crops can be raised without great expense at ditching, and appealing to that irrigation which was essential to the agriculture of ancient Egypt, while there is no Nile in Colorado to contribute from its abundant waters, and as the grasshoppers destroy two thirds of the crop before it is raised, we see easily why the farming population of Colorado has diminished.

Then, sir, we come to the mineral resources. Colorado is a mining Territory; its population is mining. But here there has been the same retrogression. Instead of going forward the Territory has been going backward. Thus, for instance, the same official report which I have already quoted, speaking of the mining, says, "the gold crop of the present year, 1864, has been almost a failure." Then, again, this same authority, in the report of 1865, says:

"Gold mining is almost at a standstill. Only fifteen hundred ounces per week is being produced in the whole mining region of Colorado, and the product for the year will not exceed one million dollars."

"The speculations of last year caused an entire stoppage of all the old mills."

"A few of the new mills are now in motion, but at the present cost of labor, and everything else, they cannot more than pay expenses. Many companies are doing nothing, some waiting for better times, some waiting for machinery, some experimenting on new processes, and some fooling away their money by trusting their affairs to ignorant men, and some who never intend to mine outside of Wall street."

Such is the official testimony with regard to the mines, and yet we are told in the pamphlet which is on our tables and to which I have already referred, that "Colorado, as a gold-producing country, is second only to California." In point of fact there was a time when it was second only to California, but that time has passed. If you look at the statistics you will find that the figures give an unerring answer. Take, for instance, the finance report for the year ending June 30, 1863. There it appears that California produced $13,501,000 of gold in that year; Oregon, $3,016,000; Colorado, $2,893,000; so that in 1863 Colorado instead of being the second was the third. Then take the same report for the year ending June 30, 1864, we find that California that year produced $15,071,000 of gold; Idaho, $2,806,000—

Mr. STEWART. Who makes that report?

Mr. SUMNER. I give these figures from the finance report.

Mr. STEWART. That must be the amount that went to the Mint. California has never produced less than forty million dollars in any year.

Mr. SUMNER. Very well; it is the report, so far as it goes, of the Superintendent of the Mint, founded on the receipts of that institution.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I desire to inquire if the Senator is giving us the figures officially communicated by the Director of the Mint?

Mr. SUMNER. These figures are taken from the finance report of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. STEWART. That gives a very small fraction of the actual production.

Mr. SUMNER. It goes on the basis of what is received at the Mint.

Mr. STEWART. But a very small portion of the product of the country goes to the Mint. We are producing annually in the United States, according to the best estimate we are able to get, $100,000,000 of gold and silver, while, according to the report on which the Senator relies, only about twenty millions go to the Mint.

Mr. SUMNER. I was commenting on the statement in the pamphlet, as follows:

"The report of the Superintendent of the Mint shows that Colorado, as a gold-producing country, is second only to California."

I answered this statement by the finance report, showing the contrary; so that, according to this highest authority, whatever may have been the position of Colorado five or six years ago, during the last three years it has not been the second gold-producing region of our country.

When the Senator interrupted me, I was giving the figures from the finance report for the year ending June 30, 1864, showing from California $15,710,000 of gold, from Idaho $2,806,000, from Oregon $2,162,000, and from Colorado $2,136,000; so that in 1864 Colorado stood fourth on the list, instead of standing second. Then comes the finance report for the year ending June 30, 1865, where it appears that California produced $13,332,000 of gold, Idaho $4,971,000, Montana $1,767,000, and Colorado $1,622,000; so that during this last year Colorado was again fourth on the list, instead of being the second. For the years 1861, 1862, 1863, and 1864, Colorado, according to this testimony, produced over two millions annually, but in 1865 it produced considerably less than two millions; less in 1864 than in 1863; less in 1862 than 1861. Therefore, sir, according to this unanswerable evidence, you find that her mineral wealth has been failing, and that this Territory has been less productive than it was at the beginning.

Sir, there is another illustration which goes to show how this Territory has been falling off. I refer to the Post Office. I need not remind you that there is no part of our system which quickens, increases, and expands with time more than the Post Office. There is no person who does not write more letters this year than he wrote the year before. So with all families. The interchanges of affection and of business grows naturally rather than diminishes. If you find, therefore, that there is a falling off in the Post Office, it is because the population there has essentially failed, showing there is not the same need of a Post Office that there was before. In this respect the fall has not been great, but it has been enough to indicate a retrogression. It shows what I have been aiming to exhibit from the beginning, that this Territory has been going backward. According to the report of the Postmaster General for the year ending June 30, 1863, there was received from letters in this Territory $1,440, from papers $993, from the sale of stamps $14,263, making a sum total of $16,697 received by the Post Office from this Territory. For the year ending June 30, 1864, you had from letters $1,185, a fewer number of letters than the year before; you had from papers $674, a fewer number of papers than the year before; and you had from the sale of stamps $12,953, being a sum total of $14,812, showing a decrease in one year of $1,685. To my mind this is a painful revelation, and it speaks volumes.

Thus, sir, does it appear from this somewhat minute survey that this Territory has gone backward in population, in agriculture, in mining, and in the Post Office. But this is not all; this is not its only retrogression; there has been a worse retrogression than any in population or agriculture or the Post Office. There has been a retrogression in republican principle. The Territory began by a recognition of human rights. As it proceeded here also was another retrogression, and it denied what it began by recognizing. Like Peter, it denied its Lord. I add, therefore, to this exhibition of the failure of this Territory, its failure in republican principles, and this I shall proceed to show by the authority of the present Governor of the Territory in his message communicated to the Legislature of the Territory under date of January 23, 1866. By this message it appears that the original organic act creating the Territory provided that the qualification of voters should be "such as shall be prescribed by the Legislative Assembly." Under the authority thus conferred, the Legislative Assembly at its first session passed a law regulating elections, which was approved November 6, 1861, providing that—

"Every male person of the age of twenty-one years or upward who shall have resided in the Territory for three months next preceding any election shall be deemed a qualified voter at such election."

Here is no discrimination of color. This was the way this Territory began in 1861; but as it proceeded, the same failure which showed itself in other respects showed itself in its devotion to the principle embodied in this legislation, until at last the Legislative Assembly at its session of 1864, by an act approved March 11, 1864, declared that no person being a negro or mulatto should be a voter. The language of the statute was—

"Every male citizen of the age of twenty-one years or upward, not being a negro or mulatto, shall be deemed a qualified voter."

Here, by expressed language, open and barefaced, negroes and mulattoes were put under the ban. A caste was established. A discrimination, odious, offensive, and unchristian was organized in the statutes of the Territory.

Sir, consider, that when this act was passed, in March, 1864, the country was still struggling in that terrible war involving the great question of justice to the colored race. At that moment this distant community, already aspiring to be a State in the Union, undertook to put its feet upon the colored race that had begun to gather under its jurisdiction. We are told they are few in number, perhaps a hundred; but out of that hundred there are some seventy who promptly went forth as soldiers to do battle for your flag; but when they returned to their homes they found that the franchise that they had already enjoyed was taken from them; that they who had periled life for to save the Republic and to aid it in establishing the rights of all, when they once more found themselves at their own firesides were despoiled of their own. Sir, am I wrong when I say that here was a retrogression in republican principles; that here was a departure from those fundamental truths which are essential to our Government. It was, I say, a departure and retrogression because this community had begun right. It began by recognizing these truths; but as if blasted by some evil genius, the same failure that attended it in population, in agriculture, in mining, and in other respects, seemed to descend upon its moral sense.

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SUMNER. Certainly.

Mr. STEWART. I would inquire of the Senator if at the time he voted for this enabling act he supposed that the laws of Colorado allowed negroes to vote.

Mr. SUMNER. If the Senator will be good enough to wait till I come to that point I shall answer it. I would rather not answer it now, but in the proper place.

Mr. STEWART. Then I have another question to ask, founded on that.

Mr. SUMNER. You had better, perhaps, ask me then.

Mr. STEWART. Very well.

Mr. SUMNER. I shall consider the question to which the Senator directs my attention at another place. I do not wish to avoid anything. I was now portraying the failure of this community; its fall, rather let me say. I do not use too strong language. I say it was a fall when this community, which had solemnly enacted justice, after the lapse of three years reversed its own decree, and solemnly enacted injustice. There it stands on the statute-book. You must recognize it. You cannot blink it out of sight. You cannot be insensible to it. It is a fact in the history of this Territory. No other Territory in the history of the country has ever been thus guilty. No other Territory which has risen to the height of justice has ever descended again so low. No other Territory which has undertaken to recognize the rights of man has afterward undertaken to overthrow them.

The Governor of the Territory, in the message which I hold in my hand, speaking of this question, says in language which does him honor: "It seems incredible, and were it not for the record it would be incredible, that such a measure could have been adopted at such a time."

The Governor in the same message goes on to show that these same colored men while despoiled of the elective franchise are nevertheless compelled to pay taxes to support the whole government and to support the public schools from which their children are excluded. Some of the more prosperous of them, in order to secure education for their children, have been obliged to send them to distant parts of the country, because this churlish and unjust community has denied to those children the rights of education while their parents are taxed for the support of schools. All this again is set forth by the Governor in the message which I hold in my hand, and he then adds:

"I do not propose in this connection to discuss the question of equality of race, about which so many words and so much labor have been wasted; but I submit without argument the fact that the colored people in Denver and various parts of the Territory are taxed for educating white children, while their own children are excluded from the public schools, and your action will determine how long this humiliating spectacle shall be presented to the world."

Could anything be more flagrant? And yet this community now appeals for your favor and countenance and welcome as a State.

I have alluded to the message of the Governor. I now cite another authority, which is a telegraphic dispatch from a colored citizen of Colorado, which has traveled over the wires a very long distance, as follows:

DENVER CITY, COLORADO, January 15, 1866.

The law adopted by the Territorial Legislature in 1861 allowed all persons over twenty-one to vote, without distinction of color. The law passed in 1864, signed by Governor Evans, deprived colored citizens of the right at the very time when appealing to them to help save the country. The admission of Colorado under her present constitution makes that law permanent. If not admitted now, this can be corrected.

WILLIAM J. HARDING,
A colored citizen.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senator from Massachusetts has the territorial statute by him I wish he would read it. I do not understand that any negro ever did vote in Colorado, and I do not understand that there ever was a law of that Territory declaring that "any person" should vote. My information in regard to it is that the right of voting was confined to citizens, and they held in Colorado that a negro was not a citizen. That is not my opinion, but that was their opinion, and in point of fact no colored person ever did vote there. The language is not, according to my information, as the Senator reads it. I wish he would read the exact language if he has the statute.

Mr. SUMNER. I have read it from the Governor's message; I will read it again.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Does he quote the statute?

Mr. SUMNER. He quotes it precisely, and he gives it the interpretation I do. As he quotes it the word "citizen" is not there, and it reads thus:

"Every male person of the age of twenty-one years or upward who shall have resided in the Territory for three months next preceding any election shall be deemed a qualified voter at such election."

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have not the statute, but my information is that the word used was "citizen."

Mr. HOWARD. What was the date of the statute?

Mr. SUMNER. November 6, 1861, and it was passed in pursuance of the organic act. I have already referred to it amply; I do not wish to take up too much time in this discussion. So the Senate will see that the question presented by my friend from Illinois did not arise there. There was no question of citizenship. The language was broad and general; it was applicable to every male person of the age of twenty-one years or upward, and was the statute which in 1864 was reversed.

In further exhibition of the retrograde spirit which prevails in this Territory, I shall read a brief extract from a letter which I hold in my hand from a gentleman well known to my colleague, who left Massachusetts to make a home in Colorado—Hon. Rodney French. My colleague knows him as an excellent person, devoted to human rights, hating slavery, anxious for freedom everywhere and always. He is now at home in Massachusetts; and he writes me as follows under date of April 18—you will perceive that it is a very recent letter:

"The only colored man in the Territory who dared to offer to vote against the constitution was shot dead like a dog in the street the other day, and no more notice taken of it by the authorities than if he had been a beast. I sincerely hope and trust the motion to reconsider may not prevail."

And now, sir, we are asked to admit this Territory thus deficient in population, thus deficient in agricultural resources, thus failing in mining resources, thus failing in the Post Office. We are asked to admit this Territory with a constitution denying human rights. Will you admit it? Will you by any such vote interfere, as you surely will, with that just influence which you ought to exercise in the reconstruction of the States lately in rebellion? You have in those States this same question, shall the word "white" be allowed to continue in constitutions and statutes? And how can you insist that it shall be excluded from constitutions and statutes there, when you receive into the Union this new community with a constitution which tolerates this principle of exclusion? I have already said that you have complete control of the whole question; it is within your absolute discretion; you may shut this State out if you please; you may admit it if you please; but I call upon you to exercise that discretion so that human rights may not fail. Do not tell me that Connecticut failed to overthrow this proscription. Sir, do not imitate Connecticut. If you recognize this proscription, you will be as bad as Connecticut.

And now, sir, what is the argument, if argument it be called, which is brought forward in favor of the admission of this community as a State of the Union? I know of but one, unless there be another which occurs in a whisper and not in debate, to which before I close I may refer. I know of but one argument which has been adduced in debate, and that is founded on the enabling act of March 21, 1864, which is entitled "An act to enable the people of Colorado to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States." If I understand the argument, it is that Congress by this statute pledged itself in advance to admit this community as a State into this Union; that we are bound by this statute so that we cannot escape this obligation; that, in short, we are tied up by this statute. This is a strong assumption; but I believe it is an accurate statement of the position of the other side.

Now, sir, I think I can easily show that this is a great mistake. I may remind you in the first place that the President to whom this question was naturally submitted first, in a message to the Senate has expressly stated to you that in his opinion the new constitution which is now before the Senate was not formed in pursuance of the enabling act. In that message he sets forth the character of this enabling act, shows that there was an attempt to form a constitution in pursuance of it which failed, and that there was another constitution formed by political bodies independent of the enabling act, which he has submitted to your consideration. Of this second constitution he says:

"The proceedings in the second instance for the formation of a State government having differed in time and mode from those specified in the act of March 21, 1864, I have declined to issue the proclamation for which provision is made in the fifth section of the law, and therefore submit the question for the consideration and further action of Congress."

Thus, sir, the President did not feel authorized to issue his proclamation in pursuance of this enabling act declaring Colorado a State in the Union; he referred the question to you, and you must decide it; and here, again, I shall read another dispatch from the same telegraphic correspondent that I read from before, as follows:

"DENVER CITY, COLORADO, January 18, 1866.

"Please contradict in the newspapers the stories so industriously published at the East that the recent bastard State movement was in compliance with the terms of the enabling act. Not one single condition of the enabling act was observed, and many of its provisions were clearly violated, particularly that one which says the State constitution should accord with the principles of the Declaration of Independence."

If we examine these proceedings in detail, we shall see clearly how they differ from the requirements of the enabling act. In short, they are inconsistent with it, or outside of it so far as to derive no support from this act. This is clear as day.

It appears that this enabling act was approved on the 21st of March, 1864. Among other things it provides in section three that the Governor shall "by proclamation on or before the first Monday of May next, order an election of representatives" "to be held on the first Monday in June thereafter throughout the Territory." You will observe that this election is to be held at a specified time, the first Monday in June. This is a fixed point.

Then, again, by another provision it is declared that "in case a constitution and State government shall be formed for the people of said Territory of Colorado, in compliance with the provisions of this act, the said convention forming the same shall provide by ordinance for submitting said constitution to the people of the said State for their ratification or rejection at an election to be held on the second Tuesday of October, 1864."

There again you have another fixed date, containing a limitation in time. The constitution was to be submitted at a specified date; the representatives to the convention were to be chosen at a specified date. Then the last section of this statute provides for the admission of Colorado as a State into the Union. How? "In pursuance of this act;" in no other way. Thus the State, in order to claim any benefit under this act, must comply with all the conditions of the act; its representatives must be chosen at the time mentioned and the constitution must be accepted by the people at the time mentioned, and everything must be "in pursuance of this act." Those conditions failing, the act fails.

Now, sir, what occurred? The Governor, in pursuance of this act, did call together a convention at the day specified, and that convention did submit a constitution to the people which, at the day specified, was voted on and rejected. At that vote there were for the constitution 1,520 votes only. Against it there were 4,672 votes. When that constitution was rejected the enabling act expired; it was functus officio; it had been acted upon and under. There was nothing more to be done in pursuance of it. But, sir, the next year certain parties desirous to galvanize this small community into a State, through political conventions or caucuses, acting through the committees of the different parties, got together a convention which proceeded to adopt a constitution which, after being submitted to the people, was adopted by a vote of 155 majority, and you have now the question before you whether that constitution, adopted under such circumstances, shall be recognized by the Senate. Surely not in virtue of the enabling act, because in reality nothing had been done under this act.

I have said that the enabling act had expired. It is in vain for Senators to cite it on this occasion. You cannot invoke it. These parties can claim nothing under it. It is like an obsolete statute which we read in the statute-book, but which we never undertake to adduce for authority. It stands as a monument showing what Congress had required, and showing also what this community had failed to perform. In adding it, you bring authority against the present pretension, for you show clearly that this pretension had no foundation in this statute.

But, sir, even assuming that the enabling act was in a condition to be employed for the organization of this Territory, which I insist that it was not, then it is my duty to go further and show you that these parties, as this colored telegraphic correspondent from Denver says, did not in any respect comply with the enabling act. Why, sir? By the enabling act the convention was to be called by the Governor. How was it called? By the executive committees of political parties, being so many caucuses. Such was the origin of the convention which is to give you a new State. What authority for that do you find in the enabling act? Be good enough, if you please, to point out a single word which can justify any such transaction. And yet we have been gravely told that this strange anomalous hocus pocus was by virtue of the enabling act. As if in every respect it was not plainly inconsistent with the enabling act.

Still further, in the second place, the enabling act declares that "the constitution shall be republican in form." This is a fundamental condition. I submit with confidence that a constitution which denies the first principle of human rights cannot be republican in form. Do not tell me that there are States in this Union which have such constitutions. That is no answer. We are not called to sit in judgment on those constitutions; we have no power to revise them; we are not to vote upon them; but here in this case we are called to sit in judgment upon this constitution, to revise it, and to vote upon it. You are to declare by your votes whether a constitution which tramples upon the principle of human equality is republican in form. I insist that it is not.

Still further, this enabling act declares that "the constitution shall not be repugnant to the principles of the Declaration of Independence." I ask you, what is the first principle of the Declaration of Independence? Is it not in solemn words that all men are created equal, and that all just government stands on the consent of the governed? Does any one deny that these are the words? You know them by heart; your children learn them in their earliest infancy; and whatever is done in this Territory is to be brought to these words as to a touchstone. This is a requirement of the enabling act. Therefore do I say that even if you insist that the enabling act is an authority for this proceeding, then do I reply, that this community has not in any respect brought itself within its terms. It has not complied with its terms either of principle or of proceeding. The proceedings were not according to the enabling act; the principles are in defiance of the enabling act. Tried by either standard, the whole effort must miserably fail.

But it is sometimes said that there is an inconsistency in opposing the admission of this State into the Union at this time when we voted for the enabling act; and my friend from Nevada put me a question a few moments ago whether at the time of the passage of the enabling act it was supposed here in the Senate that colored persons exercised the elective franchise. Now, sir, as to the question of inconsistency—

Mr. TRUMBULL. Before the Senator proceeds to that point, as I asked him a question a moment ago whether colored persons ever voted in Colorado, and as I stated that I had been informed that they did not vote there, and that the act under which he supposed they voted was confined to citizens, and that the term "citizen" was construed in Colorado not to embrace colored persons, I desire to read the statute. He read from what purported to be the law of Colorado; but I find, on an examination of the statute which I hold in my hand, that the right of suffrage was confined to citizens.

Mr. SUMNER. Do you refer to the organic statute?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I refer to the statute of Colorado, which the Governor professes to interpret in his communication from which the Senator from Massachusetts read, in which he says that all persons twenty-one years of age being males were entitled to vote. Such was not the law of Colorado.

Mr. SUMNER. Have you the statute?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have the statute before me and I will read it. What he has quoted is true; but it is only a part, and it misled the Senator from Massachusetts. I will read the section:

"That every male person of the age of twenty-one years or upward, belonging to either of the following classes, who shall have resided in the Territory for three months next preceding any election, and ten days in the township, precinct, or ward, in which he offers to vote, shall be deemed a qualified voter at such election:

"1. Citizens of the United States.
"2. Persons of foreign birth who have declared their intention to become citizens conformably to the laws of the United States on the subject of naturalization.
"3. Persons of Indian blood who have been declared by treaty to be citizens of the United States."

Those classes only can vote; and the Senator will see that the Governor by quoting only the first line "every male person of the age of twenty-one years or upward," without quoting the rest of the section, which goes on to declare "belonging to the following classes," misled him, and that the right of suffrage was confined to citizens of the United States and foreigners who had declared their intention to become citizens.

Now, sir, I will not be understood as saying that in my opinion a colored person is not a citizen. I believe he is; but such was not the understanding in Colorado, and no colored person ever did vote there, as I am informed by persons from the Territory; and certainly they could not vote unless they were citizens.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator will indulge me in saying that I do not think his statement alters the case.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That may be, but it is best to be right.

Mr. SUMNER. I submit that the statement of the Senator does not alter the case. Clearly it is best to be right. In the first place, I have followed the message of the actual Governor of the Territory. I felt that I could not follow better authority. I hold his message as communicated to the Legislature now in my hand.

Mr. STEWART. Now let me put my question.

Mr. SUMNER. Very well.

Mr. STEWART. At the same time with the passage of the Colorado enabling act a bill was passed for the admission of Nevada. I want to ask the Senator if he voted for the enabling act of Nevada. This enabling act provided in the same manner that persons allowed to vote on the question of organization should be the same as those who voted for members of the Legislature, &c., in the Territory. I wish to state for the information of the Senator that in the fall of 1861 Nevada passed a law excluding negroes from suffrage, and it was on the statute-book in 1864 and had been during all that period from 1861 up to 1864. Hence I infer that it makes very little difference as to the principle upon which Congress acted at that time whether there was any provision in the laws of Colorado expressly prohibiting negro suffrage, because if there had been that could have been no objection as it was no objection in the case of Nevada. Congress, then, in March, 1861, authorized the Territory to be organized into a State and authorized them to confine the voting population to whites in making that organization, and did not require the extension of suffrage to the negro. At the same time, it is true, it said that the constitution formed should be in accordance with the Declaration of Independence, but it authorized a particular class of persons to organize it, being white persons alone, confined to them. By construing that act in connection with the Nevada enabling act and the laws of Nevada, Congress provided that the State should be organized by whites alone and said that was in accordance with the Declaration of Independence.

Mr. SUMNER. Now, I will proceed to answer, as I was trying to do when I was interrupted by the Senator from Nevada, the Senator from Illinois; but the Senator from Nevada will allow me to say that I think it would have been better and more according to parliamentary rules if he had reserved his question until I had answered the Senator from Illinois. I think his question has nothing to do with that. Has it anything to do with the subject?

Mr. STEWART. If you get at the substance I shall be satisfied.

Mr. SUMNER. As to the question of the Senator from Illinois, I have this to say: the Governor of the Territory, whose message I hold in my hand, does not put upon the statute the interpretation which the Senator does. I have great respect for the opinion of my friend from Illinois, as he knows, but on this matter I submit that the Governor of the Territory on the spot, in a formal communication to the Legislature, is a better authority even than my honorable friend.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Better than the statute?

Mr. SUMNER. I am coming to that. That brings me then to the statute, and he says the statute enumerates as the first in the class citizens of the United States, and my honorable friend himself is obliged to confess that in his opinion colored persons are citizens of the United States. He does not doubt it. If he did, it would be my duty to remind him of that opinion given by the Attorney General of the United States in the winter of 1861-62, only a few months after the adoption of this territorial statute, declaring that all colored persons are citizens of the United States. I refer to that opinion with something more than respect, I refer to it with reverence. I do think, humbly speaking, that that opinion was one of the most remarkable and one of the grandest acts in the history of the late Administration. I do not doubt that hereafter when the annals of these times come to be written, the historian will dwell with honest pride upon that opinion where one man as it were reversed the whole policy of the State. By that opinion he fixed the law of this country forever: that all colored persons are citizens of the United States; and that opinion was emphatically the law of this distant Territory. It was the law of Colorado. The Senator from Illinois does not doubt it. Therefore when the Territorial Legislature inserted the words "citizens of the United States," it did not alter the case by a hair's breadth. The language was positive that all persons could vote without distinction of color. The Senator is informed that no colored persons did vote. I have been informed the contrary. But I insist that, beyond all question, by the territorial statute colored persons were allowed to vote.

And this brings me to another question. When at a later day, in 1864, the enabling act was brought into the Senate, that act recognized positively the existing territorial statutes regulating the franchise. Here are the precise words:

"That all persons qualified by law to vote for representatives to the General Assembly of said Territory at the date of the passage of this act, shall be qualified to be elected; and they are hereby authorized to vote for and choose representatives to form a convention under such rules and regulations as the Governor of said Territory may prescribe."

Therefore, sir, do I say that at the date of the enabling statute all persons in the Territory, without distinction of color, were entitled to vote. They all had the electoral franchise constitutionally and legally. Is there any one who can doubt it? The Senator from Illinois cannot doubt it. He knows full well that that is the Constitution and the law of the land. They were all entitled to vote at the date of that enabling statute. I err when I say "at the date of that enabling statute." There was something like deception, if not fraud, that occurred between the passage of that statute in this Chamber and its approval by the President. The enabling act for the admission of Colorado passed this body, as I find by the Globe, February 24, 1864. This ill-omened territorial statute to which I have referred, which undertook to introduce the principle of exclusion, bears date March 11, 1864; that is, it was passed subsequent to the passage of the enabling act in the Senate. Therefore, when that enabling act passed this body, according to all the information in our possession and according to the principles of the Constitution as expounded by the Attorney General, all colored persons were entitled to vote.

I have been reminded by Senators that there is an inconsistency in having sustained the enabling act and now in opposing the admission of this State. Sir, permit me to say, there is no such inconsistency; because at the time when that act passed the Senate, by that very enabling act all colored persons were entitled to vote. But I might go still further, and remind the Senate that it appears by the Globe, which I have before me, that this enabling act passed the Senate without discussion and without a division. It does not appear who was present in the Senate at the time it was acted upon. For myself, I may say I have no recollection of the vote that was taken, but I do have a distinct recollection that I was informed that in the Territory of Colorado all persons, without distinction of color, were allowed to vote; and a recurrence to the statute which has been adduced on this occasion will show that I was right. It is vain for the Senator from Illinois to remind us that in Colorado they did not consider colored persons citizens of the United States. Constitutionally and legally they were citizens, and there was no power in Colorado to deny them that citizenship. It was because there was no power there to deny them that citizenship that they undertook to set it aside by positive legislation.

Mr. President, I have already said too much on this matter.

Mr. STEWART. How was it about Nevada?

Mr. SUMNER. I beg the Senator's pardon; I have no recollection of the Nevada case. I do not know whether I voted on it or not, and I consider the question as absolutely irrelevant. I am speaking now on the case of Colorado.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President—

Mr. SUMNER. When I am done the Senator can proceed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The Senator from Nevada must not interrupt the Senator from Massachusetts unless he yields the floor.

Mr. SUMNER. If there were a question here in regard to Nevada I should certainly meet it; but there is no such question now. It is enough for us to deal with the case of Colorado.

I was saying, sir, I have already occupied too much time, more than I intended; but there is one other circumstance to which I ought to call attention before I close. It is the anomalous condition of the several counties of Mexican population bordering on New Mexico, and which, as I understand, have, if I may so express myself, been carved out of New Mexico. Those counties contain, according to the estimates of different persons, from six to eight thousand persons, chiefly agricultural. They are farmers. I understand that those people are discontented at finding themselves embraced within the limits of Colorado. They do not speak English. They are Spanish in descent, and they are unwilling to be swept under a jurisdiction which is to them, in many respects, alien. They long to be back in New Mexico. During the last session of Congress a proposition was brought forward in the other House to reannex them to New Mexico. A proposition to the same effect has already been announced in the other House during this session by the Delegate from New Mexico. I have conferred with him on that subject this morning. I learned from him something of the discontent of these Mexicans; and I am assured from other sources that, should Colorado now be received as a State in this Union, so that the condition of these people would be permanently fixed as a part of the State, such is their yearning to get back to their Spanish kindred that they would move in a body to find themselves again within the borders of New Mexico, which is to them country and home, for which they have a sentiment of abiding attachment.

I have said that this Mexican population is estimated variously at from six to eight thousand, being an essential part of the population of Colorado. Imagine it withdrawn from this floating, failing population which I have already described to you, and how small does it become; why, sir, one of my informants, this morning, who has lived for several years in that part of the country, gave me as his opinion that at present the whole population of Colorado, including these Mexicans, was not more than fifteen thousand, and that if these Mexicans should be withdrawn, you would have this community shrunk to a population of seven thousand. I make no statement to that effect. I merely mention this as a suggestion which has come to me from persons familiar with this part of the country. It may at least help to put you on your guard against investing this petty community with the high prerogatives of a State. It may show you again how its population may melt under the State prerogatives, which you promise it.

Mr. President, such is the case against the admission of Colorado as a State into this Union. I do not see how you can admit it into the Union as a State without, in the first place, injustice to its own population, at this moment unable to bear the burdens of a State government; secondly, without injustice to the other States of the Union which ought not to find themselves voted down in this Chamber by two Senators from this small community; and, in the third place, without sacrificing a principle which at this moment is of incalculable importance to the peace of the Republic. In other times we have caught the cry, No more slave States. There is another cry which must be ours, No more States recognizing inequality of Rights. Against all this I hear a whisper, not an argument. It is whispered that we need two more votes on this floor. Sir, there is something that you need more than two more votes. It is constancy in the support of that great principle which is now essential to the tranquillity of the Republic. Better far than any number of votes will be loyalty to this great cause. Tell me not that it is expedient to create two more votes in this Chamber. Permit me to say nothing can be expedient that is not right. If I were now about to pronounce the last words that I could ever utter in this Chamber, I would say to you, Senators, do not forget that right is always the highest expediency. You can never sacrifice the right without suffering for it.

Mr. STEWART. I submitted to the Senator from Massachusetts a question at the time when he was charging that the people of Colorado had acted in bad faith toward Congress. That was the tenor of his argument. He asserted that at the time of the passage of the enabling act they allowed negroes to vote; that after it had passed Congress and before it was signed by the President, they repealed that law and passed a law which prohibited the negroes from voting, and that they had thereby (if there is anything in the argument) deceived Congress, and that Congress would not have acted as it did if there had been a law on the statute-book of Colorado prohibiting negroes from voting. I asked him what Congress had done at the same time in the case of Nevada, and he tells me that that is irrelevant. I say that what Congress did in the same breath, at the same time, and under the same circumstances, is some evidence of their intention at that time. Nevada, in 1861, had inserted the word "white" in fixing the qualification of voters. That law was upon her statute-book; the world knew it; and what did Congress do? On the 21st of March, 1864, the same day on which the Colorado bill was passed, Congress passed an act to enable Nevada to form a State government, and in the third section of that act provided as follows:

"That all persons qualified by law to vote for representatives to the General Assembly of said Territory at the date of the passage of this act shall be qualified to be elected, and they are authorized," &c.

Expressly confining it to persons who were qualified by the laws of Nevada to vote for members of the General Assembly. The laws of Nevada at that time expressly excluded negroes from voting, and therefore the organic act expressly prohibited the people of Nevada from taking the negroes into account in the organization of a State government, and gave the power to form the State government to a particular class. Congress did this on the same day that the enabling act for Colorado was passed; and now the Senator from Massachusetts would have us believe that Congress would not have passed the enabling act for Colorado if she had had such a law upon her statute-book.

Mr. SUMNER. I have not said that. It was not in my argument.

Mr. STEWART. Then there is nothing in the argument to the effect that Congress was deceived. There is nothing in the argument that Colorado changed her law. There is nothing in the argument that there was any bad faith on the part of Colorado in changing her law that influenced Congress, because Congress on the same day in acting on a like subject expressly confined the organization of a State government to the whites; selected as those who should be voters in forming the State government those who had been selected by the territorial law, and those were whites, and whites alone. Then I say that Congress, in March, 1864, were willing, at the time they extended this invitation to Colorado, that a government should be formed by the whites alone and that the negroes should be excluded; and they expressed that willingness in the case of Nevada if they did not in that of Colorado. Whether the laws as they existed in Colorado excluded them or not, they were practically excluded there, and Congress was willing that the new State should be formed exclusively on the white basis for suffrage, because on the same day it provided that another State government should be organized and that only whites should vote. The people of Nevada, supposing that it was not incompatible with the wishes of Congress to put in their constitution the same provision that they had in their laws, their laws having been by the enabling act approved and adopted as a guide for the formation of a State government, when they formed their constitution put in the word "white" the same as Colorado has done. The people of Colorado had no reason to believe that Congress would object in consequence of any action that had previously been taken by them.

Now, a question is raised whether this constitution is republican in form or not. There is much difference of opinion as to what constitutes a government republican in form. Every man has his own ideas on that subject.

I think that is hardly a question that can be raised here. The question with us is whether it comes up to the theory and practice of our Government, and whether it corresponds with the invitation by Congress. If it does, and they have acted in good faith thus far, let us receive them, and let us go forward and announce hereafter the principles that enter into a republican form of government. We cannot expect these people in organizing their government to do more than we invite them to do. If Congress had prescribed the rule of suffrage for Nevada, or Colorado, or any of these Territories, or intimated by any letter or line in the enabling act that they desired the suffrage to be extended to the negroes, and that that was a condition that would be required of them, and they had formed a constitution prohibiting the negroes from that right, then there would be just cause for excluding them.

Now, it is stated that Colorado is decreasing in population. Having been in Colorado last year, and knowing something of their peculiar situation, I will state again, as I have once stated, the reasons for this apparent falling off. In the first place, when the war broke out Colorado became more or less isolated from communication with the rest of the country; her mail facilities were cut off; there were hostile Indians on the plains; and she sent four thousand of her adopted sons to the war. This of course impaired her prosperity, and injured her progress to some extent, probably more so than any other Territory situated upon the western slope. She was dependent upon the East for communication and for supplies. It is a long distance from the Missouri river to the Rocky mountains, a distance of about five hundred miles, through a hostile Indian country; and during the war it was impossible for Colorado to progress as her natural resources and condition will warrant for the future. Then, they had grasshoppers there, which were a great inconvenience. They come into that country, I am told, once in ten, fifteen, or twenty years, and they remain one or two years; and I believe other parts of the country are visited by them also. They cut off the crops last year. They have never been known to exist more than two years at a time before they disappear. Every part of the country is subject to accidents which destroy the crops. The ground sometimes becomes too wet, and they have had that inconvenience in Colorado.

But when Senators speak of its want of agricultural resources, they are very much mistaken. Colorado is a State of vast agricultural resources. I recollect the time very well when California was pronounced to be a country unfit for anything but mining, when it was said that it had no agricultural resources; now it is universally admitted to be equal, if not superior, to any State in the Union in an agricultural point of view alone. Its amount of rich agricultural lands is equal to any State in the Union. When I first went to Nevada it was supposed that there were not three hundred acres of agricultural land there; now there is an active, large population cultivating the lands there, and doing it profitably. I was told that none of the country, or comparatively very little of it, could be cultivated, but every year proves that it is a much better country for agricultural pursuits than was at first supposed. The first thing that a person visiting the western country, and passing through Colorado, will be struck with, is the vast amount of fine agricultural land there. I do not believe it is true, as stated by the surveyor general, that crops cannot be raised in that country without irrigation. Certainly some kinds of crops will need irrigation; but there are a great many crops that can be raised without it, when they understand the seasons better, and understand the country better. It is a State that is going to be not much inferior to many of the western States in agricultural resources.

As to its mineral resources they are certainly remarkable. It bears the marks of a permanent mineral country. The veins are proper fissure veins, well defined, such as have been worked in other countries for thousands of years. It is a remarkably well constructed country, geologically, for mining. The veins have all the regular formations that geologists say indicate permanence. Heretofore they have had some drawbacks in mining. They were cut off from communication with the Atlantic States; they could not get machinery there, and, of course, that impeded the progress of mining, and that is held up as a reason why these people should not be admitted as a State. Last year, when I was there, there were a vast number of new mills being erected, and there was machinery along the road, notwithstanding hostile Indians were scattered all the way from Atchison to Denver. The country really appeared to be pushing forward, notwithstanding the difficulties, notwithstanding supplies had been cut off, with remarkable energy, and with very fine prospects. Now that the war is passed; now that this new machinery is coming in, and one year of crops, I believe Colorado is to be one of the most prosperous Territories in the whole country, and will make a very prosperous State. It will not be a year from now until every one will be willing that Colorado shall come in; but as they have come here now with a constitution every way unexceptionable, as we formerly understood constitutions to be, every way unexceptionable as constitutions were understood to be at the time they formed it, not having any intimation from Congress that it would not be accepted, and having been invited to come here by Congress, and having had the question of population passed upon, it seems to me hard for those people to be sent back, to be turned away on the ground that they have not population enough, when there has been a standing invitation before them to come with what population they have. It is hard for them to be turned away because they have had a failure of crops in consequence of grasshoppers. It is hard for them to be turned away because they were delayed in getting transportation in consequence of Indians, for a short period. All of these embarrassments have now been removed, and they are on the high road to prosperity. It seems to me it is unnecessary, after they have gone to all this trouble of organization and have organized a government and sent men here entirely unexceptionable, to send them back. I do not see any good reason for it. Gentlemen may complain of them now, but I assure you that Colorado one day will be classed among the large States. There will be very many States in ten years from now that will be casting a smaller vote than Colorado, and will be more unequally represented. Yes, sir, in five years from now there will be a large number of States that will have a larger representation, in proportion to population, in this body than Colorado, because she has great resources. She is on the great line of overland travel. The Pacific railroad is going toward your borders and will soon help her. I think her situation is such and the circumstances are such that it would not be good faith now to turn her away.

I did not intend to make any remarks on this subject, but I deemed it due to say thus much, and I hope Colorado will be admitted.

Mr. GUTHRIE. When this matter was under discussion before I made up my mind that Colorado ought not to be admitted as a State; that she had not the population nor the ability to sustain a State government; that she could not demand, from the amount of her population, to be placed on an equal footing with the other States. She has not population enough to entitle her to a Representative in the other House. If she should be admitted, she would be entitled to two Senators here, which would be greatly in disproportion, and overbalancing with another small State the popular majority of the large States in this body. I thought it was not best for Colorado that she should come in and undertake the burdens of a State government at this time. I still think so after listening to all that I have heard. I have no doubt that she has less population now than she had even at the time that the enabling act was passed. There was then a great outcry about gold there, and miners rushed there from all parts of the country because they desired to search new fields. They leave those places as soon as they find they are disappointed and rush to some other point. I have no doubt there is less population there now than there was in the beginning; and I feel very sure that she will not come as California did when she was admitted, and when she had such a great population. I do not believe that the people are able, from the production of the soil and the mines, to retain a population there that can support a State government.

I have no feelings of prejudice against Colorado or any of the northwestern States. They are peopled principally by the frontiers and from the frontiers with some adventurous spirits from the original States. They are a hardy, adventuresome people, but they are not attached to the soil, and they never will be until the country has become old and those born and residing there have learned to like the country.

I am opposed to the admission of Colorado for these reasons, and not for the reasons given by the gentleman from Massachusetts. I should not object to her Constitution because it had the word "white" in it in relation to voters. I do not believe that black people are citizens of the United States even though they are born here. That may come from my western residence and western prejudice and having been raised in a slave State. I am willing to admit that there is something that grows up in the feelings and habits and thinking of people who are raised in slave States and have acquired all their ideas from there, and that there is something strange in the fury gentlemen get into about equal suffrage and equality and all that. I hope the very best will come from the emancipation of the negroes—the best for them and for the whites—but I have not the absolute faith of those who have been missionaries in the cause, and started and originated it, and have brought themselves into conspicuous places in this Government and before the world as the advocates of that policy. I do not enter into any sympathy with them on that point, and I am not moved to act upon this subject by their reasons.

I think we could increase the number of votes in the Senate very legitimately by admitting those southern Senators who have been here for almost four months knocking at our doors and seeking admittance. I do not believe a title of what has been said about the discount of the South. I believe if we had admitted them in the first month of the session they would have been more contented, more harmonious, and more in union with us than they are now; and I believe the longer we delay it the greater will be the difficulty to be overcome. I am not surprised that gentlemen of the North who have been preaching in favor of the freedom of the negroes, and have formed characters and habits upon it, feel rather hostile to us who have been in slave States; but I think they will have to abate somewhat of their opinion, and their estimate of the southern people, before we can get together again. I hope they will take occasion to revise their opinions, and search their own hearts, and their own bosoms, to know how much of it is prejudice, and how much has been partisanship. In fighting this great battle they think they have been fighting for humanity and the freedom of the negro and the great name they are to make in history. If we were to sit down and take an account of the benefits and advantages they have brought upon the negro population, I think the balance would be greatly against them at this time, and they would have to draw upon the future for the great advantages that are to result from their measures. I hope that profits will accrue from them. I think it is better for the African that he should be governed by the people where he lives, who know his habits, and understand all about him. It is better for him, and I think it is better for the whites, that we should settle this matter, settle this question of government, and let them be governed at home. It is not at all surprising that the negroes were misled by this sound of freedom and liberty, and supposed they were to live idly without labor and without work, and somebody was to support them. We know that to a great extent they did obtain those ideas. They are now abandoning them to some extent, and going to work. They are likely, in many places in the South, to prove a useful and industrious population, and add to the productions of the soil. I hope the very best from it. I think slavery being abolished, all sides should act in harmony, subdue their prejudices, if they have any, and come together united as far as we can for the interests of the country.

I think it is far more to the advantage of this country that we should admit the southern States and admit their representatives than that we should take in this new State that is not able to support a State government, in my judgment, and which will find it exceedingly onerous, as many of these States have already found it to be. I shall vote against this reconsideration as I voted against the admission of this State before, but not for the reasons given by the Senator from Massachusetts. The Senator intimates that perhaps some have changed their minds because they want a few more votes in this body. I wish the Senator had changed his mind before he led the onslaught upon the New Jersey Senator when they wanted but one. [Laughter.]

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I was absent when this subject was discussed before, and hence I had no opportunity to cast my vote for this bill. If I had been here, I should of course have voted for the admission of Colorado. The permission to Colorado and the State that I have the honor in part to represent to form States was given at the same time, and the laws by which we were to be admitted are the same except in the change of the names of the Territories. The Senate will bear in mind that at the time this permission was given the Government was casting about to see where it could gain corresponding strength against the weakness incident to the rebellion. It occurred, and I think wisely, to the Congress of the United States that if the process of making new States could be successfully carried out on the more distant portion of the continent it would strengthen us in that direction and make a counterbalancing power to the southern element that was flying off. I think they acted wisely; and I think, as a matter of sound governmental policy, that we should have continuous States across this continent; and I shall not stop to inquire fractionally whether these persons who desire to take upon themselves the burden of a State government are correct or not. I satisfy myself with the answer they have given that they are willing to assume that responsibility. They are the judges, and not the Senator from Kentucky, or the Senator from any other State. They know best their ability, and knowing it, act in their good judgment as seemeth best to them.

I have seldom differed with the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, and whenever I do, I differ with great diffidence, for I know his power, and I expect to feel it if I differ from him; but, sir, feeling a little of that strength at this present moment that the stripling of Israel did when he warred with the giant of Gath, I venture upon the forbidden ground.

It seems to me that he hardly treated this question with his usual fairness in the commencement of his argument to-day. I knew when he commenced that somebody was to be slaughtered, but who or how I did not know till I saw him plant his artillery upon the back of the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. WADE] from the committee on the conduct of the war, and fire at one of the Senators-elect from Colorado. I could hardly then see its relevancy; and why he should take one of the distinguished gentlemen selected from that State to represent it in the Senate, I hardly knew; and yet it soon came out. He was going to attack the veracity of this little pamphlet which I hold in my hand—a candid, truthful statement of the condition of Colorado, giving facts and figures, which, with all the research of the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, he will pardon me for saying he has not shaken in a single portion. He has not carried, with all his artillery, an outpost, or driven in a sentinel set by the distinguished gentlemen who compiled this pamphlet. Against what he called assertion he brings in what he calls fact. The honorable Senator need not have gone out of this pamphlet to find just what he read as an overthrow of the whole thing. There it is, within five lines of where he was reading, and they cite the very authority that the distinguished Senator said was melted down by a single breath of the distinguished surveyor general of Colorado. They quote the surveyor general of Colorado.

But the difficulty lay here: my friend, who was not reared upon agricultural plains or mountain heights, but always breathed the purer air of bricks and mortar in Boston and the larger cities of Europe, had yet to learn that there was a difference between agricultural and pastoral lands. Sir, that difference has existed ever since the old poet sang. That difference has existed always. The difference is this: our agricultural lands produce the cereals, the vegetables, and the grains; the pastoral lands produce grasses upon which herds and flocks feed, on the mountain-side where the plow could not be held.

The distinguished Senator seems hardly willing, when he is driven from that point, to let the population of Colorado alone, and seems to convey the idea that as the report upon the conduct of the war had said something about the testimony of one of the witnesses, therefore the population that he represents must necessarily be bad. In a word, he made out this fact, taking his own assertion to prove it, that the population, the mining interest, the agricultural interest, and every interest in Colorado was dwindling and dwarfed to such an extent that I hardly thought it magnanimous in the giant of this Senate to hit it another blow; and yet, after all, Colorado survives.

I am not going to busy myself or detain the Senate by a detailed account of Colorado. Her history is as patent to all this Senate and the country as the history of Massachusetts. It has been written in much shorter time and in as indelible characters. In 1858 Colorado was an unbroken, untrodden wilderness, if plains can be called a wilderness. In 1858 the discovery of gold was made, and from that time to the present—and I challenge the gentleman to show to the contrary—no Territory within the boundaries of this Government has made more manly, more permanent, and more enduring strides than the Territory of Colorado. Sir, Colorado was in existence before Nevada was born. Her hills and her mountains were populated thickly by the intelligent, energetic, persevering men of the East and of all climes. In 1864, when the very atmosphere was thick with the elements of dissolving empire, Congress gave Colorado and Nevada a chance to set their stars amid the galaxy of the older, not brighter, stars. Colorado fell into this mistake: she nominated her State officers to run at the adoption of her first constitution. That will kill any Territory. We tried it once in the Territory where I live, and the constitution was beaten, as it always will be if you arouse the jealousies of contending political factions. That is the reason why Colorado was not within the letter of this enabling act. We tried the experiment in Nevada before the enabling act came, and we had learned a lesson. I remember well writing a letter to Governor Evans, who was Governor in a neighboring Territory, warning them not to fall into that error, but they did not heed it.

Now, sir, what is the true policy of this Government? These Territories are costly incumbrances. They make, if I may use the expression, as large drafts upon the Treasury of this country as any other system or portion of our Government. I have satisfied myself from a long experience that the territorial governments made here are not sufficient or ample or adequate to meet the emergencies and exigencies of a thriving, growing, prosperous people. They are discontented with it, for the reason that most of the persons that are sent to rule over them are sent from abroad. I have often heard it talked of. The judiciary provided for by the organic acts under the territorial government is entirely inadequate to meet the exigencies and demand of any mining country. I speak of no particular person; but I know this from experience. The people of the Territory of Nevada saw before the enabling act reached them the perfect inefficiency of a territorial government to meet its wants, its interests, its demands, and they met and adopted a constitution much like the one we adopted recently, but it failed for the reason that attached to it were officers running to fill the State offices when it was organized.

Now, Mr. President, what is the real condition of Colorado? Is she as poor as my sympathizing friend from Massachusetts thinks she is? Is she so poor that even the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts cannot do her reverence? She has more tillable land twice over than the State of Massachusetts. She has more acres surveyed than the State of Massachusetts can have surveyed within her borders. She has as many preemption rights already taken up as would twice cover the State in which the Senator now presiding [Mr. ANTHONY] resides. She paid more taxes to the internal revenue last year than Oregon, a western State, and more than Nevada in some items. The total amount of internal revenue, except from stamps, in Colorado last year, this poor and miserable place, was $130,052 01; in Nebraska, $50,054 50; in New Mexico, $49,042 28; and in Utah, $41,525 93.

Colorado paid more on the one eighth of one per cent. on brokers' sales than Nevada, Oregon, Kansas, Minnesota, West Virginia, Delaware, Connecticut, Vermont, or Maine.

It does not seem to me from these amounts that Colorado is dwindling very rapidly. They show most conclusively—and this pamphlet goes on to give the figures in detail—that Colorado is in a vigorous state of growth. It is a fact known to every man who reads that within the last six or eight months there have been developments in the mode of working the ores of Colorado that are inviting the attention of the civilized and scientific world. Their productions from the same ore that they have been turning out these millions upon have more than quadrupled; and to-day, and I speak advisedly when I say it, there is more attention being paid to the mineral wealth of Colorado than that of any other State or Territory of this nation. Why? She is nearer the borders of the surplus capital of the East. Capital has to fill up as it goes. It does not jump over States and Territories to find a distant shore, but it marches straight along with its interests and with its requirements; and Colorado, before twelve months roll round, will have a population more than double what it has now. I know how these mining countries fill up; I know how the population surges back and forward like the restless waves of the sea; but, sir, it comes back again to its place. After it has tried Montana, Idaho, Nevada, California, and gone as far as mining enterprise can see a mountain, it comes back again; and I know that last year population was returning to Colorado as well as going westward from it. In my own State I have met men from Colorado who had come to see with their own eyes and determine for themselves whether it was better to move. I saw men who thought it was not and returned.

But, sir, after all, I expect that the trouble with my distinguished friend from Massachusetts is in regard to this word "white." He seems to abhor that word; it has a sort of terror for him. It has none for me; nor "black" either. I have here the amendment which my friend intended to propose to this bill, striking out the word "white," in the constitution of Colorado, and requiring the Legislature to give effect to it. I apprehend that at the time he offered that amendment he saw none of the visions of this pauper population passing before him; he saw no reason to overthrow the reputation of Governor Evans. There was no necessity then for the erroneous statistics which have been furnished by somebody. The word "white" it is that has so fearfully disturbed his equanimity. I have been as ardent an advocate in the interests of the black, if not as potent in his advocacy, as has been my friend from Massachusetts. I have panted for the day that we have arrived at now as the hart pants for the mountain stream, and I have lived to see it. But, sir, I am not going to vote against the admission of this State because that word is in her constitution; and why? I hear the tread of coming millions. I see that by the logic of events, whether this word is in or not, the day is not far distant when we shall see realized what this paper word "white" means. Sir, quicker than we can discuss this question will the phantom "white" disappear from Colorado. The sun will not make his annual course before you will see white men and black men voting in Colorado. It is the next step in the progress of this great reform, and men who lie across its pathway will be crushed before the moving power of a determined people.

Therefore, sir, I am not as particular as I should have been some years ago. I labored to get that word "white" struck out of the constitution of the State of Nevada. I was not a member of the convention. It was retained; but I venture the assertion that before twelve months roll around, colored men will vote in Nevada. Not half the stride will that be in the progress of Nevada that has been witnessed, for when I first went there it was at the peril of a man's healthy existence to talk about a negro or to claim to be an abolitionist; but, sir, they have received line upon line, and precept upon precept, not from me, but from others, until Nevada to-day is as radical a State as the State of Massachusetts. I would appeal to her population with as much assurance of being sustained in any step that moves to the culmination of this great reform as I would to Massachusetts itself. They are a young, vigorous, thriving, daring, noble people, and they dare do what is right, and they will. Before the tread of this march all bars of prejudice are breaking down, and my friend from Wisconsin, [Mr. DOOLITTLE,] when he was laboring to keep the blacks from voting in Wisconsin last fall, did not know that there was an existing statute on the book that allowed them to vote.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If my honorable friend will allow me, I wish right there to state a fact that has escaped his attention. With his permission, I may as well state it here as at any other point. Twenty years ago I advocated colored suffrage and voted for it. In the State of Wisconsin, ever since I have resided in the State, I was willing that colored men should vote in it. This very fall that he speaks of, I advocated before our people to allow colored men in Wisconsin to vote, and I voted for it at the polls.

Mr. NYE. That is good.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. But let me say to the honorable Senator from Nevada, there was another thing that I advocated, and it was this: that each State had a right for itself to determine the question, and that the Federal Government had no right or constitutional power to impose on a State negro suffrage; that the right of a State to determine that question for itself was one of the reserved rights of every State, under the Constitution. I give the honorable gentleman notice now that if he, or the men who act with him here, shall undertake to impose negro suffrage upon a State of this Union, coming from the Federal Government as an exercise of authority here, he and any party or set of men who advocate it will be crushed under the force of public opinion and swept out of power and out of existence. I say to the honorable Senator that the rights of States are of as much consequence as the rights of individuals. It is not the first time that on this subject I have been misrepresented here and elsewhere.

Mr. STEWART. Let me inquire of the Senator whether he wishes to be understood that an attempt to amend the Constitution so as to effect that end would crush the party.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I say that any party that advocates—

Mr. NYE. Mr. President—

Mr. DOOLITTLE. To reply to both the Senators from Nevada at once on the subject is more than I bargained for. I rose to correct my friend from Nevada, on my right, [Mr. NYE.]

Mr. GRIMES. Answer that question.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will answer it if the Senator from Nevada on my right is willing to give way. I am perfectly frank to say that any party, political or otherwise, which shall go before the people of the United States upon the idea that the Federal Government or the Federal Constitution is to impose upon the States negro suffrage against the will of the States, will go to the wall.

Mr. STEWART. That is not the question I asked.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The question the gentleman asked was, whether the States will accept a proposition to amend the Constitution giving negro suffrage. I answer no, sir, they will not. Join the issue as soon as you please here or elsewhere, and out of New England there are not three States in this Union, neither Nevada nor Colorado, nor any of the new States or the old States that will vote for an amendment of the Constitution of the United States by which negro suffrage shall be imposed upon the States.

Mr. COWAN. Nor amend their own.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. In reference to that, I will not say. There are other States that will amend their own constitutions on the subject. I simply rose to set my friend from Nevada [Mr. NYE] right on that question. While I, as an individual, have advocated the right of each State to determine this question for itself, and in the State of Wisconsin have advocated giving to the colored men there the right of suffrage, because the negroes who are residing there, generally speaking, as a class were able to exercise that right, and exercise it properly, I still insisted that it did not belong to the Federal Government to impose it on other States as a condition to their being in this Union.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I have said nothing upon that question. It seems to be the nightmare that haunts my friend from Wisconsin; and I receive his assertion with every degree of allowance that is necessary for a person that does not seem to express the wishes of his own State as expressed by the Legislature, and therefore I doubt his authority to speak for the public on that question. It is Banquo's ghost with him.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Allow me a word on that point.

Mr. NYE. You have drawn me off, and I should like to proceed with my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nevada is entitled to the floor.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The gentleman speaks of my misrepresenting the State of Wisconsin.

Mr. NYE. No. You read the resolutions the other day that requested you to vote one way, and yet you voted the other way.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senators must address the Chair.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will not interrupt the Senator if he does not desire an interruption; but on that point I desire to state to him that the convention of Wisconsin last fall unanimously declared in favor of the doctrines to which I have adverted on this occasion.

Mr. NYE. Sir, the world has moved mightily since last fall, though the gentleman may stand still. We have been moving, and so has his State. But I was not saying anything about Congress imposing negro suffrage on the States. I was simply saying that the logic of events, which is stronger and more powerful than the laws of Congress, is sweeping on to that goal by its own resistless power. If they had not found a legislative enactment in Wisconsin that allowed black men to vote, I should think, the gentleman being a fair exponent of that State, that they would have negro suffrage in Kentucky before they had it in Wisconsin.

But, sir, to return to Colorado, she lies right in the pathway, and is the first stopping-place from the Missouri river westward to the Pacific. Her plains are extensive, beyond the conception of the dwellers in northern cities; her mountains are so high that they literally reach the clouds. In her productive valleys and on her mountain sides is heard the reverberation of the pick, the shovel, the mill, and labor in all its phases as it pertains to mining. The surplus capital of New York and the eastern States finds a field for its use, and its operations are expanding and increasing beyond all precedent.

The distinguished Senator from Massachusetts talks about her productiveness being only two and a half millions last year. Sir, before we got counting money by thousands of millions, it would have made Boston's ears stand erect to hear of a discovery in the West that was producing two and a half millions of gold in a year, and everybody that was out of their library and out of business would have gone to Colorado to see the rich mountains out of which it was dug; many of Boston's citizens are there now; and they behold with wonder the rich products that they gaze upon. The dazzling brilliancy bewilders the minds of those who are unaccustomed to such scenes and they fail to comprehend its vastness; and hence we cannot be surprised, however much we may regret, that financial statements are presented that create such misconceptions in others. Why, sir, the young State from which I come produces $20,000,000 of silver a year. Colorado spared four thousand of her sons to serve the country in the tented field, and the Senator berates her for her diminished productiveness.

The sound of the hammer was not heard upon the anvil, the plow stood still in the furrow, men left their civil avocations, they quit digging for the rich treasures of gold to lie to the field where richer treasures were to be preserved than gold could purchase; and my friend from Massachusetts really discovers that Colorado is dwindling! No, Mr. President, Colorado never showed as many evidences why she should be admitted as a State as is presented by the very fact that regiment after regiment was sent from her territory to guard and protect the travel across the plains from the savage and to contend upon the field of strife with the rebels themselves. Sir, I am loath to turn my back upon any population that has shown such devotion to the Federal Government as Colorado has done. I assert that she comes here to-day clothed in the attractive habiliments of loyalty, the proudest vestment with which man was ever clothed; out of her misfortunes and from the smoke and din of arms she comes here and presents herself with the spotless robes of undying loyalty. See it exemplified: here come two men clothed with the garments that you so much admire. Why do you not let them in? The answer is that my distinguished friend has heard it whispered—I never listen to whispers—that we want two more votes. Sir, I want twenty and two more, but I want them loyal, and I care not how many votes we have if they are of the right kind; and I do not intend that we shall have any other here, by my vote; do you?

Mr. SUMNER. No.

Mr. NYE. Very well; then you are safe and so am I.

My friend says she grows poorer and poorer; the vote of last year is less than ever before, and he says that that is at war with all the philosophy of the settlement of these Territories. That my distinguished friend thinks so, I have no doubt; but that the fact is exactly opposite I know. I have seen the time when the State of Nevada had ten thousand more population than it has got now. You see the same thing in every mining country. They roam and prospect and develop until there are no more mountains to find, and then they come back. That is the history in a word of mining populations. Let the hue and cry go up that there is a richer placer somewhere else, and down go the pick and spade, away they go, and they go to remain until they ascertain that they cannot fill their stomachs on east winds, and back they come to their first love, and there they stay.

My friend was so unkind in his strictures upon poor Colorado as to afflict them with grasshoppers. [Laughter.] If my friend is spending his time in reading the surveyor general's reports to keep up with the progress of grasshoppers, he is attending to small business. [Laughter.] I supposed he was engaged in higher, nobler purposes than looking after the march of grasshoppers. [Laughter.] Why, sir, I have seen grasshoppers in Massachusetts as thick as locusts in Egypt. Grasshoppers go wherever grass grows; and my friend, when he establishes the fact that there is a good crop of grasshoppers there, establishes the fact that there are pastoral lands there; for they never go but where there is something to eat.

But everything conspires to give Colorado a forbidding aspect in my friend's vision. With all the noble qualities that I so much admire in my distinguished friend, there is one thing he will pardon me for saying that he has yet to learn—that is a bold assertion for me—he has got to learn to take defeat gracefully; or in other words, he must learn that to procure success he is only entitled to use such means and such arguments as are legitimate to the subject and to the question to which they are applied.

Mr. President, if you take one step west of Colorado, what do you find there? You find there one of the strongest arguments and reasons why there should be the strong government of a State in Colorado. You find Utah, with all of her calamity, and with all of the dangers incident to it, nestled right in there with a large population. Step beyond Utah and you find the State of Nevada. To say much of her would not become me; but I assert this of her: Nevada is a State that has furnished as many troops in proportion to her population as any State in this Union; she has done much substantial work; her people are a law-abiding people, and they love the Union. Beyond Nevada we come to that mighty barrier, the Sierra Nevada; leap over that, and you come to the flourishing State of my distinguished friend from California. [Mr. CONNESS,] all glittering with gold; and yet, sir, California is no richer than Colorado, in my judgment; no richer than Utah, no richer than Nevada, Montana, or Idaho.

What next do we see? We see the mighty power this nation puts forth, to do what? To link these two great oceans together with hooks of iron and steel, and already is seen and heard from either ocean the steam whistle on the Atlantic starting for the West, and in July they will be challenged above the clouds of the Sierra Nevada mountains bidding and beckoning them onward to the western coast. Right in this pathway lies Colorado, the first great stopping-place. Colorado, in two years from this time, will have a population that will pay more into the Treasury of this Government than many States whose locks are whitened with years. I know the abounding elasticity of these youthful States. I know with what vigor and strength they increase and go forward, and you cannot keep them from populating rapidly. Strike the music of the chord that echoes to "go," and population will flow into them, even from Massachusetts.

Show me where these rich treasures are found, and where, after all, we have got to look for the very material to light from off the shoulders of this nation its now crushing burden, and I will show you a population in point of intelligence, vigor, and numbers that will be satisfactory entirely to my distinguished friend from Massachusetts, and it will drive out the phantom that seems to haunt him, and it will give certain demonstration by its productions of its ability to be a State. "Poor Colorado" will settle with my friend one of these days; it will show him that he little knows, and has paid but little attention in his researches, to the treasures of her mighty mountains. Sir, there is a people there who have gone deep down under the mountains, and by their science and their skill, and above all, by their indomitable will and perseverance, have demonstrated to the world that there in Colorado lies wealth untold.

Sir, my friend has one habit that I thought I should never fall into, but I have got to do so now; and that is reading letters. [Laughter.] I have got nobody to telegraph me for the occasion, [laughter,] but I have a letter here by accident. [Laughter.] It is a letter written by the mayor of Denver City, and directed to me; he is now in New York. I will read it:

NEW YORK CITY, March 22, 1866.

DEAR SIR: I have just finished reading the report of the discussion in the Senate on the admission of Colorado, and must say that I was very much surprised at some of the statements made. As a citizen of Colorado, I can but regret that such statements place our young Territory and people in a very false position before the people of the United States as regards our population, mineral wealth, and agricultural resources. I have been a resident of Colorado for the past six years, and from the positions I have occupied, think that I am well posted in regard to all of these matters.

Our population I honestly believe to-day is of permanent inhabitants thirty-five thousand, if not more. I do not think, in so large a Territory, that the vote at any election is a fair index of population. Our people are scattered over the mountains and valleys, and in a number of localities no elections are held. I know it was the case at the last (State) election. Men who are receiving five dollars per day will not leave their work and travel eight or ten miles to cast a vote.

Our young Territory sent three regiments to the war and at the close of the rebellion they were mustered out in the States, but most of them after a short visit to their friends are now on the way back to their homes and property in Colorado. There were also hundreds of men who went from Colorado to their homes in the States and enlisted, who are now making their preparations to return to Colorado this spring. All of these men claim to belong in Colorado, as they hold property and pay taxes in that Territory to-day.

So much for our population, which I claim is on the increase daily instead of decrease. As regards our mineral wealth, I would say that I do not think there need be any question in regard to that. I will give a few facts which have come under my personal knowledge. I was connected with the private mint of Messrs. Clark, Gruber & Co., in the years 1861, 1862, and 1863, and during that time they struck off of their own coin $750,000, and during the same period bought gold dust and shipped east over $3,000,000 of gold bars, run from dust bought in Colorado. This is the business of one house. There were at the same time four other houses engaged in the same business, namely, banking. From the owners of five hundred feet on the Gregory mine there was bought in that time $1,000,000 of gold. Distinguished professors state in published works that Colorado has the largest extent of rich quartz veins of any mining country on the globe. I will say here that our ores are what is termed refractory, and it requires a vast amount of machinery and skilled labor to work them. There have been formed in the eastern cities over seventy-five mining companies, involving a working capital of over ten million dollars. When these companies get in full and successful operation, I think Colorado will demonstrate to the world that she is a rich gold and silver producing country. Besides gold and silver, we have rich veins of iron, copper, lead, coal, salt springs, and oil producing territory.

As regards business, I will state that the merchants in the city of Denver sold $12,000,000 worth of merchandise in the year 1865. The aggregate amount of business done by banks in the Territory is $15,000,000 per annum.

As regards our agricultural resources, I will simply say that the amount of land under cultivation is set forth in the report of the surveyor general. Our soil is rich and productive, and the yield per acre satisfies the most sanguine of farmers. Irrigation is required except on the straits.

From the county of Boulder, one of the smallest counties in the Territory, there were raised and sold in the city of Denver twenty-five thousand bushels of grain. This was exclusive of what they retained for seed and home consumption. One farmer in the county of Arapahoe sold his crop in Denver for the snug sum of $60,000. The counties of Jefferson, Weld, El Paso, Huertano, Conejos, Costilla, Pueblo, and Fremont are agricultural counties.

This is a simple statement of facts, and I send it to you for the purpose of placing Colorado right before the honorable body of which you are a member.

I am, sir, very respectfully,

GEORGE T. CLARK,

Mayor of Denver, and Cashier of the First National Bank.

Hon. JAMES W. NYE,

Senator from Nevada, Washington, D. C.

Now, Mr. President, I present the authority of Mr. Clark, the mayor of Denver, and the cashier of the first national bank there, against the supposed authority of my friend from Massachusetts.

Sir, I claim that it is the sound and wise policy of this nation to have the strong power of State governments across this continent. There is something in State ties. I never believed in this late quasi dissolution of States; but there is nothing that binds us so closely together in mutual interest as State ties. I believe that as a principle it is true; and the time so much longed for by the distinguished Senator from Kentucky who last addressed you will soon come when reason takes the place of frenzy in the rebellious States, when their judgments shall surmount their prejudices, when they shall have ceased to do evil and learned to do well, when it will be an acknowledged fact that State ties are stronger and more powerful than national pressure from outside. I want to see a row of States across this continent that will vibrate with one thrill from the quiet waters of the Pacific to the restless waters of the Atlantic. I want a State bond of sympathy from ocean to ocean that will hold the East and the West in bonds which the world cannot sever. I want the people inhabiting this vast expanse to be protected by State governments because they will make that which is now a wilderness "bloom and blossom as the rose." They will bring to the earth's surface a wealth that will astonish the world.

Give these people the fostering care of State governments, and they will convince foreign creditors that whatever obligations may rest upon the shoulders of the Government, they are always on a specie basis. Sir, higher than that, they stand on bullion. Give them State governments that will protect the miners in their distant mountain homes, let them feel that they are not in danger from the wrath of the wild savage nor from the neglect of their Government, and the population will be so thick as to drive away the last phantom that haunts my friend's mind—the grasshoppers—from Colorado. Sir, give Colorado a State government, let her have a voice in the national councils with which she will be in unison of sentiment, and her growth will be more magical than anything produced by the lamp of Aladdin. My friend has always turned, I suppose, eastward for light. Go West; go out there, and what will he see? The tales upon which he has feasted, that he has read as fables, are excelled by the realities. You find in Colorado a people that beat the mountains fine. You find in these new border Territories and States a population that level the mountains and fill up the valleys. They stop at nothing. Give them protection, and I repeat that the growth of Colorado will astonish the world. I have seen the difference between a State and Territory; and although the mantle of a State government has rested a little more than twelve months upon my State, there is a feeling of security and advancement that never could have existed under a territorial government.

My friend is alarmed for the dignity and honor of the older States. Well, they will take care of themselves. I have heard much said against New England, and I love her so well that I am not going to repeat it; but she only occupies a small portion of this continent and she has had twelve most estimable (and it is happy for the country she has had them) Senators here that have stood like a breakwater between the lashings and fury of rebellion and the stability of the Government. Sir, would you have hesitated during the rebellion to have two from Colorado? Would you have quibbled upon the little point of the honor of the older States? Sir, a great State never is so noble and never appears so grand as when it reaches out its hand to a young, tender State and says, "I will uphold and sustain you; I bid you God speed on this journey."

Massachusetts was once young. True, that was a great many years ago; but she was young; she is old now, and should not forget that time. My friend and I have both been younger than we are; but there is nothing I recur to in my past life with half the pleasure I do when I recollect an instance when I have stretched out my hand to a young man to aid him over the thorny pathway of professional life. Sir, the States were not born at once; but the Constitution clothes them with the garments of age; from the moment they are born they are the equals of the older States. It is well it is so. Why should they not be the equals of the old States? They are bone of our bone and flesh of our flesh, offspring, shoots ingrafted upon the main stock of the parental Government. Sir, I do not think New York would be scared, frightened out of her propriety, if Colorado should have a couple of votes here. New York stands upon her own base as firm as the everlasting hills, and so will Colorado. Sir, I care not how many votes there are here; I anticipate the time, and that not far distant, when State line after State line will join, and there will not be an inch of the mountains and plains from the now dreary glaciers of Montana or Nevada to the easternmost boundary of the States beyond the Mississippi that will not boast of a State government standing as an equal with New York and Massachusetts upon this floor, and neither of them will be degraded by the association.

Sir, this business of making States is a large business; it has frightened the men down South. While they were engaged in hurling States out, some of us were engaged in bringing States in. This Government in its form and plan will never be perfect till there is not a territorial dependency in it, till State line touches State line over our broad and expansive continent. And furthermore, if I may be pardoned, I see symptoms of States from another quarter. When this Fenian speck shall have blown away, the Canadians like wise men may seek shelter under the protecting agis of the tree of liberty that was planted here by our fathers. Sir, the St. Lawrence is not wide enough to divide the continent between monarchical and republican institutions. New Brunswick and the other British Provinces are certain to come in and to tend toward an eastern preponderance by and by, as time rolls itself around.

I hope, Mr. President, that this vote will be reconsidered. Colorado deserves better than to be rejected now. My friend says the enabling act is dead. Well, suppose it is dead, does Colorado die with it? Because a statute has lapsed, are you to kill everybody that went where the statute existed? I pay but little attention in the discussion of this question to the mere fact of the existence of that enabling act. States have been brought into this family of States without any enabling act and with less population than Colorado has got. The State of Arkansas, when it was admitted, had but eleven thousand white population in it; and why do we stand here now, at this late day, debating such a point, when it is not the number of inhabitants that make a State, but the quality and character of the inhabitants? Why do we stand here quibbling about numbers, when our fathers did not stop to cavil? Sir, it is time to drop this iron standard of having so many or no State. When a body of men come here with the power to uphold and maintain a State government clothed with the garments of loyalty, let them come in. In that way you put, if I may use the expression, braces into this great temple of freedom. You bring these elements of strength from State organizations, and my friend from Kentucky will pardon me when I say that the citizens of Colorado know their resources, know the expenses of a State government, know its burdens, and knowing them are willing to take them upon themselves; and who shall be the judge for them but themselves?

Mr. President, I have detained the Senate longer than I intended. I hope this vote will be reconsidered. Upon every principle of right, the enabling act was at least an invitation for them to come. My friend from Massachusetts says it would have been all well if they had come a year sooner. Does he not remember the parable? The laborer who came at the eleventh hour got the penny, too. I know the embarrassment of the question of time. Our election was fixed on the same day with the Colorado election under the enabling act; and nothing but using the telegraph and unusual exertion enabled us to distribute intelligence to our distant mining posts; and some of them did not know it. What then? The convention met. We supposed that we must be admitted before the election in the fall, or our work would be void; and I telegraphed myself sixteen thousand eight hundred words, the constitution of the State of Nevada: and Nevada was born by telegraph. [Laughter.] I received across the trembling wires, from the pen of the immortal Lincoln, that Nevada was born; and a shout went up that made the mountain-tops and valleys ring. Do you not suppose he knew what he was about? Clearly. Why did he not kick us out because the word "white" was in our constitution? It will not do. If Colorado had had as many telegraphs as we happened to have, and had used them as much, she would have been born in time. But, sir, this question of time, I take it, is a matter of small consideration. Here was an invitation to this feast of States; and she has come up to the feast as soon as time would allow. She has come up as soon as she could attire herself in State garments for the feast. My friend meets her by talking of "grasshoppers." [Laughter.] When she asks for bread, the bread of national life, he gives her a stone. Sir, that will not do. I insist upon it, that my friend from Massachusetts must be beaten now; and I trust that the lesson will teach him to take it gracefully, and I assure him in the utmost kindness that this word "white" will not hurt anybody.

Mr. President, I trust that this vote will be reconsidered and reconsidered now, and that Colorado which so justly deserves to stand within the circle of States will not be kept out any longer.

Mr. McDougall. Mr. President, "I am not an orator as Brutus is." In the matter of rhetoric, of euphony, and elocution, the gentleman who last addressed the Senate is my master infinitely. Of all these things I say nothing; but of myself I must say something because I did on a previous occasion vote for the pending measure. I did it spontaneously, without careful consideration. After careful consideration, I think it is not just or right, not consistent with our system. The reason on which I before acted spontaneously was that I desired to build up a western interest, which is the interest that my country belongs to. After careful consideration, I do not think that the Territory of Colorado is so populated and has such a number of permanent inhabitants as to justify her representation by two Senators in this Senate Hall. Its population does not come within the rule that has been regarded as the true rule by all careful, considerate statesmen for many years. The spontaneous vote I before gave I am bound to change, for I think that then I was wrong, and now I will try to be right. I shall therefore vote against the reconsideration.

Mr. HENDERSON. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, April 24, 1866.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by Rev. HENRY W. BELLOWES.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

JACOB P. LEESE.

Mr. BIDWELL asked unanimous consent to offer the following joint resolution:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay to Jacob P. Leese, out of the appropriation made "for the payment of judgments to be rendered by the Court of Claims," under the act approved June 25, 1864, the amount of his claim, as fixed by a decision of the Court of Claims, rendered December 24, 1860.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I object.

TELEGRAPH TO THE WEST INDIES.

Mr. ELIOT. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on Commerce Senate bill No. 26, concerning telegraphic communication between the United States and the island of Cuba, and other West India islands, and the Bahamas. Amendments have been made to obviate all the objections which were raised when the bill was before the House.

Mr. SPALDING. I object, and call for the regular order.

NIAGARA FALLS SHIP-CANAL.

The House accordingly proceeded to the consideration of the special order of business, being the call of committees for reports, the pending question being the bill reported by the Committee on Roads and Canals, providing for a ship-canal around the falls of Niagara, upon which Mr. VAN HORN, of New York, was entitled to the floor.

Mr. RULBURD. By an agreement between the gentleman who reported this bill [Mr. VAN HORN, of New York,] and myself, I will occupy the remainder of his time.

I desire to call the attention of the House to the importance of a ship-canal around the falls of Niagara on the American side, not only as a military measure, but as a commercial necessity.

In the latter view, it is needed and demanded by some fifteen States of this Union. There are directly interested in its construction some ten million people.

I propose to occupy the brief time allotted me in first asking the consideration of the military aspect of the question.

It is well known that by the treaty between this country and Great Britain neither nation is allowed to have more than one armed vessel on Lake Ontario and two on the upper lakes. But by means of its natural rivers and the construction of different canals Canada or the British Government can at any time build and accumulate gunboats or other war vessels and precipitate them upon the lakes; and all this preparation it can make in its own waters and of course without infringing the international treaty. It was stated a year ago, whether correctly or not I cannot say, that Great Britain then had a hundred gunboats ready, if need be, to throw them upon Lake Ontario. It must not be forgotten that Lake Ontario is the key position of the lakes if we are at war with Great Britain, or, what is the same thing, with Canada.

We had upon that lake a single vessel only to meet that force; and we by the terms of the treaty could have no more, and we had no rivers or large canals upon which we could build and store more, and have them in readiness. Now, one object of the construction of the Niagara ship-canal is to enable the United States in case of war, if need be, to make use of our large upper lake fleet of vessels, which could be speedily fitted for such use. On Ontario our merchant marine is outnumbered. On the upper lakes we greatly outnumber the Canadian or British marine.

It may be said that there is no speck of war on the northern frontier at the present time; that therefore this is but a contingent danger to be provided against; that we can guard against that, if need be, by volunteers or militia that may be called into service. I answer that the experience of the war out of which we have come, shows that even with a half million or million armed men we could not, or did not, guard effectually the Baltimore and Ohio railroad or the Baltimore and Cumberland canal, so as to prevent forays or raids. Such an experience shows that the great and long canal of the State of New York, so necessary and so important to the West and East, is liable to be pierced and broken at any time by a hostile invasion.

There is another feature in this case. Between Chicago and Ogdensburg, there are some fourteen hundred miles of natural navigation, with the single interruption of the falls of Niagara. Canada on its side has constructed the Welland canal, forty-two miles in length, with a second opening on the lake, shortening it to thirty-two miles, with twenty-eight locks of the dimensions of one hundred and eighty by twenty-six and a half feet. This bill proposes to construct a canal around the falls of Niagara, making the distance but eight miles, with much larger capacity in prism and in size of locks. Thus, in case of difficulty with Canada, instead of having one hundred and fifty miles to guard to prevent interruption of commerce between the East and West, we should have only eight miles to protect.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it may be said that this is now a minor consideration. I admit that it has not the importance which it once had. But when it is considered by this House that on those inland lakes there floats a commercial interest twice greater than the entire foreign commerce of the United States, it is manifest at once that there is on these lakes an interest that should be cared for. While we are making appropriations year by year to build and fit up and strengthen fortifications to protect our Atlantic coast, is there not a reason why, in a military point of view, we should have respect to the great interests of the North and of the West to be seriously affected and impaired in case of war by a direct interruption of commercial communication?

An order in council now shuts at any time the Welland canal against American bottoms, and since the termination of the reciprocity treaty this may be done without a moment's previous notice, as there are no treaty stipulations to prevent it. Besides, the Canadian authorities discriminate already against American commerce by refunding to Canadian vessels ninety per cent. of the duties, and exacting one hundred per cent. of the duties paid by American vessels, unless these American vessels discharge their cargoes at Montreal or some other Canadian port, or go out to sea by the way of the Gulf of St. Lawrence. These are reasons, in a military point of view, which to my mind have a direct bearing on the propriety of the construction of this canal by the Federal Government.

In a commercial point of view it is stated, and with truth, that the commerce of the lakes has vastly, rapidly increased. In 1840 the first vessel left Chicago with three thousand bushels of wheat for the East. Five years afterward the shipping trade of the lakes with the East was so large that Congress was called upon and passed a special act extending the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the Federal district courts to the lakes and navigable waters connecting the same.

Six years later, in 1851, the constitutionality of that act was raised, and after solemn argument was settled in the Supreme Court against the technical objection that as there was no ebb and flow of tide those inland lakes could not be covered by the acts of admiralty.

In delivering the opinion of the court, the Chief Justice took the broad ground that, tide or no tide, these lakes were, in truth, great inland seas, bordered by different States on one side and having on the other a long foreign frontier line of three thousand miles; that on them already existed a great and growing commerce between numerous States and a foreign nation; that on these lakes hostile fleets had encountered each other; and admiralty jurisdiction had already necessarily been, indirectly at least, extended and recognized.

To such importance and magnitude had commercial interests and rights thus early grown (1851) that he held, substantially, it would be contrary to the first principles on which the Union was formed to confine admiralty rights and privileges to States bordering on the Atlantic, and to tide-water navigation therewith connected, and to deny such rights to the citizens who border on the lakes. Certainly the Chief Justice intimated such was not the intention of the framers of the Constitution, one object of which, with them, was a perfect equality in the rights and the privileges of the citizens of the different States, not only in the laws of the General Government, but in the mode of administering them. That equality does not exist if the commerce on the lakes is denied the benefits and the protection which the Constitution secures to the States bordering on the Atlantic. Of course I refer to Chief Justice Taney's opinion in the well-known case in Howard's Reports, known as the Genesee Chief case.

Now, sir, if it is found that the present avenues of commerce and trade are inadequate, and it has been found by observation and by instrumental examination that only within the State of New York is there that natural dip or depression of land lying north of the mountain ranges and south of the frontier line, then we must look at existing outlets or easements of trade and commerce in operation or projected within the boundaries of that State.

Now, within that State is the New York and Erie railroad, which does what it can; the New York Central railroad, which also does what it can; and there is the New York and Erie canal, three hundred and fifty miles in length; adding ten per cent. for the six hundred and fourteen feet rise and fall of elevation, makes a working length of four hundred and fourteen miles; a canal of narrow prism, of numerous locks, and which is simply able to receive and carry boats of two hundred and twenty-four tons burden. It has been stated by the official authorities of that State that for three years the capacity of that canal has been tested to its utmost to provide transportation for the products of the States of the great West connected with or bordering the upper lakes.

When the State of Illinois has but one eighth of her land under cultivation; when the other States of the West have but one tenth of their land under cultivation, with present facilities—and there is no immediate prospect of their increase—what is to become of the products of these States ten or twenty years hence, when they shall have, perhaps, the half of their tillable acres under cultivation? Where will they find an outlet? Shall we be told that they can go down the Mississippi? That may answer for certain portions of the cereals of the West, wheat, &c., but it is very well known that there is a serious objection to that route by reason of the heat of the climate for the transportation of corn to and its export from the port of New Orleans. If I recollect aright, never in any single year has the export of corn from the port of New Orleans exceeded two hundred and fifty thousand bushels, while the Erie and Oswego canals of the State of New York alone have transported a million and a million and a half bushels a year.

But even if the Mississippi river was deep enough, and its channel rendered navigable for boats all the year round, still there would be an objection to it on account of the climate, because the corn would heat and become damaged, and of course depreciate in value.

The products of the West must, therefore, find an outlet by northern and eastern routes, or it must be burned for fuel or distilled into spirits or fed to stock or rot upon the ground, as it has sometimes done of late.

Now, by the construction of the Niagara ship-canal, eight miles in extent, the expense of transportation is greatly lessened; and there will be several outlets from Lake Ontario to the sea-board and the great depot of this continent, namely, New York city. Therefore, there will be no danger of accumulation there.

But, as my time is limited, I will pass to another point. The State of New York, standing midway between the West and the East in that respect, by or through her canal officers, strangely assumes the position that this canal will injure the revenues of the Erie canal, and therefore it should not be constructed. But in another breath they admit and insist that the canal interests of the State of New York have been quite remunerative and productive, costing in round numbers, interest, loans, damages, enlargement, "pauper laterals," &c., all told, $100,000,000; and that between eighty-three and eighty-four of these millions have been returned to the treasury of that State, leaving only some fifteen or sixteen millions of disbursement expense and unreturned. The Erie canal proper has paid for itself and $9,000,000 more. What right, then, has the State of New York to claim that that canal, with its narrow prism and its yet more restricted locks, should require, as it does, that the commerce of the West, however great, shall be forced through it to market, whether they desire it or not; at all events, such portions of it as cannot go down the Mississippi, and such portions of it as are too bulky and weighty to be transported upon the railroads? The very statement shows that no wrong is done to the treasury of that State if the national Government makes this a national work.

Mr. DAWES. I am very desirous of voting for this bill, but I am not able to find just the precise condition of the bill before the House. I desire to ask my friend how efficient its provisions are to give the United States control over this canal so as to make it a national work. I am led to make this inquiry because the general drift of this bill is to make a donation to such corporation as may be formed by any State to carry on this work, and I observe that the State of New York has incorporated a company for this purpose, the act of incorporation containing this provision:

"The said corporation may accept upon any terms and conditions not inconsistent with this charter or the laws of this State, from the Government of the United States, or of any State, any grants of land, bonds, moneys, or credit which may be made to it, for the purpose of constructing the canal and works connected therewith, and may hold and dispose of such lands for that purpose. When completed, the State of New York shall have the right to purchase the said canal and the works connected therewith, by paying to the said corporation the cost of constructing the same, with interest computed to date of the purchase, with the further addition of ten per cent. thereon."

I desire to know whether in this bill you have sufficiently guarded against any such contingency as is provided for in that section of the law of New York, and that by no possibility this shall be anything but a national work.

Mr. HULBURD. If one of my colleagues had been here he would have offered an amendment that would remove that difficulty, taking it away from any State and giving its construction and its control exclusively to the General Government.

I wish to answer one other objection, and that is, that if this commerce finds its way in large vessels into Lake Ontario, it will go away from New York on down and out to sea through the Gulf of St. Lawrence.

Sir, those who are acquainted with the obstacles in that pathway to the ocean—obstacles that no time or expenditure of money or inducements of drawbacks can, in my judgment, ever surmount—would laugh to scorn the utter absurdity of a serious apprehension from that quarter. Canada has expended millions in constructing the seven canals around the rapids in the St. Lawrence river between Ogdensburg and Montreal. In thus canalling and locking thirty-two and a half miles only one hundred and sixty of the two hundred and thirty-six feet of the elevation of Lake Ontario above Montreal has been overcome, leaving a tidal and channel current of seventy feet fall to be surmounted by the steam and sail of inland or upward-going vessels. She has expended millions upon magnificent docks and wharves to accommodate trade and commerce at Montreal; but thus far they have attracted there no forest of shipping. At a vast expense she has dredged the channel of that river to a depth of twenty feet and to a width of three hundred feet, miles and miles below that city, yet does "that way out" remain difficult and dangerous, and comparatively unfrequented, and forever will, in consequence of bad shores, sunken reefs, and perpetual fogs. The perils of this untoward thoroughfare most strikingly appear in one item of the recent pftst. In the last few years the Montreal Atlantic Steamship Company have lost seven, if not eight, of their fine, new, and well-appointed steam-packets in the intricacies of the Gulf of St. Lawrence. What fact more patent and potent of the perils of this dreaded rival route? There remains one other significant business item, illustrating the disfavor with which this route is viewed by shippers and insurance men. For ten years, between 1845-55, the charge for freight from Montreal to Liverpool averaged twice the charge from New York to the same port.

Of the river and Canadian ports proper this may be said: less than one eighth of the lake freight went down to Montreal, notwithstanding drawbacks and reciprocity. During the first six years of the operation of the reciprocity treaty only twelve thousand tons, in forty vessels, found their way to the lower St. Lawrence, and none of these, it is said, stemmed the upward current by returning to the waters where they were built and loaded. In 1863 but a single vessel cleared and entered American ports, through this channel, from foreign countries. In the words of Secretary Chase, notwithstanding "the careful and inviting legislation of Canada in regard to tolls and tonnage duties," "the united efforts of the two Governments have proved of little effect in opening a channel preferable to that made up of the lakes, the canals, and railroads of the United States."

The idea that this can become a rival route, ice-locked as it is nearly seven months of the year, in addition to all its other disadvantages, in opposition to our open sea-board, is too preposterous to be seriously considered. But—
[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ALLISON. I design to yield a portion of my time to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. J. M. HUMPHREY.]

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York. Will my colleague yield to me for a moment?

Mr. J. M. HUMPHREY. I will.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York. After further consideration and consultation with the friends of the general project of a ship-canal around the falls of Niagara, I am directed to present the bill I now send to the Clerk as a substitute for the bill I offered on Tuesday last, understanding that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PAINE] will withdraw the amendment which he offered, in the nature of a substitute to the bill first introduced by me.

The first seven sections of this bill are the same as the corresponding ones of the former bill, with two exceptions: first, the alternative is given to use inclined planes, if upon careful investigation it is found that they will be advisable, and work to the best interests of the Government and the company; and second, a clause is inserted in the seventh section vesting the title of the land taken by the United States in securing the right of way, when the damages adjusted as provided in the bill shall be paid. Then follow the main provisions which make this differ from the original bill. This bill provides for the chartering of a company direct by the Government who shall or may accept the benefits offered and construct the canal, with all the restrictions and provisions that are customary in such cases. The bill first presented provided for the construction of the work through any company chartered by any State, which company should be governed by similar regulations and subject to the same restrictions as in the bill now presented.

The concluding sections of this bill are the same as in the original bill, differing only so far as necessary to make them conform to the charter granted, and to confer upon the company so chartered the necessary power for the government of the corporation and the management of its affairs.

Mr. Speaker, as I propose to speak upon this measure hereafter, I will not occupy the time of the House any longer at present.

Mr. J. M. HUMPHREY here addressed the House; but before concluding, the morning hour expired. [His remarks will be found complete in the Appendix.]

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

TERRITORIAL ORGANIC ACTS.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to amend the organic acts of the Territories of Nebraska, Colorado, Dakota, Montana, Washington, Idaho, Arizona, Utah, and New Mexico; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the report of the New York East Annual Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

MEXICO.

Mr. LAFLIN, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was referred, under the law, to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That there be printed of the message of the President of the United States and the accompanying documents on the subject of Mexico the same number as is now provided by law for the printing of the general diplomatic correspondence.

REORGANIZATION OF THE ARMY.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 361) entitled "An act to reorganize and establish the Army of the United States;" the pending question being on the motion that its further consideration be postponed to the first Monday of December next.

Mr. NIBLACK. I am satisfied, after conference with some friends, that the motion to postpone would not be a fair test, and that it would be more respectful to the committee to allow them to perfect their bill first. I therefore withdraw the motion to postpone.

The question then recurred on Mr. SCHENCK's amendment, as follows:

Add:

But nothing in this section shall be construed so as to vacate the commission of the Commissary General of Subsistence, but only to change the title of that officer to Commissary General; nor to vacate the commission of any officer now commissioned as assistant commissary general of subsistence or commissary of subsistence, but only to change the title to commissary in the cases of those who rank as lieutenant colonels, majors, and captains, without affecting in any way their relative position or the time from which they take such rank.

Mr. SCHENCK. I demand the previous question on the amendment.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I move to amend section nine-teen by striking out the concluding sentence, as follows:

And hereafter no graduate of the United States Military Academy, being at the time in the Army of the United States, or having been therein at any time for three years next preceding, shall be eligible to appointment as an officer in the subsistence department.

I do not propose to spend much time on this proposition, nor do I propose to go into any discussion as to the character of the Military Academy at West Point, the desert of its graduates, or the merits of those officers who are not graduates. But I submit that this clause of the section which I have moved to strike out does put an unjust and improper distinction in this bill against graduates of the Military Academy.

Now, I certainly have no desire to bestow praise upon the graduates of that institution at the expense of officers who are now graduates. I have no desire to claim any undue or unreasonable merit for the graduates of West Point; but I think we shall all agree that during the war we have just passed through, not only the officers who have gone into the Army from civil life, not only the rank and file of our troops, but the officers who are graduates of West Point, at least, as well, have all commended themselves most highly to the favorable consideration of the country.

A great deal has been said about the necessity of a West Point education for men to buy biscuit. I do not think it is a question of necessity. I do not think it is a question as to whether an education itself at West Point shall be required for this department. But this department does afford one of those sources of promotion, one of those rewards of merit, which certainly ought to be open to every deserving man in the Army. It is in itself but a trifle, it is true. Probably in the ordinary course of vacancies that shall occur in this department there will not average two appointments a year; but I am entirely unwilling, as a matter of principle, to say that in military offices, in offices requiring military knowledge or military education to administer successfully, as I claim these places in the subsistence department do require to a large extent—I am entirely unwilling that any one of these should be closed against officers of the Army of any character whatever.

In the present organization of this department, the organization as it existed during the whole of the war of the rebellion, or during the most of it at least, the head of the department is and has been a graduate of West Point. As to the efficiency, ability, and integrity with which he has managed the affairs of that department I think there is no question whatever. Other gentlemen connected with the department have distinguished themselves by their administration of its business. Others who are graduates of West Point have acquired in the service of this bureau no less distinction, no less good repute among all who are familiar with their operations, than has been acquired by themselves and others in the field. And many of those who are officers of West Point now in this department have distinguished themselves greatly in the field before receiving their appointment as well as on detailed service while they have held their commissions here.

I submit that there is no sufficient reason why this clause should be retained in this bill, standing, as it were, as a sort of stigma upon West Point, a mark of exclusion of officers from a certain line of promotion in the Army. I can see no reason why we should not equally exclude them from the Quartermaster General's department. Indeed the chairman of the committee, I understand, substantially admits it. The truth is, both these departments require not merely business capacity, but they also involve in no small degree full and accurate knowledge of military organization, of military law, and of the theory upon which the system of our Army organization is based. I certainly hope that the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs will consent that this clause of the section be stricken out, or that the House, in any event, will unite in saying that it ought not to be retained.

Mr. BLAINE. I do not rise to debate the pending question, but for the purpose of making a correction in the Globe report of the proceedings of Friday last, since which time I have been detained from the House by sickness. I am reported in the Globe as saying that the "longevity ration applies only to the infantry branch of the service." What I did say was that "the longevity ration applies from the instant an officer is commissioned in the service, without regard to change of corps or title." I was replying at the time to a remark of the gentleman from New York [Mr. DAVIS] who maintained that the proposed change of titles in the quartermaster's department would deprive the officers affected of their right to longevity rations.

One word further on another point. Yesterday the honorable chairman of the Military Committee [Mr. SCHENCK] intimated that I had procured the amendment giving advanced rank in the Adjutant General's department because it would promote some of my friends. The friends of mine that would thus be promoted are the friends of every member of Congress who has had business at the War Department, and in no other sense. I have no kinsman or constituent or old acquaintance to be helped or hindered by the amendment. I count many of the officers of the Adjutant General's department my friends, and I am proud to do so, but I was actuated solely by a desire to promote the interests of the public service in procuring advanced rank for that department. I desire to say nothing more on the subject.

Mr. THAYER. I desire to ask the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs a question in reference to this section, if he will give me his attention. There are now, I believe, twenty-nine officers on this staff corps, of whom twenty-four are graduates of West Point, and five are not. The last clause of the section, which the gentleman from New York [Mr. HALE] moves to strike out, declares that—Hereafter no graduate of the United States Military Academy, being at the time in the Army of the United States, or having been therein at any time for three years next preceding, shall be eligible to appointment as an officer in the subsistence department.

Now, the question which I ask the gentleman is this: whether if a vacancy occurs in this department among any of these officers, the whole of the twenty-four officers who are graduates of West Point, and who are now in this department, are to be excluded from being appointed to fill that vacancy; in other words, whether they are not totally shut out from promotion as vacancies occur, and whether promotion in the future is not, by the terms of this prohibition, confined to the five gentlemen in the department who are not graduates of West Point?

I will yield for a moment to the chairman of the committee to answer that question, for I wish to have his views upon that point.

Mr. SCHENCK. I have not the slightest idea that that would be the effect of the section; certainly that was not the intention of the committee in framing the bill. I suppose that in making appointments to the subsistence departments they would be made as before, under any fair construction of this bill; but if the gentleman has any doubt about it, I shall be very glad of any suggestion of phraseology which will accomplish the object the committee has in view more perfectly than it is, perhaps, accomplished by this section.

Mr. THAYER. I will avail myself of the offer made by the gentleman from Ohio by suggesting a modification which will prevent that result. I never had a stronger conviction upon any question of law than that which I have in reference to this, and I ask the attention of the lawyers of the House to the phraseology of this prohibition. I undertake to say that no lawyer in the House will dispute the point, after a careful examination of the phraseology of this section, that its effect would be precisely what I allege it would be. Could anything be plainer than this, when you say that hereafter "no graduate of the United States Military Academy" shall be eligible to appointment as an officer in the subsistence department? Suppose a major, for instance, in that department should be appointed hereafter a lieutenant colonel or a colonel by way of promotion, would not that be an appointment in the subsistence department? Does he not have to be appointed by the President of the United States? Is it not necessary to send his nomination to the Senate and must he not be confirmed by that body? Why, every one will see that an appointment by way of promotion to fill a vacancy is just as much an appointment as an original appointment; and that when the language of the section excludes all graduates of West Point from receiving any appointment in the future in the subsistence department, it cuts off absolutely from promotion every officer in that department who was a graduate of that institution.

I will not take up the time of the House by any further remarks upon that point. I do not think that any gentleman who will carefully examine the provision can disagree with me in opinion upon this point; but as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] expresses his willingness that the language of the section shall be modified so as to prevent that result, I will offer such a modification.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I had occasion yesterday to make a few remarks in vindication of West Point. And as this is the first feature in the bill which would seem to create invidious distinctions against the graduates of that institution, I desire to lay before the House a little information respecting the institution, which I have collected since the adjournment on yesterday.

We all recollect that before the Mexican war there was very great opposition to the Academy. But the success in the Mexican war of the officers graduating there rather quieted the feeling.

We have been told that the Academy at West Point was a place where the sons of rich men were educated. I know that from an examination made at the time it was found that a large majority of those appointed to West Point were from the medium walks of life. We were told, also, that favoritism was shown there, and yet I know that upon one occasion the son of the then General-in-Chief of the armies of the United States was dismissed from the institution, and the son of the tailor who furnished the uniforms for the young men graduated at the head of his class.

But recently we have been told, in one of the prominent journals of the country, that the officers at West Point were a knot of lazy pensioners, and officers who decline to fight except in a gentlemanly manner. I have a statement showing what was done by the officers of the regular Army during the late war.

When the war began there were about twelve hundred officers in the regular Army, but of that number one hundred and eighty-one were left dead upon the field of battle, and nearly five hundred were wounded; or more than one half of all the officers of the regular Army were either killed or wounded in the various battles of the war. I consider that rather hard fighting than gentlemanly fighting; I consider the result an indication of bravery, of skill, of love of profession, and love of country, rather than otherwise.

At the commencement of the war there were among the officers of the regular Army eight hundred and twenty who were graduates of West Point. Under the law distributing the appointments to the Military Academy, the South, of course, had its proportion; and hence a large number of the graduates were from the South. Out of the eight hundred and twenty, only one hundred and ninety-seven resigned and entered the confederate service, leaving six hundred and twenty-three out of the eight hundred and twenty, loyal to the Government which educated them.

I think this is a comment upon West Point and the regular Army which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] certainly ought to consider before he undertakes to create invidious distinctions against them.

Sir, of the six hundred and twenty-three officers who remained loyal, one hundred and thirty-eight were from the South, being nearly one half of the number of the graduates from the South; a triumphant answer to the charge that West Point is a nursery of treason. I do not believe that any department of the Government furnished so large a proportion of southern men who adhered to the Union as the regular Army and West Point.

There is another fact which is quite significant. Out of over two hundred officers appointed to the Army from the South and from civil life, not graduates of West Point, there were scarcely half a dozen who did not prove false to their allegiance. Assuredly this proves that the influence of West Point, and of the education which it affords, has not been unfavorable to loyal feeling. Out of eight hundred and twenty graduates in the Army at the commencement of the war, only one hundred and ninety-seven left the Army and joined the confederate forces. While out of those appointed from the South from civil life, less than half a dozen remained loyal.

Take the other Departments of the Government, even the heads of the Departments, the judges of the Supreme Court, members of the Senate and members of the House, and compare their record with that which West Point has produced, and I assure you it will be found that the loyalty of West Point men far exceeded the loyalty of those occupying high positions under the Government.

Mr. GRINNELL. I should like to ask my friend whether there is not a difference between the position of those who have been educated at Government expense and who have taken solemn oaths to support the Constitution, and civilians who were under no such obligation; and whether the gentleman's argument is not weak in overlooking this distinction.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. No, sir; it is strong. I contend that when a man becomes a citizen of the Government and takes an oath to support the Constitution and laws of that Government, there is no palliation under which he may shield himself when he departs from the obligations of his oath. And although it may be said that it is more ungrateful in a graduate of West Point, having received an education at the expense of the Government, to prove untrue, than it would be for a man appointed from civil life, the facts show that the graduates of West Point do feel this gratitude; for of those from the South appointed from civil life scarce one remained true, while of those educated at public expense, more than three fourths of all remained loyal to their flag, and more than half of them were either killed or wounded in the course of the war.

I think this shows conclusively that the teachings of that institution are in favor of loyalty, exciting a love of country which, during the rebellion, has indicated itself; and here, in my judgment, is an additional reason why the institution should be sustained, and that there should be no invidious distinctions against its graduates.

Mr. THAYER. I move to amend by inserting after the word "department" in line twenty-three, the following:

But this provision shall not extend to graduates of West Point now in the subsistence department.

Mr. SCHENCK. I have no objection to that whatever.

Mr. TAYLOR. I would like to suggest to the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs another modification of this section. I suggest that there should be added at the end of the section the words "unless disqualified by reason of wounds received while in the line of his duty." There are, I have no doubt, many officers who, by reason of wounds, are disqualified for active field service, but who can yet perform the duties of commissaries as well as any others.

Mr. SCHENCK. For reasons which I will assign if the amendment be moved, I cannot consent to that.

The SPEAKER. The motion would not be in order now.

Mr. TAYLOR. I simply desired to throw out the suggestion.

Mr. TILAYER. I demand the previous question on my amendment.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered: and under the operation thereof the amendment of Mr. THAYER was agreed to.

The question recurred on the motion of Mr. HALE to strike out the last sentence of the section as printed.

Mr. SCHENCK. I desire to submit a few remarks in reply to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HALE.] It seems to me that gentlemen in their eulogies upon West Point and upon those who have had the honor to be graduates of the Military Academy, run away enurely from the issue which is presented, or which at least it is desired shall be presented to this House by the provisions contained in the section as reported by the Committee on Military Affairs. Gentlemen say it is a discrimination against graduates of the United States Military Academy to provide that they shall not be eligible to selections for office in the subsistence department. Now, there is another light in which that may be viewed; and I may here repeat, without rearguing it, a proposition which I stated yesterday.

Skill in the art of war, thorough instruction in military science, such as is obtained at a national school like that we have established at West Point, is not necessary to make a competent officer of subsistence. So far is this from being the case that any man from civil life, having good business habits and character, accustomed to trade and to make contracts, understanding something about the ordinary affairs relating to the subjects of those contracts, is likely to be quite as well, if not better, qualified than a man who has turned his attention exclusively to the acquiring of technical knowledge in the particular line of war.

I lay that down as a proposition from which all the rest follows.

Now, sir, how do these gentlemen get this information? It is afforded to them at the expense of the Government. It is education given by the Government to those who, under the law, receive the appointments to West Point. The Government which gives education has the right to impose what conditions it will as among the terms upon which that education shall be conferred. Is it unreasonable to say to those gentlemen, when we give them a four years' education, at great cost, at a public institution maintained from the Treasury of the country for the purpose of instructing them in all that relates to the technical knowledge of war, they shall not throw all that away by going into a situation which requires no such technical knowledge?

Why did we propose to put this condition in the bill in regard to the subsistence department? Because experience has proved there is an evil in that department to be cured. If you take the Army Register prior to the war, never but one man was appointed who was not educated at the United States Military Academy, and he only from happening to be son of the chief of the department. After the war began, up to 1863, but a single appointment not from graduates of West Point, and including 1863, only some three or four. On the contrary, gentlemen graduating, it is to be presumed, reasonably high in their class, for we find them in the artillery branch of the service, have been again and again appointed to the subsistence department. Congress here intervenes and declares by law that hereafter it will be expected the department shall not be made up of men who have been educated at the public expense for other purposes. That is the whole case.

Suppose the Army Register showed you could not get a chaplain in unless educated at West Point, that you could not get a surgeon in unless, in addition to his knowledge as a surgeon, you superadded graduation at West Point, would not Congress feel itself authorized to intervene and say by law this is not what we educated these gentlemen for? Therefore I repeat what I said yesterday, just in proportion as gentlemen say graduates of West Point are good engineers, capable artilleryists, excellent infantrymen, gallant and skillful cavalrymen, just in proportion as we have educated them for occupation in these particular branches of real war, we say that it is not unreasonable in us to expect they shall confine themselves to that for which we educated them.

I will not be drawn off into the comparative merits and demerits of West Point cadets or West Point graduates. There might be a great deal answered to what has been said on that subject. All comparisons are odious, and very often, if they comprise allusions to a whole class of men, they are as unjust and ungenerous as they are odious.

No man has a higher idea for the purposes of war of the military knowledge acquired in this military school than I have, but it does not follow from that we must therefore give to the gentlemen who have these qualifications, and who have corresponding good qualities of mind and character and courage and integrity in the general, all the places, as well those which require no such military education as those which do. It is unjust. It is not part of the contract.

But when gentlemen would speak of West Point they had better speak of it with bated breath, even on this question of remarkable loyalty. I admit the great body of the graduates of West Point, when the trial came, espoused the cause of the country and fought under the flag under which they had received their education, but I do not so much wonder they generally did that, as I abominate, despise, and denounce the infernal and damnable spirit of those who committed double perjury, going off to the enemy after they had thus been educated. I draw the distinction that my friend from Iowa [Mr. GRINNELL] drew. I say if civilians, if civil officers, if men in the ordinary walks of life, subjected to the political influences which surrounded them, with mistaken ideas mixed up with this heresy of secession, went off to the South and fought against their Government, that is more easily to be accounted for than that men, educated under the flag of the country and at its expense, enjoying its emoluments and honors and under the obligation to defend that flag, should have committed a double perjury, such as Robert E. Lee and others did when they deserted that flag. A good many of them who remained loyal, as it is termed, my friend from Vermont will himself admit manifested only a qualified, moderate, and temperate sort of loyalty.

Now, I do not say this in general disparagement of West Point. I would repel any attack upon the Military Academy or its graduates, as if they had generally shown a lukewarmness in the great cause of the country. But while I make that admission, I do not believe, on the other hand, in any of these comparisons, any of these allusions, which would seem to uphold the idea that West Point, above all other institutions, had sent forth men who had particularly signalized themselves as being peculiarly devoted to the country which had protected, nourished, educated, and provided for them.

But, sir, all this, I repeat, is out of the question. It is no part of it. The question presented really by the committee when they proposed that as a feature of the bill, is one of the simplest possible to be conceived. It does not involve any inquiry into the comparative fairness or unfairness exercised toward men who are graduates or cadets at West Point, in reference to their origin as being more or less exalted or humble. Why that is brought in I do not understand; nor why a comparison should be made between the son of a professor there and the son of a tailor. I believe in these latter days it is not considered a thing otherwise than to be boasted of to have been connected with that honorable profession—a tailor. [Laughter.] We are not to be drawn aside into any such digression.

I repeat that the whole of this matter is in a nutshell. We educate these men at the public cost. We have places enough for them in the Engineer corps, in the cavalry, in the infantry, in the bureaus, and in the different staff departments, and we say to them, as the peculiar education which we give you was intended to qualify you for these places, if you will insist upon finding your way into other places not requiring this peculiar kind of knowledge, and if those who have the management of affairs will indulge you in getting these places, we will cut off all possibility by law and hold you to your calling as military men, peculiar and special, for which you were educated at the public expense.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. HALE, no quorum voted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DAWES) ordered tellers; and appointed Messrs. HALE and SCHENCK.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 23, noes 72.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I move an amendment to section nineteen, which will, I think, commend itself both to the chairman of the committee and the House. I move to strike out from and including the word "reducing" to and including the word "ten," and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

In the grade of captain, no other officer of that grade shall be appointed until the number of captains shall be reduced to ten, and thereafter the number of captains in that department shall be limited to such reduced number.

So that the clause will read:

But after the first appointments made under the provisions of this section, as vacancies may occur in the grade of captain, no other officer of that grade shall be appointed until the number of captains shall be reduced to ten, and thereafter the number of captains in that department shall be limited to such reduced number.

I understand the chairman of the committee to make no objection to this amendment.

Mr. SCHENCK. I do not assent to it. If you will say nothing upon it I will say nothing, and you may move the previous question.

Mr. HALE. Very well. I move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and the question being put on agreeing to the amendment, no quorum voted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore ordered tellers; and appointed Messrs. HALE and HARDING of Illinois.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 35, noes 61.

So the amendment was rejected.

The question recurred on the amendment of Mr. WOODBRIDGE, to strike out the whole of section nineteen, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That the subsistence department of the Army shall hereafter consist of the officers now authorized by law, namely, one commissary general of subsistence, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a brigadier general; two assistant commissary generals, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of colonel of cavalry; two assistant commissary generals, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of lieutenant colonel of cavalry; eight commissaries, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of majors of cavalry; and sixteen commissaries, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of captains of cavalry.

The question being taken on agreeing to the amendment, there were—ayes 23, noes 64, the Speaker pro tempore voting in the affirmative to make a quorum.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The twentieth section was then read, as follows:

SEC. 20. And be it further enacted, That the Provost Marshal's Bureau shall hereafter consist of a provost marshal general, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a brigadier general; and one assistant provost-marshal general, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a colonel of cavalry; and all matters relating to the recruitment of the Army and the arrest of deserters shall be placed under the direction and control of this bureau, under such regulations as the Secretary of War may prescribe.

Mr. CONKLING. I move to strike out section twenty of the bill. My objection to this section is that it creates an unnecessary office for an undeserving public servant; it fastens as an incubus upon the country a hateful instrument of war, which deserve no place in a free Government in time of peace.

I have never heard any very serious attempt to justify by argument the permanent continuance of an officer whose administration during the war has had in it so little to commend and so much to condemn. But I have heard an effort made to prove the propriety of this section by charging it to the Lieutenant General of the Army, and by saying that he had found a necessity for continuing, in time of peace, the Bureau of the Provost Marshal General. In order that the House may see how true this allegation is, I send to the Clerk's desk and ask (to have read copies of letters which have been furnished to me, the first a letter addressed to the Lieutenant General by a Senator of the United States.

The Clerk read, as follows:

UNITED STATES SENATE CHAMBER,
WASHINGTON, March 17, 1866.

GENERAL: The House bill for the organization of the Army contains a provision creating a permanent Provost Marshal's Bureau, with a brigadier general at its head; also placing the recruiting service in its charge.

It has been unofficially reported to me that this was done in consequence of a recommendation of yours to that effect.

I should be pleased to know if such is the case, as I had labored under the impression from conversation with officers of the Army that such a step was not a judicious one and tended only to increase the number of bureaus and officers of the Army with an increase of expenditure without any corresponding efficiency or benefit.

If my impressions are erroneous I would like to have them corrected.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. W. NESMITH.

Lieutenant General U. S. GRANT, &c.

Mr. CONKLING. I now send the answer of the Lieutenant General.

The Clerk read, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 19, 1866.

DEAR SIR: Yours of the 17th instant, stating that it had been intimated that I had recommended the continuance of the Provost Marshal General's department and the transfer of the recruiting service to it, is received.

Some months since a paper was referred to me showing the great number of desertions from the Army and asking for suggestions to put a stop to them. To that paper I suggested a number of changes in orders governing the recruiting service, and recommended that the whole matter be put in charge of the Provost Marshal General, who could devote more attention to it than the Adjutant General with all his other duties could. I am opposed, however, to multiplying bureaus, and I think there is no necessity for a Provost Marshal General. In fact, if we had to organize the Army anew, I would not have as many bureaus as we now have. In my opinion, the country would be just as well and much more economically served if the coast surveying duties were added to the Engineer Bureau, and the quartermaster, subsistence, and pay departments were merged into one. I would not recommend a change now, however, but would not make any increase of bureaus.

Very truly, yours,

U. S. GRANT,
Lieutenant General.

Hon. J. W. NESMITH, United States Senator.

A true copy:

GEORGE K. LEET,
Assistant Adjutant General.

Mr. CONKLING. The reasons which no doubt the writer of that letter has for deeming the Provost Marshal and his bureau an unnecessary appendage to the peace establishment of the country appear at considerable length in a communication which I have here, but which I will not, unless it becomes necessary, have read. It is a communication from the acting head of the Adjutant General's Office. We all know that during our history thus far we have always managed without a bureau of this kind to recruit the regular Army, and that no need of it has ever been felt in maintaining the usual military establishment. The Provost Marshal's Bureau was a temporary expedient resorted to in an extreme emergency to bring volunteers hastily to the field. Its mission is ended, and it should be buried out of sight. The communication in my hand shows that if reestablished now for the purpose of superintending recruiting for the regular Army—and it can be applied to no other purpose—the expense of the recruiting service will be largely increased, that no greater efficiency will be attained, that a necessity will be created for duplicating records, for a new supply of apartments, of clerks, of agents; in short, of the various arrangements connected with recruiting, and that absolutely no good result can be accomplished by it.

I state it thus strongly and briefly, and I will cause the details to be read if the reading shall be called for hereafter.

There is one thing—I know of but one—for this bureau to do before leaving the public presence, and that is to close its accounts, so as to allow the War Department and the country to know precisely what has become of the twenty-five million and odd dollars which, under the act of March 13, 1862, went to its credit. Sixteen million and some odd dollars have been expended, and nine million and odd dollars remain as a balance to the credit of the fund; and whenever the bureau will close its accounts, or will enable them to be closed, as they never will be until the bureau is wound up, it will perform its sole remaining function.

If the administration had been ever so able, the time has come when the whole system of provost marshals should be numbered with the grievous memories of a bloody and terrible epoch.

But there are yet other grounds of objection. I protest against any promotion or reward for the officer whose interests are involved in this section. He holds already the rank of lieutenant colonel in the staff department. Indeed, by accident, if the pending bill shall pass, he will be elevated to yet a higher grade; but as he stands now, his pay amounts to $3,500, or thereabouts. I think that, for the present, is enough for him. He has suffered nothing and lost nothing in war that I ever heard of, and I protest, in the name of my people and in the name of the people of the western division of New York, against perpetuating a power under which they have suffered, beyond the capacity of any man adequately to state in the time allotted to me.

Central and western New York have a right to feel and do feel deeply on this subject. My constituents remember, and other constituencies remember, wrongs done them too great for forgetfulness and almost for belief by the creatures of this bureau and by its head.

We in the western division of New York had sent to rule over us as assistant provost marshal general an officer of the Veteran Reserve corps; a man who never saw a battle, who never received a scratch or suffered a day's sickness in the military service; a man honored with the especial personal intimacy and confidence of the Provost Marshal General, and who in a marked and ostentatious degree reflected the will and the favor of his chief. He had been for some time in the office of the Provost Marshal General here in Washington; he was his crony and confidant, and sustained with him, as events proved, relations of great personal intimacy. This spokesman, so trusted and so fortunate, did not come to us alone. There came at the same time other creatures of the head of the bureau at Washington. The western division swarmed with these chosen favorites, and they illustrated to the full the genius and the morale of their mission.

By acts of their own, and by acts done by their superior at Washington, they turned the business of recruiting and drafting into one carnival of corrupt disorder, into a paradise of coxcombs and thieves.

False quotas were put upon us; exaggerated telegrams and orders were sent to our boards of supervisors. We were victimized by constant uncertainty and deception. In my own district, under one call, $438,000 was wrongfully wrung from an outraged and groaning people. Officers of this bureau who sought to stem the tide of fraud were removed without warning, and the whole machinery of the Government was subjected to miscreants and robbers. Communities petitioned and remonstrated in vain. The most palpable wrongs were refused redress. Men immeasurably the superiors of General Fry represented and protested, but they were spurned with magnificent disdain. Never was "the insolence of office" more offensively portrayed than it was by this man whom it is proposed to decorate and enrich.

If there was no design at headquarters to do wrong there was a capacity to muddle, to begot, to misunderstand facts, and to misread and misstate figures and simple results, which is nearly inconceivable.

I was employed by the Government to prosecute some of the frauds to which I have referred; and I tried this assistant provost marshal general, who had been justified in all the outrages he committed and in all the acts by which millions were stolen from the people of New York; who was justified by his superior officer down to the time when the sentence was published, and afterward, I understand. He was accused and convicted of the basest forms of official atrocity; the most monstrous acts of bribery, oppression, and wrong were charged against him and proved against him. And although he disgorged some two hundred thousand dollars, I see it stated in a newspaper that the other day he purchased in the city of Philadelphia an establishment for which he paid down $71,000. He was utterly poor when he entered this bureau; and yet, after all he yielded up, and after paying a fine of $10,000, it seems that still he is rich.

And this was not an isolated case; far from it. On the contrary, I say, and I may endeavor on a future occasion to show in detail, that there never has been in human history a greater mockery and a greater burlesque upon honest administration than the conduct of this bureau, taking the whole country together. It will turn out that of the seven or eight hundred thousand men for whom, not to whom, because they did not get them, enormous bounties were paid, not to exceed three hundred thousand, I believe not two hundred thousand, ever reached the front.

Mr. BLAINE obtained the floor.

Mr. WARD. I hope unanimous consent will be given my colleague [Mr. CONKLING] to proceed.

Mr. ROSS. I object.

Mr. BLAINE. I am in a very weakly condition of health to make the brief explanation due to the Military Committee. But I wish to state why the committee reported this section of the bill in regard to which the gentleman from New York shows so much feeling.

I believe that among the earliest acts of the gentleman from New York at this session of Congress was the introduction of a resolution, which was adopted by this House, directing the War Department to report upon the expediency of abolishing the office of Provost Marshal General. In the routine of business the answer of the Secretary of War came to the Military Committee, and among the papers was a letter from Lieutenant General Grant.

There was an elaborate paper also from General Townsend. They were referred to a subcommittee. The committee, upon a full review of the papers, and especially of the letter of Lieutenant General Grant, reported this section. The gentleman from New York has read a letter from the Lieutenant General, which practically recalls the recommendations of the letter on which the committee acted; but I desire the Clerk to read the letter of Lieutenant General Grant, which was the authorization, in the judgment of the committee, for inserting the section.

The Clerk read, as follows:

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF THE UNITED STATES,
WASHINGTON, December 14, 1865.

SIR: In reply to your letter of the 13th instant, in reference to desertions, I would make the following remarks: I do not think the present method of recruiting, as carried out, sufficient to fill up the regular Army to the force required, or to keep it full when once filled.

The duty is an important one, and demands, I think, the exclusive attention of an officer of the War Department, aided by a well-organized system extending over the country. I think the officer best fitted for that position, by his experience during the present war, is General Fry, and would recommend that the whole subject of recruiting be put in his hands, and all officers on recruiting duty be directed to report to him. He should also have charge of the apprehension of deserters, should be authorized to offer such rewards as will secure their apprehension. When caught they should be tried, and the sentence rigidly carried into effect; this would soon stop the present enormous amount of desertion.

I would recommend that the duties heretofore performed by provost marshals be hereafter performed by officers detailed for recruiting duty.

Very respectfully,

U. S. GRANT,
Lieutenant General.

Hon. E. M. STANTON, Secretary of War.

Mr. BLAINE. The House will observe that the Committee on Military Affairs acted precisely in accordance with the recommendations of the Lieutenant General as contained in the letter which has just been read. The first point which the Lieutenant General makes is that the system of recruiting carried on under the direction of the Adjutant General's Office has not proved efficient, in his judgment, in filling the Army. In the next place, he suggests that some special officer should be detailed to superintend the business of recruiting, and he names General Fry as the proper officer. In the next place, he states that provost marshals throughout the country are not needed, and that their places should be filled by recruiting officers. Provisions in accordance with all these recommendations are comprehended in the section which the gentleman from New York would have stricken out.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I desire to state that the facts up to the latest date do not sustain the opinion of the Lieutenant General. From last October till April 17, the Adjutant General has recruited between nineteen and twenty thousand men for the regular Army.

Mr. BLAINE. We acted only on the information before us. And when the gentleman from New York [Mr. CONKLING] quotes the letter of the Lieutenant General in condemnation of the report made by the Committee on Military Affairs, I merely wish the privilege of showing that that report was made in express conformity, verbatim et literatim, with the recommendations of that officer's letter, which came officially before the committee, and which was not smuggled in in the manner in which the letter read by the gentleman from New York comes before us. That is not an official letter; it is an unofficial note. The letter just read by the Clerk is an official note, communicated to this House by the Secretary of War on a regular call, and referred by the House to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. Speaker, I do not suppose that the House of Representatives care anything more than the Committee on Military Affairs about the great recruiting frauds in New York, or the quarrels of the gentleman from New York with General Fry, in which quarrels it is generally understood the gentleman came out second best at the War Department. I do not think that such questions ought to be obtruded here.

Though the gentleman from New York has had some difference with General Fry, yet I take pleasure in saying that, as I believe, there is not in the American Army a more honorable and high-toned officer than General Fry. That officer, I doubt not, is ready to meet the gentleman from New York or anybody else in the proper forum. I must say that I do not think it is any very creditable proceeding for the gentleman from New York here in this place to traduce General Fry as a military officer when he has no opportunity to be heard. I do not consider such a proceeding the highest specimen of chivalry that could be exhibited.

The gentleman from New York has had his issues with General Fry at the War Department. They have been adjudicated upon by the Secretary of War; and I leave it for the gentleman to say whether he came out first best. I do not know the particulars; the gentleman can inform the House. All I have to say is—and in this I believe I speak the sentiment of a majority of the members of this House—that James B. Fry is a most efficient officer, a high-toned gentleman, whose character is without spot or blemish; a gentleman who stands second to no officer in the American Army; and he is ready to meet the gentleman from New York and all other accusers anywhere and everywhere. And, sir, when I hear the gentleman from New York rehearse in this House, as an impeachment of General Fry, all the details of the recruiting frauds in New York, which General Fry used his best energies to repress with iron hand, a sense of indignation carries me beyond my personal strength and impels me to denounce such a course of proceeding.

Mr. MERCUR obtained the floor.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MERCUR] to yield to me.

Mr. MERCUR. I yield to the gentleman. Mr. CONKLING. Mr. Speaker, if General Fry is reduced to depending for vindication upon the gentleman from Maine he is to be commiserated certainly. If I have fallen to the necessity to taking lessons from that gentleman in the rules of propriety, or of right or wrong, God help me.

I say to him further that I mean to take no advantage such as he attributes of the privileges of this place or of the absence of General Fry. On the contrary, I am ready to avow what I have here declared anywhere. I have stated facts for which I am willing to be held responsible at all times and places.

I say, further, that the statement made by the gentleman from Maine with regard to myself personally and my quarrels with General Fry, and their result, is false. He says I can—

Mr. BLAINE. What does the gentleman mean to say was false?

Mr. CONKLING. I mean to say that the statement made by the gentleman from Maine is false.

Mr. BLAINE. What statement?

Mr. CONKLING. Does not the gentleman understand what I mean?

Mr. BLAINE. I call the gentleman to order. I demand he shall state what was false in what I stated. I have the parliamentary right. I demand the gentleman shall state what is false in what I said.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Maine will state his point of order.

Mr. BLAINE. I have already. The gentleman has denounced my statement as false. It is my right to have him state in what particular anything I said or what allegation I made was false.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair overrules the point of order. The gentleman from New York will proceed.

Mr. BLAINE. One single word more.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not yield.

Mr. BLAINE. Do I understand the Speaker to rule, when a member states that another has stated falsely, that is no point of order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair does not understand that to have been the point of order.

Mr. BLAINE. Then I raise the point of order that the gentleman stated what was unparliamentary when he said that I stated what was false. I have no objection to his going on to state where it is false.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understood the gentleman to say it was out of order to pronounce a statement was false without stating wherein it was false. The Chair overrules that point of order. If the gentleman has another point of order to raise he will please state it.

Mr. BLAINE. I raise the point of order that it was not parliamentary for the gentleman to use those words.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair sustains that point of order.

Mr. BLAINE. I have no objection to his stating wherein it is false.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion it is not parliamentary to pronounce what has been said by any gentleman in debate here is false. It is not a point of order well taken to require him to state wherein it is false.

Mr. CONKLING. Under the rules the words objected to should have been taken down at the time, and the point of order comes now too late. One who makes such points of order should be more careful how he makes them.

It is not my disposition, Mr. Speaker, to engage in personal controversy upon this floor; but when any member forgets himself so far as to impute unworthy motives and resentments to me, when my motives and resentments are wholly foreign to the matter before the House, he must expect a rebuff; and when he asserts offensively that I have had personal quarrels with a person whose administration and public acts are under consideration, and that I have been worsted in these quarrels, and that, too, before the Secretary of War and by the Secretary of War, and when that statement has no foundation in fact, I think the Chair and the House will agree with me that something is to be pardoned to the earnestness of the occasion. I said what I felt bound to say, speaking not only for my own constituents, but for other constituencies in New York whose Representatives hear me. I could not remain silent when I know that in my own district and elsewhere men who stood up honestly and attempted to resist "bounty jumpers" and thieves were stricken down and trodden under foot by General Fry. I affirm that the only way to acquit him of venality is to convict him of the most incredible incompetency. I am responsible for that, sir, everywhere. I have had no such personal quarrel with General Fry, however, as has been asserted. I never chanced to see him but once, unless I have forgotten it, and when the gentleman rises here and makes a charge of that kind, with the insinuation by which he accompanies it, his conduct calls for some plainness of speech. And so, using parliamentary language, I reiterate that the statement which was made is erroneous and destitute of that which it should possess in order to render it admissible in debate. I believe that is parliamentary, even if the other form was not.

Now, sir, I want to say a word about this letter.

Mr. MERCUR. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. CONKLING. I beg pardon. I thought the gentleman yielded the floor to me altogether. I am very much obliged to him, and will relinquish the floor at once if he wishes to occupy it. I thought he intended to yield to me without qualification, so as to have another fifteen minutes afterward. But I will instantly resign it, and thank him for his courtesy. I ask the gentleman whether I shall go on or not.

Mr. BLAINE. I wish to make a single statement.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not understand that any one but the gentleman from Pennsylvania can claim the floor.

Mr. BLAINE. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MERCUR] had the floor.

Mr. CONKLING. I decline to yield it to the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the Chair understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MERCUR] to yield the floor entirely to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CONKLING?]

Mr. MERCUR. I did not so understand it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Then the gentleman from New York has the right to resume the floor only by the consent of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MERCUR] whether he wishes now to resume the floor.

Mr. MERCUR. I designed to resume it after the gentleman, but I will allow him to go on.

Mr. CONKLING. The letter which has been read, at the instance of the gentleman from Maine, from the Lieutenant General, has no reference whatever to this section of the bill or to a provision like this. It is a letter written on the 14th of December, when the Provost Marshal General's Bureau was and was for the time to remain in existence, and it refers chiefly to what had better be done with deserters, and the statement of the Lieutenant General amounts to this: that such an officer being in existence it is his appropriate business to take charge of deserters, and he recommends that he should do so, and attend to recruiting beside. That is all. There is no recommendation whatever favoring the retention of this bureau permanently, or of having any such officer in the standing Army. It comes to the Secretary of War appended to an argument made by General Fry himself, an elaborate argument made to show that he is essential to the Government. And although it is appended for that purpose, I repeat that it has nothing to do with this subject, but relates wholly to what the Provost Marshal's Bureau had better be set to do for the time being.

The letter which I have presented from the Lieutenant General was written to a member of the Military Committee of the Senate, written in answer to a question in reference to this identical section proposed there, and in answer to the specific inquiry whether he was or was not in favor of continuing this bureau. And he says in so many words that in his judgment there is not the slightest occasion for it, that bureaus ought not to be multiplied, and that this one ought to be discontinued.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, upon the authority not only of the Lieutenant General, but of all the generals who constituted the military council, because this section was omitted in the bill which they approved, I have made this motion.

Now, sir, as to the official conduct of this officer, I have deemed it proper to refer to it because the practical and real question is whether he personally is to continue in his present place. I have stated but a very small part of what I know from my own investigation of the matter. And I want it distinctly understood that in my judgment no officer of this Government holding a similar position has done so much harm and so little good as the officer of whom I am speaking. If that is offensive to anybody, so be it. To the particular individual to whom it may give most offense, I will answer not here but elsewhere, when it becomes necessary.

Mr. SPALDING. I desire to ask my friend a single question. Will it not answer his purpose if the House vote down this Provost Marshal's Bureau and let the matter stop there?

Mr. CONKLING. I think so.

Mr. SPALDING. We will do that cheerfully.

Mr. CONKLING. That is all I intended to do originally.

Mr. Speaker, how much time have I left?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. About four minutes.

Mr. CONKLING. Then I will yield it to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING.]

Mr. SPALDING. I wish to say a few words.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. CONKLING] yield the floor to the gentleman from Ohio for the residue of his time?

Mr. SPALDING. I claim it on my own merits, sir.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair now understands that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] is to speak during the balance of the time of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CONKLING.]

Mr. CONKLING. I so understand. I yield the residue of my time only to the gentleman from Ohio, because I suppose that the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MERCUR], to whom I am very much indebted, desires to occupy his full fifteen minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Then the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] is entitled to the floor for just three minutes.

Mr. SPALDING. Three minutes is enough for me. I am opposed, sir, to the continuance of this military bureau known as the Provost Marshal General's Office. I am opposed to it in time of peace, because I consider it an unnecessary appendage to the Army. But I believe that during the late war it was a necessary evil, and I think that a great deal of the odium which has been attached to the administration of the duties of that office pertained rather to the nature of the office than to the individual who discharged the duties of the office. I question, sir, whether any man, whether he came from the East or the West, from the North or the South, could have gone into the administration of the Provost Marshal General's department and discharged its duties with any more satisfaction to the general public than General James B. Fry.

Now, I do not claim that vast frauds have not been perpetrated in this as in every other department of the Government during the last four years; I think they have been. But I do not think any one man is responsible for them.

I think, perhaps the gentleman from New York [Mr. CONKLING] has sufficient cause for what he has said; but such a case as he has mentioned has not been brought home to me, in all my official intercourse with the Provost Marshal General during the last three years, and it has been constant and frequent. I have been treated by him with a degree of kindness and courtesy which requires from me an expression of thanks rather than of censure. I am happy, therefore, to have it in my power to say that I am under obligations to this man; and it is a pleasure to me to acquit myself of the duty of doing so.

Mr. BLAINE. I do not rise to argue the merits of this proposition. I rise rather to relieve myself from the stigma attempted to be cast upon me, and to place myself properly on the record, as becomes a gentleman and a Representative.

I stated when I was up before, and I left it to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CONKLING] to answer whether I answered it correctly, that I had understood there were personal difficulties between himself and the Provost Marshal General. I have so understood it. I have understood it from very high authority. I have understood that in those difficulties the gentleman from New York, as I said before, did not come out first best. I did not make this as an assertion. I left it to him to say whether it was so or not. Certainly I did not violate any principle of propriety or of parliamentary etiquette. And, sir, even were I in full health, (and I ought to be in my bed to-day,) I could not consent to go into this cheap sort of stuff about answering "here and elsewhere" and about "personal responsibility" and all that kind of thing.

Sir, I do not know how to characterize it. When we had gentlemen here from the eleven seceded States, they used to talk about answering "here and elsewhere;" and it was understood that they meant a duel! I suppose the gentleman from New York means nothing of that kind; I do not know whether he does or does not; but that is the only meaning that can be attached to the phrase. When a man says that he is ready to answer "here or elsewhere," he means that he is willing to receive a note outside of the District of Columbia. Well, now, that is very cheap, and certainly beneath my notice. I do not believe the gentleman from New York wants to fight a duel; and I am sure he needs no assurance from me that I do not intend it. When I have to resort to the use of the epithet of "false" upon this floor, and this cheap swagger about being responsible "here or elsewhere," I shall have very little faith in the cause which I stand up to maintain.

Mr. MERCUR. Mr. Speaker, in addition to the objections, which appear to me to be personal to the present Provost Marshal General, it strikes me there are many objections to the establishment of this bureau as a permanent one. The reasons for its existence during the war were manifest; but it strikes me that the reasons which exist for its abolishment since the termination of the war are equally manifest.

The bill, upon its face, provides for two classes of duties to be performed by this bureau. The one is the recruiting of the Army, and the other is the arrest of deserters. It provides that two persons shall take charge of these duties, one with the rank of brigadier general, and the other with the rank of colonel of cavalry.

Now, it appears to me that all these duties can be properly performed by a person occupying a lower position, and receiving much less compensation than these persons would receive. The recruiting of the Army is not a business of such vast dimensions nor will it be prolonged so long as to require the creation of a permanent bureau like this.

After the Army is filled, and we are informed that during the last six months recruiting has gone on very rapidly, this will not be needed, and whatever number we may fix upon as the proper number for the Army, we have reason to know that the vacuum can be filled up in a few months without any great difficulty; and when the Army is once filled on a peace establishment the duties of a bureau of this kind, so far as recruiting is concerned, will necessarily be very small.

Now, in regard to the other duties of this office, the arrest of deserters, I take it that there cannot now be a very large number of deserters that the Government proposes to pursue and arrest and punish. In these days of general amnesty and of general pardon, I presume the Government will not pursue very sharply and rigidly those persons who have deserted from the armies of the Union. And if there is no great number of deserters now who are to be arrested, is it to be supposed or assumed that the number will increase to such an extent in the future as to create a necessity for a permanent bureau to look after and arrest deserters? I think not; and hence I assume that neither for the one purpose nor the other specified in the bill is there any necessity for the creation of a permanent bureau of this character.

Now, in addition to the absence of any necessity for this bureau, it does strike me, if I understand the sentiment of the country aright, a sentiment which grew and strengthened with the progress of the recent rebellion, that the present head of this bureau did not satisfy public expectation in the discharge of his duties. It is not my design to attribute a want of good faith or a want of integrity to that bureau. In my judgment, though I may err, it was a want of capacity which created the great dissatisfaction which existed in the minds of the loyal people throughout the country.

The fact cannot be disguised that a great many of the complications and entanglements which arose during the progress of the war were solely in consequence of the orders which issued from time to time from the Provost Marshal General's Office. They complicated matters so much, one followed the other in such rapid succession, changing, modifying, and throwing confusion upon what had preceded, that no one could form any adequate idea of what was required. No district could tell how many men it had to raise, or how many men they had received credit for. Such being the fact, there is no reason, no justice, no propriety, in continuing this bureau for the benefit of the present incumbent.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. CONKLING] has suggested one thing in which this bureau was somewhat conspicuous, that is, its power of absorption of the commutation money which was paid by people all over the country, and of which no satisfactory account has yet been rendered. But there was another reputation which this bureau established, and that was its peculiar and unique way of combining figures. The country was frequently astonished by this rare and peculiar power of combining figures, not only during the progress of the war, but since we have met here this session.

I refer to the effort made to arrive at the probable cost to this Government in case we should adopt some system of equalizing the bounties to be given to our soldiers. We met here, every man of us zealous and warm in his desire to equalize the bounties. But the Provost Marshal General, with his peculiar combination of figures, has again thrown a damper upon us.

It strikes me that the House ought with great unanimity to vote down this section and cause this bureau to be abolished.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to insert the following in the place of the section which it is proposed to strike out:

That the Provost Marshal's Bureau shall be continued only so long as in the judgment of the Secretary of War may be necessary to close up the business thereof, not exceeding, however, six months from the passage of this act.

Mr. CONKLING. I will accept the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS.]

Mr. SCHENCK. My impression is that the sense of this House is against the section as it stands in the bill, and I certainly do not mean to struggle to keep it there. But it is equally certain that it is somewhat due to the Committee on Military Affairs that this House should clearly understand why it was that the committee believed that in an army bill a feature of this kind should compose one of its parts.

I will not go into any question about the character of the present incumbent of the Provost Marshal General's Office. He is able to defend that for himself. It is defended by the history of the war. It is defended by his services through good report and evil report. According to the best of his ability, that officer has so discharged his duty that those in his own immediate department, who know best how that duty has been discharged, have no such epithets to bestow upon him as that he is an undeserving officer.

It is not for me, therefore, to inquire why gentlemen make personal issues with that officer here, in a debate upon a feature in a military bill which has no reference to persons, but merely to a plan, a scheme of operations. And I here desire to say to the House, in behalf of the Military Committee, that in all their labor of consideration, discussion, inquiry, and other work tending to the framing of a proper bill for the establishment of an army system, they have endeavored to act without reference to persons, having in view only the best schemes for the attainment of objects which might result in the public good.

There is nothing about General Fry in this section. The probability is, that if the section should prevail as a part of the bill, General Fry would be retained in his present position; but it would not necessarily be so. The question truly before this House, as a legislative body, is whether or not the committee were right in supposing that a Provost Marshal General's Office, as a feature of a military system, is needed. Now, upon that subject, gentlemen have not been quite fair in referring to the testimony upon which the opinion of the committee, in favor of such necessity, was based. The gentleman from New York, [Mr. CONKLING,] in commenting upon the letter of the Lieutenant General, sent in response to a call made upon him by the Secretary of War, and officially communicated to this House, and by this House referred to the Military Committee, has taken occasion to say that there is nothing in that letter about recruiting, that it relates to desertion.

Mr. CONKLING. The gentleman misunderstood me. I said that there was nothing in the communication about a continuation of the Provost Marshal General's Bureau; that it referred simply to the business in which that bureau should be employed while it exists.

Mr. SCHENCK. And that its employment was to be in the arrest of deserters.

Mr. CONKLING. No, sir; I did not say that.

Mr. SCHENCK. Then I misunderstood the gentleman.

I wish now to call the attention of the House to the letter of General Grant, which, in connection with other communications of opinion made to the committee, induced the committee to adopt this as a feature of their bill. Certainly the committee were justified in supposing that the communication of General Grant was intended to recommend just what they did. General Grant, in his subsequent letter, communicated now informally and indirectly to this House, has explained that perhaps he was misunderstood. But that does not alter the fact that here was the letter, and this was the character of the recommendation contained in that letter.

The question was the subject of recruiting and desertion; how the one should be promoted and the other prevented. Now, sir, it is a notorious fact that heretofore recruiting for filling up the ranks of the regular Army of the United States has been to a considerable degree a failure. Whose fault it is, I do not undertake now to say; but the fact is incontestable that heretofore recruiting has been conducted by the detail of an officer who wanted an agreeable visit to a quiet country town or a pleasant residence for a time in some city. This commissioned officer, while boarding at a hotel, and occasionally visiting the rendezvous, left the business of recruiting to be performed by some sergeant, aided, it may be, by a private or two, also detailed as a portion of the party. Thus the work of recruiting was slow and quite inefficient in its general results.

I remember very well having been compelled to turn my attention to the mode in which this business was conducted in a neighboring city, when myself in the military service; and I remember that week after week and month after month the reports of the recruiting officers, both for the regular Army and for volunteers, read about in this way: "For the month of April, total number of recruits four; total number of deserters four. For the month of May, total number of recruits three; total number of deserters three."

Once in awhile there was at the end of the month a small margin of one or two recruits, who might or might not find their way from the recruiting station to a place in the ranks.

Now, sir, this is as well understood by General Grant as anybody else, and in the very commencement of this letter he says:

"I do not think the present method of recruiting, as carried out, sufficient to fill up the regular Army to the force required, or to keep it full when once filled."

Here is the evil of which the Lieutenant General complains. The committee came to the same conclusion, not merely from his testimony, but from other facts and other reports laid before them; and although now, at the close of the war, recruiting is going on very well indeed, the gentleman from Pennsylvania is very much mistaken in supposing that there are no desertions, and a great many desertions. There is for some reason an unusual proportion of deserters.

But in this state of fact, what did Lieutenant General Grant say, when appealed to by the Secretary of War? He said, "The duty is an important one, and demands, I think, the exclusive attention of an officer of the War Department." Not his casual attention in connection with some other department on the part of the same officer to whom it shall be given. No, sir, his exclusive attention to this matter is required. He says it "demands, I think, the exclusive attention of an officer of the War Department, aided by a well-organized system." That is not different from what the provost marshal is now. There must be an officer who shall devote himself exclusively to this business, aided by a well-organized system extending over the country. He says:

"I think the officer best fitted for that position by his experience during the present war is General Fry, and would recommend that the whole subject of recruiting be put in his hands, and all officers on recruiting duty be directed to report to him."

He then goes a step further, and proposes to confer upon this officer everything relating to the apprehension of deserters.

I think, under these circumstances, his recommending the creation of a distinct system at the head of which was to be put this officer, whose exclusive duty it should be to take care of recruiting and desertions, justified the committee in supposing that it was equivalent to a recommendation for a distinct feature in the administration of the War Department by which these objects should be accomplished and these measures carried out.

I say this as I felt it was due to the committee, or a majority of the committee, in justification of their action in making this Provost Marshal's Bureau a part of the military system.

The House may differ from us; I think they do. But I am not at all sollicitous about this. I am not disposed to regard it in the light of a pet measure, however any one may be sharpened in opposition to it.

But, Mr. Speaker, I will add that the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] should be adopted, or something should be inserted in the bill to continue this bureau in order to finish up the business of the war. If you strike out this section you ought to put in some provision for six months or some other time, such as will prevent the bureau closing at a loss to the Government and a derangement of the military system so far as the trust reposed heretofore in that office is concerned.

I now demand the previous question.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I ask the gentleman to withdraw the call for the previous question.

Mr. SCHENCK. I will if the gentleman will renew it.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I will.

Mr. Speaker, having served under the orders of the Provost Marshal General in the discharge of the duties of a mustering and disbursing officer in the State of Indiana, and having had personal opportunities to know the importance of that system, I feel I should not have discharged my duty to myself, to my State, nor to this House if I should remain silent until this vote was taken without saying a word in regard to the manner in which the duties of the Provost Marshal General have been discharged in respect to that State. I desire to say that in the administration of the officer in charge of that department, I never did hear any charge made against the efficiency, against the promptness, against the success of the officer in charge of that department, but, on the contrary, and I say it with pleasure, the duties of that office were performed with evidence of the highest ability and the greatest satisfaction. During the time I had an opportunity of serving under that officer, a large amount of recruits were raised, both to fill up old regiments and to create new regiments, with a success which did not attend the service when another officer was in charge of that department. I take pleasure, without entering into the controversy, if I may so call it, regarding that system in this House and in regard to the duties and services of that high officer, to say to-day that I bear testimony to the highest ability of that officer in the full discharge of these duties.

I will take up but a moment more. What will be the effect of striking out the section of the bill which proposes to continue that office as it is now? It will be nothing more than to turn the duties of that office back to the Adjutant General's department. We did nothing more in the creation of that bureau than to detail an officer from the War Department to perform its duty. By striking out that from the bill you will turn it back to the Adjutant General's department. What will then be done? The War Department will detail the same officer, bearing the same rank, receiving the same pay, with the same assistants, for that purpose. I cannot, therefore, see much economy in taking the bureau from the position it now occupies.

I renew the demand for the previous question.

Mr. SCHENCK. I think the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] limiting the time, if the section is to be stricken out, ought to be made a part of the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the next section, as follows:

SEC. 21. And be it further enacted, That the medical department of the Army shall hereafter consist of one surgeon general, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a brigadier general; one assistant surgeon general, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a colonel of cavalry; eighty surgeons, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of majors of cavalry; one hundred and sixty assistant surgeons, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of first lieutenants of cavalry for the first three years' service, and with the rank, pay, and emoluments of captains of cavalry after three years' service; and five medical storekeepers, with the same compensation as is now provided by law; and at least two thirds of the original vacancies in the grades of surgeon and assistant surgeon shall be filled by selection from among the persons who have served as staff or regimental surgeons or assistant surgeons of volunteers in the Army of the United States two years during the late war, and one third from similar officers of the regular Army; and persons who have served as assistant surgeons three years in the volunteer service shall be eligible for promotion to the grade of captain.

Mr. CONKLING. I move to amend this section by inserting after the word "selection" the words "by competitive examination." I do not wish to argue it because it argues itself, so far as it is susceptible of argument. As the section stands now, very likely that is the design.

Mr. SCHENCK. Does the gentleman intend any change in the present mode of examination, which is, to note the degree of excellence and select from those who stand highest?

Mr. CONKLING. If that is the mode, then it accomplishes what I supposed was intended. In one of the Senate bills these words were retained. The chairman of the committee seems to think it is all right.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. General PAINE has an amendment which I think the House will probably approve, one which, if it prevails, will obviate the necessity for the next section. The amendment, I believe, is somewhere in the House. I have not been able to get it and offer it as he requested.

Mr. HALE. I have the amendment which the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PAINE] wished to propose, and I offer it on his behalf. I will not argue it.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

"In section twenty-one, line five, after the word 'cavalry,' insert the following:
Two chief medical purveyors, and five assistant medical purveyors, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of lieutenant colonels of cavalry, who shall give the same bonds which are or may be required of assistant paymasters general of like grade, and shall, when not acting as purveyors, be assignable to duty as surgeons by the President.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. WENTWORTH. Will my friend yield to me one moment to give a notice?

Mr. SCHENCK. Yes, sir.

EVENING BUSINESS.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I give notice to the House, and also to the Speaker, that to-night during the pendency of the Pacific railroad bill I shall call for the rigid enforcement of the rules of the House in respect to the lobby. It is getting to be a large and powerful institution. I think we can run the machine alone. I give the doorkeepers notice.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I would ask whether it is the intention to take a vote on the Pacific railroad bill to-night.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope there will be no attempt to do business unless there is a quorum present.

Mr. PRICE. In answer to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] I will say that that is the intention.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I am very sorry to hear the gentleman state that it is the intention to obtain a vote on this measure to-night, a measure which I undertake to say is of more importance than any which will come before this House, involving $60,000,000 and an amount of land so great that—

Several MEMBERS. "Order!" "Order!"

REORGANIZATION OF THE ARMY—AGAIN.

Mr. SCHENCK. I gave way to allow the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WENTWORTH] to give a notice to the House, and not for a debate. I must resume the floor.

The amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HALE] in behalf of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PAINE] fixes the number of officers who may be detailed as medical purveyors, as provided for in the twenty-second section; but it transfers them to this twenty-first section, making them responsible bonded officers. There is a propriety in this, because there is very considerable trust reposed in these officers; and there has been a very great deal of abuse, leading to trouble, in the Surgeon General's department arising from the proceedings of detailed medical purveyors.

I wish the House to understand that if this amendment to the twenty-first section shall prevail, I shall move to strike out the twenty-second section.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. I demand the previous question on the section, with the pending amendment.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered, being upon the amendment offered by Mr. HALE.

The question was put, and there were—ayes 54, noes 21; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. HALE and ROSS were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 70, noes 25.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The twenty-second section was then read, as follows:

SEC. 22. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of War may detail a surgeon as chief medical purveyor, who, while performing such duty, shall be in charge of the principal purchasing and issuing depot of medical supplies, and shall have the rank, pay, and emoluments of a colonel of cavalry; and the Secretary of War may in like manner detail not to exceed five medical officers as assistant medical purveyors, who, while performing such duty in the different geographical divisions or departments, shall have the rank, pay, and emoluments of lieutenant colonels of cavalry.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move that that section be stricken out.

The motion was agreed to.

The twenty-third section was then read, as follows:

SEC. 23. And be it further enacted, That the pay department of the Army shall hereafter consist of one paymaster general, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a brigadier general; two assistant paymaster generals, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of colonels of cavalry; two assistant paymaster generals, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of lieutenant colonels of cavalry; and forty paymasters, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of majors of cavalry; and the original vacancies in the grade of major shall be filled by selections from those persons who have served faithfully as paymasters or additional paymasters in the Army of the United States in the late war. And hereafter no graduate of the United States Military Academy, being at the time in the Army of the United States, or having been at any time for three years next preceding, shall be eligible to appointment as an officer in the pay department.

Mr. THAYER. I move to amend that section by adding thereto the following:

But this provision shall not extend to graduates of West Point now in the pay department.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs to move to amend this section by striking out in line seven the word "forty," and inserting "fifty" in lieu thereof. Sixty were asked for and are still asked for, but the committee determined upon forty. But the committee have instructed me now to move to strike out "forty" and insert "fifty," and in explanation of that determination I will simply ask to have read a communication from General Brice, the head of that department.

I know, sir, that the heads of departments are very apt to ask for all they think they can get, but I know of no man on whose good sense and clearness of judgment I would more rely than upon that of General Brice.

I give to the House his opinion in reference to this matter by having his letter read. I ask the Clerk to read it.

The Clerk read, as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
PAYMASTER GENERAL'S OFFICE,
WASHINGTON, April 16, 1866.

SIR: In compliance with your request, I have the honor to suggest the reasons for my conviction that the number of paymasters (forty) provided in your bill for the reorganization of the Army is quite insufficient for the necessities of the service. After a full consideration of the subject, I am well convinced that a less number than the one fixed in the Senate bill (sixty) will prove inadequate—an unsafe allowance.

Our troops are now being disposed of in the establishment of small posts all over the public domain on both slopes of the Rocky mountains. From the head waters of the Missouri river down the plains and through the mountain passes to the intersection of the south line of the United States with the Colorado river. On the upper Mississippi, in the expanse of Indian country lying between the waters of the Mississippi and Missouri rivers, extending north almost to the line of the British possessions. Then, on the Pacific slope, from Los Angeles, in California, to the upper confines of Washington Territory.

Our Army establishment proposed is to be fourfold larger than before the war, and with probably three times as many military posts as ever heretofore existed in the history of the country. Most of these latter are in the ranges of the Indians, where travel overland by paymasters with money must of necessity be under the protection of military escorts. I am sure that no one in the service has had more varied and abundant experience in that sort of locomotion than I have had. For the most part of ten years I was engaged in paying troops in New Mexico, Arizona, western Texas, and on the plains of the West north of the Arkansas river and extending up to Fort Randall, on the upper Missouri river.

Such traveling has to be done with wagons to carry the supplies for the party, including the escort, embracing subsistence, camp equipage, cooking utensils, &c. A train of this character can only make twenty to thirty miles per day, and where it is not practicable to carry or procure forage for the animals even a less distance is made per day from the necessity of giving ample time for the animals to graze.

It will be readily seen from this how slow is locomotion on the plains when large sums of money are at stake and must be protected; and how little can be accomplished in a given time by a single paymaster under such circumstances.

As an instance of the past: when Fort Laramie was our extreme western post this side of the Rocky mountains, with only one (Fort Kearney) intermediate between that and Fort Leavenworth, each two-company posts, a paymaster supplied with funds at Leavenworth set out to pay the four companies stationed respectively at Kearney and Laramie—the distance to the latter from Leavenworth seven hundred and thirty miles. Here is the result:

	Days.
Going 730 miles, at 20 miles per day.....	36
Returning.....	36
Paying, refitting, and other unavoidable delays...	4
Total.....	76

Thus, to pay only four companies situated as described, starting from the nearest point where money was available, required two and one half months of time. Suppose the most favorable condition of things, and this time could not be reduced to less than two months.

It may be thought that escorts and trains are expensive appliances for the mere conveyance of paymasters in the execution of their duties; but properly considered they are not so. The transportation material is necessarily kept on hand at the proper depots to meet the various exigencies of the service, and it is as well employed as idle.

So of the troops used as escorts. Nothing is added to the current expenses of the Government, while the moral effect, upon the Indians, of these frequent excursions through their country is unquestionably salutary.

If before the war, with an average of twelve thousand men, twenty-five paymasters were scarcely sufficient for the demand, is it not reasonable to calculate that with a force of fifty to seventy thousand, and with the number of stations from two to three times increased, that sixty paymasters are not too many?

I treat of a subject entirely familiar to me in making my estimate. And I much question if future experience does not demonstrate that estimate to be short rather than in excess of the demand.

I beg to recur to another point in yours as well as the Senate bill which I venture to suggest needs amendment.

Your twenty-third section provides, "that the pay department of the Army shall hereafter consist of one paymaster general, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a brigadier general," &c. Now, why is it not better that it read thus: that the paymaster general shall have the rank, pay, &c., of a brigadier general, and that the pay department of the Army shall hereafter consist of such paymaster general, two assistant paymaster generals, &c.

Your phraseology used will result in making a vacancy in the office of paymaster general, the present incumbent holding only the rank of colonel.

Now, as that incumbent has exercised the functions of the office for near two years and through the most important and difficult era of its history, if there is entertained no purpose to require him to give place to another, then the act of legislating him out of service can only embarrass while serving no good end. He was only very recently confirmed as Paymaster General, and without opposition.

The act passing in its present form, as to the action in question, and to take effect from its passage, there will be an inter regnum during the time required for the action of the appointing power and the Senate, which will likely embrace days, perhaps weeks, as all the vacancies made under that section will likely be prepared and sent up in one list.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

B. W. BRICE,

Paymaster General.

Hon. ROBERT C. SCHENCK, Chairman Military Committee House of Representatives.

The question was taken on Mr. SCHENCK's amendment; and there were—ayes 51, noes 21; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. GRINNELL and BOYER were appointed.

Mr. ROSS demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SCHENCK. I suppose if we adjourn now the yeas and nays can be taken to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. If the House is in session at half past four o'clock, it will, under the order of yesterday, take a recess until half past seven o'clock. If it adjourns before that time, it will be to meet to-morrow at twelve o'clock.

Mr. SCHENCK. If that is to be the effect of a motion to adjourn now, then I will not make it.

Mr. ROSS. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. PRICE. Cannot the House now take a recess by unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. A recess can be taken now by unanimous consent; or a motion to take a recess until half past seven o'clock would be in order.

Mr. SPALDING. I move that the House now take a recess.

The SPEAKER. The motion to adjourn takes precedence.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I call the yeas and nays upon the motion to adjourn.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 26, nays 71, not voting 86; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bergen, Boyer, Chanler, Delano, Eldridge, Finck, Glosbrenner, Griswold, Hale, Aaron Harding, Hayes, Chester D. Hubbard, Latham, Marshall, Marston, Nicholson, Ritter, Ross, Shunklin, Spaulding, Taber, Thayer, Thornton, Elihu B. Washburne, Williams, and Wright—26.

Thomas, Trimble, Van Aernam, Ward, Henry D. Washburn, Stephen F. Wilson, and Winfield—86.

So the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

During the roll-call,

Mr. BROOMALL announced that Mr. STARR was detained from the House by sickness.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York, announced that Mr. PAINE was detained from the House on account of sickness.

The result of the vote was stated as above.

CAPTURE OF BOOTH AND HAROLD.

The SPEAKER. A communication was received a few days since from the Secretary of War in relation to the rewards for the capture of the assassins Booth and Harold, which should go to the Committee on Appropriations. It was laid upon the table at the time it was received. If there is no objection it will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

No objection was made, and it was referred accordingly.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled an act (H. R. No. 500) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriation for the public printing for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1866; when the Speaker signed the same.

The hour of half past four o'clock having arrived,

The House, pursuant to an order adopted yesterday, took a recess till half past seven o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The House reassembled at half past seven o'clock p. m.

DUTY ON LIVE ANIMALS.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill imposing a duty on live animals imported from foreign countries, and that it be acted upon by the House at this time. If there is a single objection, I will not press it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Is any business in order this evening but reports from the Committee on the Pacific Railroad?

The SPEAKER. Only by unanimous consent. The House is now acting the same as it is in a day session when considering a special order.

Mr. MORRILL. I will state briefly the necessity for the passage of this bill. When the reciprocity treaty expired we failed to pass any bill on the subject; and, therefore, now have no duties upon live animals, whether imported from Canada or from any other country. I am informed that at the present time the owners of sheep upon the other side of the line are driving them over into the United States, and having them kept, proposing that they shall remain here until after they are shorn, when of course they can be driven back. They may thus be able to introduce wool into this country without the payment of any duty.

Mr. JENCKES. Does not the order of business for this evening's session preclude the consideration of any other business except reports from the Committee on the Pacific Railroad?

The SPEAKER. It does not, unless objection is made.

Mr. JENCKES. I object to any other business.

LAND-GRANT RAILROADS.

Mr. PRICE. Three weeks ago yesterday I reported, by direction of the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, Senate bill No. 83, entitled "An act to extend the time for completing certain land-grant railroads in the States therein named." That bill was ordered to be printed, and was made the special order for the Monday following—two weeks ago yesterday. We find that there are several inaccuracies in the printed bill; and under the instruction of the committee, I now move that the bill be recommitted to the committee.

Mr. KASSON. I have prepared a substitute for this bill. I desire that it shall be printed, and referred to the same committee.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. On the motion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PRICE] I call for a division. I have no objection to this bill going to the committee; but I protest against business being done to-night without a quorum.

On the motion to recommit the bill, there were—ayes 20, noes 3; no quorum voting.

Mr. WINDOM. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 68, nays 0, not voting 115; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Ancona, Delos R. Ashley, Banks, Beaman, Bidwell, Bingham, Broomall, Bundy, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Darling, Dawes, Dixon, Dodge, Eggleston, Eliot, Ferry, Finck, Grider, Grinnell, Hale, Abner C. Harding, Henderson, Asahel W. Hubbard, Hulburt, Jenckes, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Kelso, Ketcham, Latham, Loan, Longyear, Marshall, Marvin, McClure, McRuer, Mercer, Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Morris, Moulton, Newell, Niblack, O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Price, William H. Randall, John H. Rice, Ritter, Ross, Stevens, Francis Thomas, Trowbridge, Upson, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Wentworth, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—68.

NAYS—0.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Anderson, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Barker, Baxter, Benjamin, Bergen, Blaine, Blow, Boutwell, Boyer, Brandegee, Broomwell, Buckland, Chanler, Reader W. Thomas, Thornton, Trimble, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, Warner, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, Whaley, Williams, Winfield, and Wright—115.

The SPEAKER stated that no quorum had voted.

During the roll-call,

Mr. LATHAM stated that Mr. ELDRIDGE was detained from the House by sickness in his family.

The result having been announced as above stated,

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, moved a call of the House, and on that motion called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 71, nays 13, not voting 99; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Ancona, Delos R. Ashley, Baker, Banks, Baxter, Bergen, Bidwell, Boyer, Broomall, Buckland, Bundy, Cobb, Cook, Darling, Dawes, Delano, Dixon, Dodge, Donnelly, Eggleston, Eliot, Ferry, Finck, Grinnell, Hale, Abner C. NAYS—Messrs. Benjamin, Holmes, Hulburt, Jenckes, Latham, Marshall, Marvin, Mercer, Newell, Niblack, Ritter, Rogers, and Ross—13.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Anderson, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Barker, Benjamin, Bingham, Blaine, Blow, Boutwell, Brandegee, Broomwell, Chanler, Reader W. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbard, James H. Hubbard, James Humphrey, James M. Humphrey, Ingersoll, Johnson, Jones, Kerr, Kuykendall, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, LeBlond, Lynch, Marston, McCullough, McIndoe, McKee, Morris, Noell, Paine, Phelps, Pike, Plants, Pomeroy, Radford, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, Rollins, Rousseau, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shunklin, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Sloan, Starr, Stilwell, Strouse, Taylor, John L. Thomas, Thornton, Trimble, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Ward, Warner, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, Whaley, Williams, Winfield, and Wright—99.

So a call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk then proceeded to call the roll, and the following members failed to answer to their names:

Messrs. Alley, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Barker, Benjamin, Blaine, Blow, Boutwell, Brandegee, Broomwell, Chanler, Reader W. Clarke, Coffroth, Conkling, Cullom, Culver, Davis, Dawson, Defrees, Deming, Denison, Dumont, Eckley, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Glosbrenner, Goodyear, Griswold, Aaron Harding, Harris, Hart, Hayes, Hill, Hogan, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Chester D. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbard, James H. Hubbard, James Humphrey, Ingersoll, Johnson, Jones, Kerr, Kuykendall, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, LeBlond, Lynch, McCullough, McIndoe, McKee, Morris, Noell, Paine, Phelps, Pike, Plants, Pomeroy, Radford, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, Rousseau, Sawyer, Schenck, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Sloan, Starr, Stilwell, Strouse, Taylor, John L. Thomas, Thornton, Trimble, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Ward, Welker, Whaley, and Winfield.

The SPEAKER stated that ninety-eight members had answered to their names.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, moved that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to.

The question then recurred on the motion to recommit, no quorum having appeared on the last vote.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly the bill was recommitted.

Mr. KASSON. I now submit the substitute to which I referred, and move that it be printed and referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. JENCKES moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill and substitute were referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REVENUE ASSESSORS.

Mr. MILLER, by unanimous consent, moved that the bill which he introduced yesterday to allow United States revenue assessors to appoint deputies be ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

IOWA AND MISSOURI STATE LINE RAILROAD.

Mr. PRICE, from the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, reported back House bill No. 304, granting land to the Iowa and Missouri State Line Railroad Company, and for other purposes, with sundry amendments.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Has the bill been printed?

Mr. PRICE. It has.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. But not the amendments.

Mr. PRICE. They are few.

Mr. WRIGHT. This is another of the gift enterprises. [Laughter.]

The bill was read.

First amendment:

Page 5, section four, in lines six and seven, strike out the words "the point where it may strike the Missouri river," and insert in lieu thereof, "Nebraska City;" so that it will read:

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That for the purpose of enabling said Iowa and Missouri State Line Railroad Company to effect a connection with the Union Pacific railroad or any branch thereof, at a point not further west than the one hundredth meridian of west longitude, the said company is hereby authorized to extend its line from Nebraska City to some point to be selected by it within the limitation above prescribed, upon the same terms and conditions, and with the like aid and privileges, that are granted to the Burlington and Missouri River Railroad Company by sections eighteen, nineteen, and twenty of an act in relation to the construction of a railroad and telegraph line to the Pacific ocean, approved July 2, 1864: Provided, That no lands in this section granted shall be taken from any grants or reservations heretofore made by the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

Second amendment:

Page 2, line twenty-two, after the word "to" insert "not further than twenty miles from said road, and not including alternate sections reserved;" so it will read:

That, for the purpose of aiding the Iowa and Missouri State Line Railroad Company (the same being a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Iowa) to construct and operate a railroad on or near the State line of Iowa and Missouri, between the Mississippi and Missouri rivers, or to connect with the Des Moines Valley railroad at or near Farmington, in the State of Iowa, running thence to and along the said State line, as near as practicable, to some point on the east bank of the Missouri river, there is hereby granted to said railroad company every alternate section of land, designated by odd numbers, to the extent of ten sections per mile on each side of said road; but in case it shall appear that the United States have, when the line of said road is definitely located, sold any section, or any part thereof, granted as aforesaid, or that the right of preemption or homestead settlement has attached to the same, or that the same has been reserved by the United States for any purpose whatever, then it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to cause to be selected for the purposes aforesaid, from the public lands of the United States nearest to, and not further than twenty miles from said road and not including alternate sections reserved, the sections above specified, so much land as shall be equal to the amount to such lands as the United States have sold, reserved, or otherwise appropriated, or to which the right of homestead settlement or preemption has attached as aforesaid, which lands, thus indicated by the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, shall be reserved and held for the use of said company by the said Secretary for the purpose of the construction and operation of said railroad, as provided by this act, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Third amendment:

Add to the fourth section:

And the said company may also form a connection with Brownsville, on the Missouri river, upon the same terms, and with the aid hereinbefore mentioned, but the lands granted by this section shall not be selected within eight miles of the southern boundary of the Territory of Nebraska; and no lands shall be selected under a grant heretofore made to aid in the construction of the extension of the Burlington and Missouri River railroad within eight miles of said southern boundary of the Territory of Nebraska.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PRICE. This bill, Mr. Speaker, proposes a grant of lands, if there are any unoccupied, to a railroad on the southern line of Iowa, running to the Missouri river. The company has been organized and is building the road.

They ask for the passage of this bill, not so much for the lands they get, because there are but few lands there that are not taken, but because it will aid them some in the way of credit. The parties who are more immediately interested in this in Missouri, Iowa, Nebraska, and Kansas have no objection to the bill as reported by the committee, I believe. I think I have seen all the gentlemen who represent those States and Territories I have named, and they are willing that the bill should pass as reported. It passed the committee after thorough examination without a dissenting vote, and I did not suppose there would be any opposition to it in the House, or I should not have reported it at this time.

Mr. SPALDING. I desire to ask a question. I desire to know how long this railroad may be?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. It will be about two hundred and fifty miles in length.

Mr. SPALDING. And it takes ten sections of land on each side for each mile of the road.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. On paper it looks as if it would take ten sections on each side, but I will state that owing to the lands having been sold and granted to other companies this company cannot, by any possibility, receive under this bill to exceed forty thousand acres. I do not think they can find over twenty thousand.

Mr. SPALDING. Is there not a provision in it that enables the companies, where the Government lands are already taken, to locate the sections somewhere else?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. No, sir; it confines them to the strip of twenty miles.

Mr. SPALDING. Twenty miles each way.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. This road runs through one of the most densely settled portions of Iowa, where the lands have almost entirely been sold, and it is only here and there that a piece remains undisposed of.

And I will state further, that if any company is entitled to receive aid from the Government this is one, and for this reason: it is a company which is not under the control of persons residing elsewhere. It is controlled by the citizens of the State residing near the line of the road. And the construction is being conducted in this way: the farmers, mechanics, and citizens generally have subscribed to it, paying their subscriptions in work, in ties, in materials, and portions in money. It is for the purpose of aiding them in the completion of it that this grant is asked, and it is a very small pittance considering the magnitude of the work.

Mr. SPALDING. Does the chairman of the committee hold the floor?

Mr. PRICE. I do.

Mr. SPALDING. I ask the Speaker to recognize me to make a motion, after he is through with his remarks, to refer this bill to the Committee on Public Lands, for I think we ought to know something about the amount of land that is to be taken by this bill.

Mr. HIGBY. I ask the chairman of the committee if this company is working under an act of Congress.

Mr. PRICE. I will yield to my colleague through whose district this road runs to reply.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. In reply to the gentleman's question I will state that this company is not organized under any act of Congress. We have in the State of Iowa no special charters; the companies are all organized under the general corporation law. This one is organized under that law. It is the only company which has been organized for the purpose of constructing a road through the section of the State through which this road is to pass, and it is in accordance with the laws of Iowa. It is a corporation that is entirely satisfactory to the people of that State, a corporation which is indorsed by all those who are interested directly in the construction of this road and in the development of the country through which it will pass, and there can be no objection to it on that ground.

Mr. KASSON. I would ask my colleague to yield to me a moment of his time to offer an amendment.

Mr. PRICE. I cannot yield for an amendment.

Mr. KASSON. I will state to my colleague why I want this amendment adopted more fully than I have done. This proposed railroad runs about one hundred and forty miles through my district, and consequently my constituents are deeply interested in it. Under these circumstances I ask him if it is not proper for him to yield to me.

Mr. PRICE. Certainly. I have no objections to the gentleman's offering his amendment. I have three colleagues, all of whose districts run down to the Missouri river, and all of whom are interested in this bill; but I cannot yield for an amendment that will kill the bill.

Mr. KASSON. I think that when my colleague hears the amendment he will see that it does not kill the bill, but that on the contrary it will meet the approbation of the House.

My first amendment is to add the following proviso:

And provided further, That no lands shall be at any time patented to said company which are situated more than twenty miles westward of the terminus of the said railroad at the time the patents are issued.

I will state the reason why I ask my colleague to accept this amendment. There is but a limited amount of land to be had. Without this limitation, prohibiting the anticipation of lands situate at a distance, the effect of the general grant would be to exhaust all the lands, some one hundred and fifty miles ahead of the road, to aid in building the first twenty miles. If the road should then stop in the first district, all the lands situate in my district would be applied to build the road before it reaches my district at all. I cannot consent to this, without giving away to others the means that should be applied to aid the road in my district. This amendment prevents drawing land more than twenty miles west of the terminus at the time.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I think there is no objection to that amendment.

Mr. DELANO. I cannot understand exactly what is going on here. Let me make an inquiry. I desire to know what is the western terminus of this road.

Mr. KASSON. It is proposed to begin at or near Farmington, in Van Buren county, Iowa, where it connects with the railroad to Keokuk, connecting there with other roads leading to the Des Moines valley. My colleague from the first district stated here the amount of lands which should be granted, in which I concur, that it would not probably be more than fifty thousand acres. The people of that region of the country are very much interested in this road and are doing all they can to promote the enterprise by calling meetings and entering into subscriptions.

Mr. DELANO. Where do you expect to obtain the lands if you do not find them within ten miles of the road?

Mr. KASSON. My colleague who is upon the committee can answer that question better than I can.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. They are confined to twenty miles of the road.

Mr. KASSON. That seems to me a very reasonable limitation.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KASSON. I move to add the following as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That the lands hereby granted shall be opened to preemption, settlement, and purchase under the laws of the United States until certified to and actually sold to a bona fide settler by the company building the railroad herein provided, as fully as if this grant was not made: provided, That the price of such purchase shall be $2.50 per acre, and such purchase money shall be specially accounted for to the Treasury of the United States, and shall be paid to the railroad company whenever it would become entitled to such lands if unsold.

Mr. PRICE. I accept that amendment.

Mr. KASSON. The reason for that amendment is that it is necessary in order that settlement of these western lands shall not be retarded by any great land monopoly.

Mr. JULIAN. Will the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PRICE] allow me to make a statement in regard to this bill?

Mr. PRICE. For how long?

Mr. JULIAN. Two or three minutes will be enough.

Mr. PRICE. I will yield for three minutes.

Mr. JULIAN. There is a novelty in this bill which I wish the House to understand. Up to this time the policy of the Government has been uniform, with, I believe, the single exception of the grants to the Pacific railroad, where the nationality of the measure made it impossible to make the grant to a State. The uniform policy has been in favor of grants to the State in trust for a particular company to do the work. Now, I object to the innovation which this bill seeks to make in our policy as unsafe, as making us embark in a line of policy at variance with the whole legislation of the past, a line of policy upon which we better not enter.

Now, I hope that this bill, which ought to have gone in the first place to the Committee on Public Lands, may now be referred to that committee, so that it may be examined, the extent of the grant ascertained, and the propriety of departing from the old policy of the Government fully considered.

I know that there were two or three cases in the last Congress in which grants were made directly to companies, but they were companies which the State Legislatures had previously designated as the fit instruments for executing the trust.

Mr. PRICE. I will yield to my colleague [Mr. Wilson] now.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I rise to a point of order, though it may be too late for me to raise it now. I would like to inquire of the Speaker how this bill came before the Pacific Railroad Committee at all.

Mr. PRICE. It was referred to the committee by the House.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I wish, then, to make this point of order: that is, that the Pacific Railroad Committee have no right under the rules of the House to report a grant of land for any road not a part of the Pacific railroad.

Mr. PRICE. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] is slightly mistaken in that.

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides, in the first place, that the point of order is raised too late. In the second place, the Committee on the Pacific Railroad is authorized expressly by the rule to consider any matter relating to any land-grant railroad between the Mississippi valley and the Pacific coast that may be referred to them.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. That means, of course, any railroad extending from the Mississippi valley to the Pacific coast.

The SPEAKER. The rule says nothing about the termini of the railroad; only that it must be located between the Mississippi valley and the Pacific coast.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I think the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JULIAN] is slightly mistaken in relation to the legislation to which he has referred. The grant of land made by Congress in 1856 to the State of Iowa for the purpose of aiding in the construction of these several lines of railroad from the Mississippi river to the Missouri river was not made to the State in trust for such companies as it might name; but the companies were named in the act of Congress making the grant.

Now, we had a great deal of difficulty in Iowa growing out of that grant, and I believe the people of the State will be better satisfied to have the grant made directly to the company than to have it thrown into the State Legislature. And more than that, in 1863 Congress made an additional grant of land to the three companies embraced in the act of 1856, and that grant in the legislation of 1863 was made directly to the company, and this bill is following the precedent then established.

Mr. JULIAN. Had not the Legislature of the State previously designated the companies named in the act of 1863?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Those companies were designated under the act of 1856.

Mr. JULIAN. Which was a grant to the State.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. That was a grant to the State; but Congress afterward granted the lands directly to the company.

Now, I will state to the gentleman, also, that under the legislation of the State of Iowa and the articles of incorporation adopted by this company the company is as much designated by the State of Iowa for the construction of this road as the other companies were for the construction of the other road. Under the general incorporation law of the State, this company organized for that purpose; and it therefore has an authorization under the laws of the State of Iowa for the construction of that road. There are no other competing lines; no other companies have been organized; no one proposes to build a road there except this single company.

Mr. JULIAN. I desire to inquire of the gentleman whether, under the grant contained in this bill, the Legislature of Iowa will have any control over the selection of the company to do the work.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. No, sir; of course not; because under the laws of the State of Iowa that company is now authorized to proceed with the work, and unless it shall abuse its franchises and powers it has the right to go on and construct the road. It can only be deprived of its powers by a judicial proceeding in which the company shall be found to have abused its powers.

Mr. JULIAN. Suppose the company should fail to do the work.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PRICE. I now yield the floor for three minutes to my colleague, [Mr. GRINNELL.]

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I should like to have read the act of incorporation of this company. I would like to know to whom we are giving these lands.

Mr. GRINNELL. I will yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania after I get through.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot entertain the amendment which has been offered unless the point of order be waived as to its involving an appropriation. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Iowa contemplates an appropriation, and would make the bill an appropriation bill. That amendment, therefore, is not in order for consideration in the House unless by unanimous consent.

Mr. BENJAMIN. If unanimous consent is required, I object.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. What is the amendment?

The SPEAKER. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa provides that the Government of the United States may sell these lands, put the money into the Treasury of the United States, and pay that money out of the Treasury to this company. Such an amendment would make this an appropriation bill, and therefore it could not be considered in the House except by unanimous consent.

Mr. KASSON. I would like to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that the amendment does not propose an appropriation of money in the Treasury. It is a simple proposition for the substitution of the money for the land when the land shall be sold.

The SPEAKER. It has been ruled uniformly that any bill which by its own force will have the effect to take money out of the Treasury is an appropriation bill, even if the money is to be paid in and paid out afterward.

Mr. KASSON. I ask the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BENJAMIN] not to insist on his objection.

The SPEAKER. If there is no objection the amendment will be entertained.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I ask the gentleman from Iowa to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. PRICE. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I am opposed to this bill in its present shape. As has been stated, it is a grant to a railroad company in the State of Iowa. This road passes near the line of the State of Missouri. I suppose there is not much land in the State of Missouri that will go to this company under this grant; but I apprehend there is some; how much I am not able to say. It does not matter, however, whether it is more or less. Here is a railroad company chartered by the State of Iowa. It becomes the owner of land in the State of Missouri to hold for all time to come so far as the State of Missouri is concerned. The State of Missouri will have no control over this company. It cannot by its legislation control a company that is chartered and controlled by the Legislature of the State of Iowa. This of itself should be sufficient to defeat the bill.

Mr. PRICE. I now yield three minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I desire to know to whom we are giving these lands. I find this bill is for the purpose of aiding the Iowa and Missouri State Line Railroad Company (the same being a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Iowa) to construct and operate a railroad. I should like to have that act of incorporation read, so that we may know who are these parties and what are the powers they possess. It may be that we are giving lands to this company not located within the boundaries of Iowa, and putting those lands under the control of Iowa, which would be a wrong thing for this Congress to do. I want to know how much land is proposed to be granted. It occurs to me we should know that. I hope that the motion of my friend from Ohio, [Mr. SPALDING,] to refer this bill to the Committee on Public Lands will be adopted, so that we may vote understandingly. As it is now we are all groping in the dark.

Mr. PRICE. I will answer the gentleman's questions, and I ask his attention and that of others who may have the same objections. This company is organized under the general laws of the State of Iowa, and not under special charter, for the purpose of constructing a railroad along the southern tier of counties of that State to the Missouri river. This is to aid in the construction of that road without regard to the organization of a company whatever. That is all there is of it.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Does not this proposition donate land not situated in the State of Iowa to this corporation?

Mr. PRICE. Not that I know of.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Unquestionably it does.

Mr. PRICE. That point has been guarded by the amendments which have been adopted by the House.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. It says it shall go forty miles.

Mr. PRICE. If the gentleman had listened to the amendments he would have known that has been guarded.

Mr. KASSON. I move my amendment in a modified form, so as to bring it within the rule.

Mr. MORRILL. I know when land grants have been made to certain States, and it was found they were not enough, they have come back and asked us to make up the deficiency in other quarters. I desire to know what guarantee we have this company will not come here and ask for other land.

Mr. PRICE. I do not think we have a guarantee that these men will not do a great.

many things for the next fifty years. I do not know whether they will ask for more lands; but if they do, there are no more.

Mr. DAWES. It is the last bite. [Laughter.]

Mr. GRINNELL. A friend of mine on the other side, though differing in politics, just came to me and remarked, "I want to appeal to the honest member from Iowa to know how this matter stands." I replied we were taking a great deal of time over a simple thing. I will ask the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. JULIAN,] who is so much troubled about this great grant of lands, what it is, really. Some twenty or thirty thousand acres of land, of refuse lands, which even Missouri "Pukes" would not take up, and has been in the market for years at a few cents an acre.

Mr. EGGLESTON. Then why do you want them?

Mr. GRINNELL. Let the company take them, and see what they can do with them by draining and otherwise.

Mr. EGGLESTON. What does this company want with these poor refuse lands?

Mr. GRINNELL. They want to have a variety to show my friend's constituents when they come there, bad lands as well as good lands. This road passes through a county in my district; and the people are making great sacrifices for what they need. Let us vote, and help a noble enterprise.

Mr. RICE, of Maine. I ask leave to move the following:

Provided further, That the lands granted by this bill shall not exceed forty thousand acres.

Mr. PRICE. I do not yield to that amendment.

Mr. HALE. I wish to ask the chairman of the Pacific Railroad Committee whether under the fourth section of this bill this company may not connect their western terminus with the Union Pacific road, or one of its branches, by a north and south road, instead of a road running westerly? I notice that the section specifies no eastern limit of the point of junction with the Pacific road, but a western limit only. I do not understand that it is our policy to grant lands to enable these companies to build north and south roads.

Mr. PRICE. I do not think that can happen under the bill as amended. I demand the previous question.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 35, noes 58.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I demand tellers. Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. PRICE and SPALDING were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 47, noes 57.

So the previous question was not seconded.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I have no remarks to make. I am satisfied that this bill has got a large majority of friends in this House, and if it could be sent to a proper committee and put in a proper shape, I believe that this House will give the State of Iowa for this purpose any amount of land she asks for. I now move that it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and on that I demand the previous question.

Mr. KASSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WENTWORTH. I insist upon the demand. I do as the gentlemen did; they would not let me speak. [Laughter.]

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the motion was agreed to.

Mr. WENTWORTH moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. PRICE. I am instructed by the Committee on the Pacific Railroad to report back House bill No. 414, to secure the speedy construction of the Northern Pacific railroad and telegraph line and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes, with an amendment, and with a recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was read.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I rise to a point of order. This is an appropriation bill, being a pledge of the credit of the United States Government to pay certain interest money and pay the principal in case of the failure of the company.

Mr. PRICE. I would like to say a word on that.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman before he decides it.

Mr. PRICE. The gentleman makes the point that this is an appropriation bill because it provides that the Government shall pay from the Treasury certain sums of money. I have not the bill before me, but I do not think such language as that is to be found in the bill. It only provides that the Government shall guaranty the payment of certain sums of money.

Mr. SPALDING. When the first twenty-five miles are completed we have to pay $47,000.

Mr. PRICE. No, sir.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Read two or three lines of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa desires to say a few words before the Chair decides the question.

Mr. PRICE. I maintain that the point of order is not well taken because this bill only guaranties the payment in a certain contingency which may never arise. It is a guarantee in the happening of a contingency, and until that arises there is no money to be paid. There is no appropriation made for the payment of money.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I beg pardon; the Speaker will see from the very language of the bill that it is an appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The bill pledges the "credit of the United States, in such form as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe, to the payment of the interest of the stock of the said company from the date of issue of the same, and for a period not exceeding twenty years from the date of said issue, at the rate of six per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually on the 1st days of July and January in each and every year, in the legal currency of the United States, at the Treasury of the United States." The second section provides that certain moneys shall "be applied by the Secretary of the Treasury to reimburse the Government for any moneys paid for interest as aforesaid."

Mr. BINGHAM. I beg leave to suggest whether it is not very apparent that not one dollar of interest can ever be paid without an act of appropriation subsequently passed by Congress.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman please point out what part of the bill so declares?

Mr. BINGHAM. The language of the bill is, "to pledge the credit of the United States in such form as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe to the payment of the interest of the stock of the said company for a period not exceeding twenty years from the date of said issue, at the rate of six per cent. per annum payable semi-annually." That is a pledge of the credit of the United States. What then? Before it can be paid there must be an appropriation passed by Congress authorizing its payment.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. There is a pledge of this payment "on the 1st days of July and January in each and every year, in the legal currency of the United States at the Treasury of the United States, or any of its depositories." If that is not an appropriation there is no language that can make an appropriation.

The SPEAKER. The Chair might as well decide the point of order. He is very clear in regard to it.

Mr. DELANO. I would like to say a word.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman's suggestion.

Mr. DELANO. I desire to call the attention of the Chair to the clause making provision for the use of the money that may be placed in the Treasury from the sale of the lands. It is in these words:

Shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States by the treasurer of said company on the 1st days of April and October in each and every year, to be applied by the Secretary of the Treasury to reimburse the Government for any moneys paid for interest as aforesaid.

Now, I ask whether any further legislation is necessary to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to pay out this money which is to be thus applied and which is here appropriated.

The SPEAKER. The Chair referred to that very section in his remarks.

The Chair sustains the point of order that this is an appropriation bill for the reason that by its own force it takes money out of the Treasury. This bill on every 1st of January and every 1st of July would take money out of the Treasury by its own force. There are two sections in the bill which involve appropriations.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Then I submit that the bill must go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and upon that motion I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. ROSS moved to lay the bill upon the table.

The SPEAKER. That would be acting on it in the House, although it is an appropriation bill.

Mr. ROSS. Well, I withdraw the motion.

The question being upon the motion of Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union,

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 43, nays 65, not voting 75; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ancona, Boyer, Broomall, Buckland, Cobb, Delano, Dixon, Eggleston, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Finck, Garfield, Grider, Hale, Aaron Harding, Abner C. Harding, Hayes, James R. Hubbell, James M. Humphrey, Jenckes, Latham, William Lawrence, Marston, Morrill, Nicholson, Orth, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Ritter, Ross, Schenck, Scofield, Shanklin, Shellenbarger, Sitgreaves, Spalding, Taber, Thayer, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, Wolker, Wentworth, and Williams—43.

NAYS—Messrs. Ames, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, Baker, Banks, Baxter, Beaman, Benjamin, Bergen, Bidwell, Bingham, Blow, Boutwell, Sidney Clarke, Cook, Darling, Daves, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Eliot, Ferry, Grinnell, Henderson, Higby, Holmes, Asahel W. Hubbard, Hubbard, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Kelso, Ketcham, Loan, Longyear, Lynch, Marvin, McClurg, McRuer, Mercur, Miller, Morris, Moulton, Myers, Newell, Niblack, O'Neill, Patterson, Perham, Price, John H. Rice, Rogers, Rollins, Smith, Stevens, Trowbridge, Upson, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Warner, William B. Washburn, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—65.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Allison, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Barker, Blaine, Brandegee, Broomwell Bundy, Chandler, Reader W. Clarke, Coffroth, Conkling, Cullom, Culver, Davis, Dawson, Deftrees, Denning, Denison, Dumont, Eckley, Eldridge, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Griswold, Harris, Hart, Hill, Hogan, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Chester D. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, James Humphrey, Ingersoll, Johnson, Jones, Kerr, Kuykendall, Laflin, George V. Lawrence, Le Blond, Marshall, McCullough, McIndoe, McKee, Moorhead, Neill, Paine, Phelps, Pike, Plants, Pomeroy, Radford, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, Rousseau, Sawyer, Sloan, Starr, Stilwell, Strouse, Taylor, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Thornton, Trimble, Van Arnam, Ward, Whaley, Winfield, and Wright—75.

So the House refused to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The question recurred on Mr. STEVENS's motion to recommit the bill to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad; and being put, the motion was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was recommitted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The question was put; and there were—ayes 33, noes 65.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The question recurred upon the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was recommitted; and being taken, it was not agreed to.

Mr. PRICE. I am instructed by the Committee on the Pacific Railroad to report back with amendments House bill No. 414, to secure the speedy construction of the Northern Pacific railroad and telegraph line, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes, with a recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I rise to a point of order. My point of order is that the Committee on the Pacific Railroad has not ordered any such report to be made.

Mr. PRICE. That is a question of veracity between the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURNE] and myself, which can best be settled elsewhere.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I make the point of order that the committee has had no meeting since this bill was recommitted, for the gentleman from Iowa and all his colleagues have been upon the floor of the House all the time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order. If the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PRICE] states that he is authorized by the committee to make the report, the Chair has no right to go behind his statement.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I rise to a still further point of order: that it is within the knowledge of the Chair that the bill had not been recommitted to the committee two minutes when the gentleman from Iowa stated that he had been instructed by the committee to report it back, and therefore it was utterly impossible for the committee to have had a meeting; and that the committee has had no meeting, for the members of the committee have all been in their seats here since the bill was recommitted. Therefore, it cannot be true in point of fact that the committee has ordered this bill to be reported back since it was recommitted.

The SPEAKER. The uniform rule of those who have occupied this chair is that when the chairman of a committee rises and states that he has been instructed by his committee to report a bill, that statement is assumed to be true.

The Chair has before him a precedent in the last Congress which, after the discussion, was assented to by the whole House, and no appeal was taken. It was the case of the Illinois ship-canal bill, which was reported from the Committee on Roads and Canals. The Speaker ruled that it was an appropriation bill, and it was recommitted to the Committee on Roads and Canals. The chairman of that committee, Mr. Arnold, of Illinois, arose in his place and reported the bill back, modified so that it did not contain an appropriation in it. The point of order was made that he had no right to report the bill back at that time, because it was immediately after it had been recommitted, and there had been no action upon it by the Committee on Roads and Canals since its recommitment. The point of order was overruled by the Chair, and no appeal was taken.

The House cannot determine what instructions the committee may have given their chairman. They may have instructed him to report a bill which would be acceptable to the House; or they may have given him alternate authority, to report a bill in one form or in another; or he may have had an enlarged authority over the subject. The Chair cannot determine, nor can the House determine, what authority any committee may have given its chairman. If he states that he is authorized by the committee to make a report, the Chair is bound to receive the statement as correct.

But there is the question of the reception of the report, which may be raised. The Clerk will read the rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

"If it is disputed that a report has been ordered to be made by a committee, the question of reception must be put to the House."—Barclay's Digest, page 59.

The SPEAKER. That is the only question that can be raised.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Let that question be put.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I rise to another point of order; that is, that the Committee on the Pacific Railroad has no authority to sit during the sessions of this House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains that point of order.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. This bill was recommitted during the present session of the House; and the House has continued in session all the time since the bill was recommitted.

The SPEAKER. The committee may have authorized the chairman to report an amended bill, in case the one first reported should be recommitted to them.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I believe I have the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois rises to discuss the question of the reception of the report.

Mr. PRICE. I wish to say a word in reference to this question. I have stated that I am authorized by the Committee on the Pacific Railroad to report this bill; and when I make a statement of that kind here or anywhere else, I warn gentlemen that I do not intend that my veracity shall be called in question with impunity.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Iowa that gentlemen have the right to raise these points of order.

Mr. PRICE. They have the right to ascertain what is the fact; but when the fact has been ascertained by the statement—

Mr. ROSS. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. ROSS. It is that brethren should dwell together in unity. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains that point of order. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that I have the floor, and I yield it to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. THAYER,] that he may move to adjourn.

Mr. THAYER. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. On that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 47, nays 58, not voting 78; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ancona, Baker, Broomall, Buckland, Cobb, Cook, Delano, Dixon, Farguhar, Finck, Garfield, Grider, Hale, Aaron Harding, Abner C. Harding, Hayes, James R. Hubbell, Hulburd, James M. Humphrey, Jenekes, Julian, Ketcham, Latham, Marston, Miller, Newell, Niblack, Nicholson, Orth, Patterson, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Ritter, Ross, Seofield, Shanklin, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Spalding, Taber, Thayer, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, Wentworth, Williams, Stephen F. Wilson, and Wright—47.

NAYS—Messrs. Ames, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, Banks, Baxter, Beaman, Benjamin, Bergen, Bidwell, Bingham, Blow, Boutwell, Sidney Clarke, Darling, Dawes, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Eliot, Ferry, Grinnell, Henderson, Holmes, Asahel W. Hubbard, Kasson, Kelley, Kelso, Laffin, William Lawrence, Loan, Longyear, Lynch, Marvin, McCarg, McCruer, Mercer, Morris, Moulton, O'Neill, Perham, Price, John H. Rice, Rollins, Schenck, Smith, Stevens, Francis Thomas, Trowbridge, Upson, Bart Van Horn, Robert F. Van Horn, Warner, William B. Washburn, James F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—58.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Allison, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Barker, Blaine, Boyer, Brandegee, Bronwell, Bundy, Chandler, Reader W. Clarke, Coffroth, Conkling, Cullem, Culver, Davis, Dawson, DeFrees, Deming, Denison, Dumont, Eckley, Eggleston, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Griswold, Harris, Hart, Higby, Hill, Hogan, Hughes, Hotchkiss, Chester D. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, James Humphrey, Ingersoll, Johnson, Jones, Kerr, Kuykendall, George V. Lawrence, Le Bond, Marshall, McCullough, Mc-

Indoe, McKee, Moorhead, Morrill, Myers, Noell, Paine, Phelps, Pike, Plants, Pomeroy, Radford, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, Rogers, Rousseau, Sawyer, Sloan, Starr, Stilwell, Strouse, Taylor, John L. Thomas, Thornton, Trimble, Van Aernam, Ward, Whaley, and Winfield—78.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, obtained the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois rises to debate the question of the reception of the report. The Chair will state that debate must be confined within a very limited range. The only question is as to whether the House will receive the report under the circumstances stated by the chairman of the committee.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I propose to proceed within the limited range stated by the Speaker.

Mr. BANKS. I raise a point of order, which is that the question presented by the gentleman from Illinois is a question of the order of business, and is not debatable. If a discussion is to proceed upon the allegation that the chairman of this committee has reported a bill without authority, it is a question of privilege, and must be presented distinctly as such, and not as a question of the order of business. A question of privilege such as that would require an investigation into the transactions of the committee, which cannot be had at this time, and which cannot be discussed at this time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order. The Clerk will read from the Journal of the Twenty-Seventh Congress, second session, page 1410, a precedent on this question.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"The Speaker stated that no question of order was involved; that the question, Shall the bill be received as the report of the committee? was for the House alone to decide; and as the reception of the bill was objected to, that question would be put to the House. The question was then put under the operation of the previous question."

The SPEAKER. It will be observed that in that case the question was put under the operation of the previous question, showing that, without the operation of the previous question the question would have been debatable, though within the narrow limits just stated by the Chair. Of course the previous question would have been unnecessary, if, in the opinion of the occupant of the Chair at that time, the question had been undebatable.

This is the only precedent the Chair has been able to find in the hurried examination which he has had the opportunity to make since the point was raised.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I will endeavor to confine myself within the limits laid down by the Speaker. I debate this in no spirit of faction. I say that my friend from Iowa [Mr. PRICE] is mistaken in the position he assumes, and the House will bear me out in what I say.

Mr. SMITH. If the gentleman debates this, when he gets through, can the other side be heard? I raise the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois has not transgressed the proper limit of debate. The House will see there may be a time when the question of reception may be important. A chairman may rise and say he has been authorized to make a report, although a majority of the committee may be opposed to it. If his report be conclusive, the House would have to consider it.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I wish my friend from Iowa to distinctly understand I do not impugn anything he has said. Such is not my habit "here or elsewhere," to use the slang of the day. [Laughter.] But I call attention to this fact, and the House will bear witness to its truth, that this bill was reported back within two minutes after it was recommitted to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, a committee consisting of fifteen members. I am certain my friend from Iowa was not five feet from his seat all that time.

I suggested what I know to be true as a matter of fact, that the committee had not in any parliamentary sense a meeting by which they could have ordered the reporting back of that bill. I will read the rule as laid down in the Manual.

But first I will state a case, which I think the Speaker will recollect, a case which arose in the Thirty-Fifth Congress, when Mr. Orr was Speaker. Mr. Clingman, as chairman of a committee, undertook to report a bill, when the question arose whether he was authorized to report it. He said he had consulted a majority of members upon the floor and considered he was so authorized. The Speaker held he had no such authority after consulting the committee one by one when they were not together as a body. It is laid down in the Manual as follows:

"A committee meet when and where they please—if the House has not ordered time and place for them—but they can only act when together, and not by separate consultation and consent, nothing being the report of a committee but what has been agreed in committee actually assembled."—Manual, p. 85.

I appeal to my friend from Iowa as an honest, candid, and like myself a somewhat hasty man, whether he comes within that rule. If he will say in the presence of the House he has had the committee together and they have considered the bill and amendments made to it, I will withdraw my opposition. I object to the reception of the bill.

Mr. STEVENS. I can understand perfectly the case of Mr. Clingman referred to. He stated distinctly they had not a session. It is not this case at all. The chairman here was instructed to report this bill. He has so stated, and no member of the committee has denied it.

I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. SPALDING moved the House adjourn, and demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 40, nays 60, not voting 83; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ancona, Baker, Bromwell, Broomall, Cobb, Cook, Delano, Dixon, Fink, Grider, Hale, Aaron Harding, Abner C. Harding, Hayes, James R. Hubbell, Jencks, Julian, Ketcham, Latham, William Lawrence, Marston, Newell, Niblack, Nicholson, Orth, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Ritter, Ross, Shanklin, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Spaulding, Taber, Thayer, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, Wentworth, Williams, and Wright—40.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, Banks, Baxter, Beaman, Bergen, Bidwell, Bingham, Blow, Boutwell, Sidney Clarke, Darling, Dawes, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Eliot, Farquhar, Ferry, Grinnell, Henderson, Higby, Asahel W. Hubbard, Hulburd, Kasson, Kelley, Kelso, Ladin, Loan, Longyear, Lynch, Marvin, McClurg, McRuer, Mercur, Miller, Moorhead, Morris, Moulton, Myers, O'Neill, Perham, Price, John H. Rice, Rollins, Schenck, Smith, Stevens, Francis Thomas, Trowbridge, Upson, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Warner, William B. Washburn, James F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—60.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Barker, Benjamin, Blaine, Boyer, Brundage, Buckland, Bundy, Chanler, Reader W. Clarke, Coffroth, Conkling, Cullom, Culver, Davis, Dawson, Defrees, Deming, Denison, Dumont, Eckley, Eggleston, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Garfield, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Griswold, Harris, Hart, Hill, Hogan, Holmes, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Chester D. Hubbard, Deamus Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, James Humphrey, James M. Humphrey, Ingersoll, Johnson, Jones, Kerr, Kuykendall, George V. Lawrence, Le Blond, Marshall, McCullough, Melndoe, McKee, Morrill, Noel, Paine, Patterson, Phelps, Pike, Plants, Pomeroy, Radford, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, Rogers, Rousseau, Sawyer, Scofield, Sloan, Starr, Stilwell, Strouse, Taylor, John L. Thomas, Thornton, Trimble, Van Aernam, Ward, Welker, Whaley, Stephen F. Wilson, and Winfield—53.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The question recurred on seconding the demand for the previous question on the reception of the report.

The previous question was seconded—yeas 58, nays 38, and the main question was ordered.

Mr. SPALDING. I demand the yeas and nays on the reception of the report.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. If the House adjourns, Mr. Speaker, will this be the first business in order in the morning?

Mr. STEVENS. If the question on the reception is decided now we may adjourn.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I want to raise a point of order on the reception.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is rather late, as the previous question is ordered on that subject. The Chair will state that if the House should adjourn this would be the unfinished business, and would come up as soon as the Journal is read.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move that the House adjourn.

The question being put, there were—yeas 48, nays 49.

Mr. DELANO. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SMITH. If the gentleman will withdraw his demand for the yeas and nays, I will make a motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. It can be withdrawn by unanimous consent.

Mr. DELANO. I ask unanimous consent to withdraw it.

No objection was made.

The question was then taken on the motion to adjourn, and it was agreed to; and thereupon (at ten o'clock and twenty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, April 25, 1866.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. H. GRAY. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PROTECTION TO UNITED STATES OFFICERS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed as the committee of conference on the part of the Senate on the bill (H. R. No. 288) to amend an act entitled "An act relating to habeas corpus and regulating judicial proceedings in certain cases," approved March 3, 1863, Mr. CLARK, Mr. TRUMBULL, and Mr. HENDRICKS.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a memorial of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Dakota, praying that certain settlers in that Territory may be indemnified for losses which, it is represented, they will suffer by the terms of the treaty with the Pecan Indians, now pending in the Senate; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also presented a communication from the New York East Annual Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, expressive of the views of that body in relation to the present state of the country; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WILSON presented a petition of unmarried daughters of revolutionary soldiers, praying that they may be granted the same pension that was received by their mothers while living; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented two petitions of white voters in the southern part of Florida, praying that commissioners may be appointed to award damages for property belonging to them which was confiscated and sold by the rebels; which were referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. GRIMES presented a petition of citizens of Burlington, Iowa, who represent that the laws and regulations touching the business of insurance now in force in the several States are dissimilar, and tend to the detriment of trade, and they therefore pray that Congress will enact such just and equal laws for the regulation of inter-State insurances of all kinds as may be effectual in establishing the greatest security for the interests protected by policies, and promotive of the greatest good and convenience to all concerned in such transactions; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SHERMAN. I offer the petition of James Smith, of New York, praying Congress, in behalf of himself, and others, citizens of New York and Brooklyn, to pass a joint resolution abolishing the fractional part of a cent now exacted for each passenger in street railroad cars, or otherwise to exact the entire cent for the internal revenue, in lieu of the fractional part, which the citizens will not complain of; but they do seriously complain of the extortion of these monopolists, whose stock cannot be purchased for two hundred per cent. above the par value. I move the reference of this petition to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. VAN WINKLE, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 345) for the relief of Christina Elder, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a written report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of fifteen petty officers and twenty-six seamen of the Western flotilla, praying for prize money or compensation for captures made at Island No. 10, Memphis, and other places on the Mississippi river, have instructed me to report it back, and ask that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the subject. I am also instructed to say that the committee were not willing to report against the petition, but there was not sufficient evidence accompanying the petition, nor were the committee able in the Department to find sufficient evidence to justify a favorable report or a report of a bill appropriating money.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Andrew Branstetter, praying for a pension, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, as it does not come within the purview of the Committee on Pensions; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 494) for the relief of Martha J. Willey, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Mrs. Josephine Rice, widow of Brigadier General James C. Rice, praying for a pension, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, upon the ground that the petitioner is already entitled to a pension under the general law.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. KIRKWOOD, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 203) to enable the New York and Montana Iron Mining and Manufacturing Company to purchase a certain amount of the public lands not now in market, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. CRAGIN, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the memorial of Edward St. Clair Clarke, acting assistant paymaster United States Navy, praying to be relieved from all responsibility in consequence of money lost by robbery in May, 1863, while attached to the United States steamer Sumter, submitted a report accompanied by a bill (S. No. 283) for the relief of Edward St. Clair Clarke. The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 453) for the relief of Cornelius B. Gold, late acting assistant paymaster United States Navy, reported it without amendment.

Mr. WILLEY, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the memorial of Otway H. Berryman, of the Navy, praying to be allowed an amount equal to the balance found against him on the settlement of his accounts as acting purser while in command of the United States schooner Onkahye, and which he has been obliged to pay over to the United States, submitted a report accompanied by a bill (S. No. 284) for the relief of the children of Otway H. Berryman, deceased. The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

CATTLE PLAGUE.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am instructed by the Committee on Agriculture, to whom was referred a letter of the Commissioner of Agriculture giving information in relation to the rinderpest or cattle plague, to state that that communication has been considered by the committee, and after consideration they have directed me to report this resolution:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Senate ten thousand copies of a letter of the Commissioner of Agriculture communicating information in relation to the rinderpest or cattle plague.

I ask for the present consideration of the resolution.

By unanimous consent the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Committee on Agriculture would like very much indeed to report some measure of a practical character to counteract if possible the cattle plague now prevailing in Europe; but we did not see that Congress had authority to pass an effective measure. In Great Britain, after various orders in council and various efforts to stop the progress of the cattle plague, they have recently passed a very stringent law, embodied in this letter, authorizing certain districts, supposed to be infected, to be first inspected, and then, when they are pronounced infected, authorizing the destruction of cattle in those districts. Under it the officers or inspectors may enter any man's field, barn, or close and seize and summarily destroy cattle affected by or even subject to the plague. It contains provisions for the destruction of hides, offal, hay, straw, or other material likely to convey the infection. It requires the active assistance of justices of the peace, constables, and the whole machinery of local laws and levies a local tax under the name of a cattle rate. It is manifest if such a law is needed to accomplish the purpose we must appeal to the State authorities. That such severe measures are needed to accomplish the wished-for result is shown, not only by this act of Parliament, but by the actual execution of similar measures in France, where by immediate destruction of cattle infected they have checked the disease.

The destruction which this disease has occasioned is much more fearful than I had any idea of until I read this communication and recent communications from England. As a simple illustration of the destructiveness of this disease, I will state that of 203,350 cattle attacked in a short period of time in certain districts in Great Britain, 39,487 were killed, 120,834 died, and only 28,656 recovered. There is great danger—it is manifest that it is impending—that this disease may come to this country. It has pursued very much the same march in Europe that the cholera has done, and it probably will come here, notwithstanding all the efforts that may be made by the Government and people of the United States to exclude it. It is an important subject for the States to consider whether measures ought not immediately to be adopted, founded upon the experience of other countries, to prevent the spread of the cattle plague.

The letters of our consuls in Europe have recently contained authentic statements of its progress. Mr. Dudley, our consul at Liverpool, under date of February 2, 1866, writes that the plague is not confined to England and Scotland, but prevails on the Continent in Belgium, Holland, Prussia, some of the German States, and in parts of Russia.

In the same letter he says:

"Inclosure No. 2 contains the returns made to the authorities at London of the cases reported in the kingdom during the week ending on the 27th of January, as taken from the papers of to-day, and two or three articles showing the fatality of the plague in certain localities it has visited. In one there is a list of persons who have suffered in the parish of Northenburgh, with the number of cattle they have each lost, and the number left. In Cheshire, the county just across the river from Liverpool, up to last Monday, 160,41 cattle had died of the disease, 700 had been killed, 5,247 were under treatment, and 1,245 had recovered. Upward of 3,000 were buried in this county during the week. From an article taken from the Scotsman, a paper published in Edinburgh, it would appear that the plague has entirely ceased in that city, either having exhausted itself or else been stamped out. But the article goes on to say, 'The vastness of the loss, however, that may be incurred before the disease runs its course in any district where it once makes entry is indicated by the fact that about four fifths of all the cows in Edinburgh, when the disease broke out here, died or have been killed.' As fearful as is the mortality, I fear it is rather under than overstated, and many other counties and towns have been and are suffering by this terrible plague equally if not worse than there. All kinds of remedies have been tried, but up to the present time no specific has been found; and if vaccination fails, no preventive has been discovered."

"By the official returns you will see that there is no abatement but a still further increase of the disease for the week ending on the last Saturday. (See inclosure No. 2.) The footings show 11,745 new cases, being an increase of 1,704 cases over the previous week. Thus far there have been reported to the authorities 120,740 cases, of which but 14,162 have recovered; the rest have either died of the disease, been killed, or are still under treatment."

Mr. Abbott, consul at Sheffield, writes under date of February 17, 1866:

"The rinderpest continues to spread and the mortality to increase, notwithstanding the precautions which have been taken to prevent the diffusion of the disease. For a time it was supposed that inoculation was a safeguard, but even this remedy seems to have failed."

"When Professor Gamgee addressed the social congress, in October last, he was much ridiculed, not only in the discussions in the congress, but in the columns of the newspaper press, of stringent measures which he recommended."

"The exemption of Ireland, the partial exemption of one or two of the Scottish counties, seems to be due in the former case to a prohibition, which is rigidly enforced, of the importation of cattle into the island; and in the latter case, to the system of 'crushing out' the disease by the slaughter of cattle wherever it appears."

The rinderpest prevailed on the Continent for some time before it crossed the English Channel. In 1862, 152,000 cattle died with it in Austria. It spread over all southeastern Europe with an average of more than seventy-five per cent. It was carried to England by an importation of Russian bullocks, and already 200,000 very valuable cattle have perished. We cannot estimate the destruction of such a disease if by probable contingency it should be brought to our shores by any one of the numerous vessels daily arriving from the infected regions. We do not underrate the importance of the subject or the imminence of the danger.

But the question with us was, whether we had any power under our system of government to pass such a law as that which has proved to be somewhat effective in England, because the operation of that law, although very severe, has stayed to some extent the cattle plague, and has prevented it from spreading into regions where it might possibly, but for these very severe measures, have spread. We could not see that under our form of government Congress has the power to order the summary destruction of the private property of individuals in the States, nor use the vast number of local officers to make it effective. We thought, therefore, the only thing we could do was to report a resolution for the publication of a number of copies of this letter, so that the information which it contains may be generally distributed for what it is worth among the people of the several States. I am only sorry that the Legislatures of the different States did not take some action upon it before most of them adjourned. At any rate we thought it was a subject demanding immediate attention, and that if we could not do anything by law more than we have done in prohibiting the importation of foreign cattle and hides, we might invoke the attention of our countrymen to an impending peril.

Mr. SUMNER. I was sorry to hear two remarks of the Senator from Ohio. The first was that the cattle plague was coming. I hope that by proper precautions it may be averted. I do trust it may never come. I hope the Atlantic ocean at least may be a barrier. I was sorry also for the other remark that, in his opinion, Congress could not apply any remedy. I do not venture to question the accuracy of the remark; but I was sorry that the Senator who had the question in charge had arrived at that conclusion. It does seem to me that under our Government Congress ought to be able to apply a remedy in such a case. Is not our Government defective to a certain extent if Congress has not that power? I merely open the question interrogatively now, without undertaking to express any opinion upon it. I agree with the Senator from Ohio that it is of great importance that our people should be put on their guard. He therefore is right in causing the circulation of all public information on the subject; but I do hope that the Senator having the subject in charge will consider carefully whether it be not within the power of Congress, in some way or other, directly or indirectly, to apply a precise remedy.

Mr. SHERMAN. The honorable Senator

gave a broader meaning to my remarks than they would bear. I did not say that Congress had no power to prevent the spread of this disease. I said that it had no power to pass such a law as was recently passed in England, the only one which seemed to be effective for the purpose; that is, Congress has no power to direct the officers of the United States to go into particular districts or States of the United States, and there seize all the cattle of private citizens within a given State or district and destroy them. I doubt very much whether such a power exists in Congress. It is a power that ought to be exercised by the States. Congress may, however, by commercial regulations, do all it can to prevent the coming of this disease into the country, and it has already done so. A bill reported by me some time ago was passed, and under that bill the Secretary of the Treasury has excluded all cattle, hides, and everything that can communicate this disease from infected districts. If the Senator can suggest any other remedy or any other measure I should like very much to have the benefit of it. The Committee on Agriculture have not concluded themselves by their consideration of the subject from acting on any measure or reporting any measure that may seem to be necessary; but we do think that under our system of government the wholesale destruction of cattle in particular States and communities will not be justified by any power conferred by the Constitution on Congress. That is the only conclusion at which we have arrived, and I think upon that there is no doubt. If the Senator can find any power in the Government of the United States thus to destroy the property of private citizens within the States according to the system adopted by the British Parliament, which is supreme within the jurisdiction of Great Britain, I should like to know where he finds it.

The resolution was adopted.

MRS. W. L. HERNDON.

Mr. COWAN. The Committee on Patents and the Patent Office, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 193) for the relief of Mrs. William L. Herndon, have had it under consideration, and have instructed me to report favorably upon it, and recommend its passage; and if there be no objection, I ask that it be put upon its passage now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It requires unanimous consent to consider the bill on the day it is reported. Is there any objection?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should like to know if it is a bill calculated to take any time.

Mr. COWAN. No, I think not; it simply proposes to confer on her the copyright of a book formerly published by public authority—Herndon's Expedition. I do not think there can possibly be any objection to it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not know anything about this bill, but I know that we passed a similar bill a year or two ago, and afterward great objection was made to it.

Mr. CLARK. The fact is as stated by the Senator from Illinois, that two or three years ago we passed a bill of this kind, and got into considerable difficulty about it, and the Committee on Claims has been troubled with a petition from gentlemen claiming the right for I believe every succeeding session, and there seems to be some doubt about the relief. I do not know anything about this case; and if Senators do know that it is entirely free from doubt, perhaps there will be no objection to it, but I think it had better lie over and be printed, so that it may meet the attention of some one.

Mr. CONNESS. I think if an explanation of it is made, it will satisfy the Senator now.

Mr. CLARK. The difficulty is, that if we consider it now nobody will see it; but if we have it printed some Senator may see what the character of the bill is, or some person outside may get information on the subject.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Let it go over until to-morrow.

Mr. CLARK. I think myself it had better go over and be printed.

Mr. COWAN. Very well.
The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill lies over.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. POMEROY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 285) granting lands to the State of Kansas to aid in the construction of the Kansas and Neosho Valley railroad and its extension to Red river; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

RAILROAD BRIDGES ACROSS THE MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. RAMSEY. I move to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 236.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 236) to authorize and establish certain post roads.

The bill, as introduced by Mr. TRUMBULL, proposes to make it lawful for any person or persons, company or corporation, having authority from the State of Illinois for such purpose, to build a bridge across the Mississippi river at Quincy, Illinois, and to lay on and over the bridge railway tracks, for the more perfect connection of any railroads that are or shall be constructed to the river at or opposite that point. When constructed, all trains of all roads terminating at the river at or opposite that point are to be allowed to cross the bridge for reasonable compensation, to be made to the owners of the bridge, under the limitations and conditions provided. The bridge is to be constructed as a draw-bridge, with a span over the main channel of the river, as understood at the time of the erection of the bridge, of not less than three hundred feet in length; and the span is not to be less than thirty feet above the low-water mark, and not less than ten feet above the extreme high-water mark, measuring to the bottom chord of the bridge; and one of the next adjoining spans is not to be less than two hundred feet in length; and there is also to be a pivot draw constructed in the bridge, at an accessible and navigable point, with spans of not less than one hundred and fifty feet in length on each side of the central or pivot pier of the draw. The draw is to be opened promptly upon reasonable signal for the passage of boats, whose construction shall not be such as to admit of their passage under the permanent spans of the bridge, except when trains are passing; but in no case is unnecessary delay to occur in opening the draws after the passage of trains. Any bridge constructed under the act, and according to its limitations, is to be a lawful structure, and be recognized and known as a post route, upon which no higher charge shall be made for the transmission over the same of the mails, the troops, and the munitions of war of the United States, than the rate per mile paid for their transportation over the railroads or public highways leading to the bridge. The ferry authorized to be established by the Illinois and Missouri Transportation Company, by the laws of the States of Illinois and Missouri, across the Mississippi river at the city of Quincy, is, during the time authorized by the laws of those States, and until the completion of the bridge, under and according to the provisions of the act, to be recognized and known as a post route.

The Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads proposed amendments to the bill, the first of which was in section one, line four, after the word "Illinois" to insert "and Missouri," and to make the word "State" read "States;" so that the clause will read:

That it shall be lawful for any person or persons, company or corporation, having authority from the States of Illinois and Missouri for such purpose, to build a bridge across the Mississippi river at Quincy, Illinois.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment reported by the committee was in section one, at the end of line thirteen, to insert:

And in case of any litigation arising from any obstruction or alleged obstruction to the free navigation of said river, the cause may be tried before the district court of the United States of any State in which any portion of said obstruction or bridge touches.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out from section two the following words:

That any bridge built under the authority of this act shall be constructed as a draw-bridge, with a span over the main channel of the river, as understood at the time of the erection of the bridge, of not less than three hundred feet in length; and said span shall not be less than thirty feet above the low-water mark, and not less than ten feet above the extreme high-water mark, measuring to the bottom chord of the bridge; and one of the next adjoining spans shall not be less than two hundred feet in length; and, also, that there shall be a pivot draw constructed in said bridge, at an accessible and navigable point, with spans of not less than one hundred and fifty feet in length on each side of the central or pivot pier of the draw.

And in lieu thereof to insert—

That any bridge built under the provisions of this act may, at the option of the company building the same, be built as a draw-bridge, with a pivot or other form of draw, or with unbroken or continuous spans: Provided, That if the said bridge shall be made with unbroken and continuous spans, it shall not be of less elevation in any case than fifty feet above extreme high-water mark as understood at the point of location, to the bottom chord of the bridge, nor shall the spans of said bridge be less than two hundred and fifty feet in length, and the piers of said bridge shall be parallel with the current of the river: And provided also, That if any bridge built under this act shall be constructed as a draw-bridge, the same shall be constructed as a pivot draw-bridge with a draw over the main channel of the river at an accessible and navigable point, and with spans of not less than one hundred and seventy-five feet in length on each side of the central or pivot pier of the draw, and the next adjoining spans to the draw shall not be less than two hundred and fifty feet; and said spans shall not be less than thirty feet above low-water mark, and not less than ten above extreme high-water mark, nearing to the bottom chord of the bridge, and the piers of said bridge shall be parallel with the current of the river.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HENDERSON. I desire to offer some amendments to this bill. In the first section, line six, after the word "Illinois," I desire to insert "and at Hannibal, Missouri."

Mr. RAMSEY. I trust this will not be done. Let each proposition of this kind stand on its own merits. If the gentleman desires a bridge at Hannibal, it might be well to introduce a bill of that kind, refer it to some committee, and have the facts investigated as they have been in this case. Representations have been heard on one side and the other, and the committee strike at what they consider to be a safe mean between the extremes asked by the railroad company and the navigation interests respectively. This proposition of building bridges across the Mississippi river is a very serious one. I think in every instance the bill ought to be referred to a committee. For that reason I trust the gentleman will withdraw his amendment at this time and introduce a bill, as has been done in every other case.

Mr. HENDERSON. I must express some little astonishment at the objection the Senator from Minnesota presents to the amendment I have indicated. He insists that the subject of building a bridge at Quincy, Illinois, has gone before a committee, and that a proposition to build a bridge across the Mississippi river at Hannibal ought to go there, because the building of bridges across the Mississippi is a very serious thing under any circumstances. I think if the bill under consideration is to be passed, it is a very serious thing. I am not in favor of the passage of the bill, and I did not expect it to come up this morning. I have not all the memoranda here that I desire to present. I thought they were in my desk; they are not all here; and I shall be compelled to ask, eventually, a postponement of this bill until I can get them.

Now, Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from Minnesota that the proposition to build bridges across the Mississippi river is a very serious proposition. The Senator is very well aware of the fact that if these bridges are to be built at all, as provided in this bill, bridges not with continuous spans, but what are called draw-bridges, they will very materially interfere with the navigation of the Mississippi river, and I must express some little astonishment at the proposition on the part of the Senator who seems to have reported this bill from the Post Office Committee to build bridges of this character across the Mississippi river. If he be willing, as a representative of the interests connected with that great river, to build draw-bridges over it, I am not. The Senate of the United States may outvote me on the proposition, but I never will vote for the establishment of a bridge across the Mississippi river which is called a draw-bridge.

It has been recently demonstrated that there is but little difficulty in building bridges with sufficient spans to admit of the passage of boats; and that being the case, if bridges can be built on the Mississippi river sufficiently elevated to admit the passage of steamers, even with chimneys that can be let down as mentioned the other day, I am perfectly willing that that character of bridges may be built; but it is a matter of serious consideration, indeed, whether draw-bridges shall be constructed across the Mississippi river. We know perfectly well that they will interfere, and materially interfere, with the navigation of that great river, and I doubt whether we shall ever be compensated by railroad travel and railroad transportation for the inconveniences arising from draw-bridges.

The Senator says that this bill for a bridge at Quincy has been before a committee. What have the committee done? They have simply reported the bill which was introduced and referred to the committee for building a bridge at Quincy. They have reported the bill back, only changing the height and the span of the bridge. But, sir, if a bridge is to be built at Quincy—I live in that neighborhood; I live only thirty miles from the town of Hannibal and only fifty miles from the town of Quincy; I know that country perfectly well—let me ask the Senator why he presents an objection to the building of a railroad bridge at Hannibal. What new light can the committee shed on it that cannot now be given?

Mr. RAMSEY. Does the gentleman want an answer now?

Mr. HENDERSON. The Senator can answer me directly. I am going to state some facts with which I am perfectly conversant, but with which, perhaps, the Senator is not. The Hannibal and St. Joseph Railroad Company first constructed its road from Hannibal to the town of St. Joseph, and that road is now being continued across the State of Kansas in a direct west line, and is to connect with the great line of road to the Pacific ocean.

After the construction of the road from Hannibal, the State of Missouri granted a charter to construct a branch road from the town of Palmyra, some fifteen miles from the town of Hannibal, so as to go directly to Quincy. The Legislature of Missouri might have prevented this railroad connection, but we did not see fit to do so. We permitted the Hannibal and St. Jo. Railroad Company to connect with the northern cross-road, which leads from Quincy to Chicago. A road is now being constructed across Pike county, Illinois, from Naples, on the Illinois river, which connects with the Toledo road—the Great Western road, as it is called—from Fort Wayne directly on to Hannibal. This road will soon be finished. Now, a bridge can be constructed at the town of Hannibal just as well as at the town of Quincy, and, let me say to the Senator, much more easily. A bridge can be constructed there with much greater facility, because the river is not so wide at Hannibal as at Quincy, and there is a better steamboat channel, a more condensed and more compact channel, there than at Quincy. A great line of railroad, leading from Pittsburg directly to Hannibal, will soon be in operation; indeed, it is to the town of Naples, within a few miles of Hannibal. Again, I ask the Senator, why, if a bridge is to be constructed at Quincy, shall not one be constructed at Hannibal also?

If you look at the travel and transportation of the country, if you look at anything beyond the mere interests of the town of Quincy alone, I can see no reason whatever why you should not also allow a bridge to be constructed at Hannibal. I do not know whether it will benefit the town of Hannibal; I care not whether it does or not. I do not know whether the construction of this bridge will be of any substantial benefit to the town of Quincy. My impression is, that the construction of railroad bridges, such as are contemplated in this bill, upon the Mississippi river will do all the towns more damage than good. However, if the Senator desires to pass bills of this character, I shall not put myself in the way.

The Senator is very well aware that there is no break in steamboat lines between the town of Quincy and St. Louis. We have no line of packets running directly to Hannibal and back; we have none running directly to Quincy and back; but the lines of packets running from St. Louis continue their trips to the town of Keokuk, and there is no obstruction in the way. The navigation of the Mississippi above the town of Hannibal is just as good as it is between Hannibal and St. Louis, and indeed better. Therefore we do not need any different sized packets to navigate the Mississippi river between those points; and why is it that it will be an injury to construct a bridge at the one point and not at the other? The same lines of boats that pass under the bridge at the one point will be required to pass under it at the other.

But, Mr. President, a short time ago we provided for the construction of a railroad bridge at St. Louis. What sort of a bridge did we provide for constructing there? Was it such a bridge as the Senator now proposes? Certainly not. The bill which the Senate passed a short time ago at the instance of my colleague [Mr. Brown] required that the lowest part of the bridge at St. Louis should be fifty feet above high-water mark at its greatest span; that the bridge itself should have a continuous or unbroken span; that it should have one span at least six hundred feet in the clear, or two spans of four hundred and fifty feet in the clear of abutments. If the two latter spans be used, the one over the main steamboat channel must be fifty feet above high-water mark, measured to the lowest part of the bridge at the center of the span. Now, let us see what sort of a bridge is proposed here. The Senator from Minnesota provides in this bill that it may be built as a draw-bridge with a pivot or other form of draw, or with unbroken and continuous spans. We provided in regard to the bridge at St. Louis that it should not be built as a draw-bridge at all. Then it is here provided—

That if the said bridge shall be made with unbroken and continuous spans, it shall not be of less elevation in any case than fifty feet above extreme high-water mark, as understood at the point of location, to the bottom chord of the bridge; nor shall the spans of said bridge be less than two hundred and fifty feet in length, and the piers of said bridge shall be parallel with the current of the river.

It was provided, in regard to the St. Louis bridge, that the spans should not be less than six hundred feet. It is here provided that they may be only two hundred and fifty feet. Now, let me suggest to the Senator from Minnesota that if a bridge of this character is to be built, it will seriously interfere with navigation. I do not ask that a bridge of six hundred feet span shall be constructed at the point where a bridge is now proposed, but I do think that no bridge of less span than four hundred feet ought to be built upon the Mississippi even with continuous spans.

Mr. SHERMAN. It cannot be done.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mechanics say it can be done. The very best mechanics of St. Louis wrote to my colleague and myself that a bridge could be built at the city of St. Louis with a span of six hundred feet.

Mr. RIDDLE. Only by iron suspension bridges.

Mr. HENDERSON. I care not how it may be done, provided the bridge is put fifty feet above high-water mark, so as to enable the steamers to pass beneath the bottom chord of the bridge. We do not ask that it shall be built in one or the other mode; we only ask that it shall be built in continuous spans, and if they want to use iron they can do so.

But let me propose to the Senator from Minnesota, whose section of country is very rapidly growing into great importance, that in the course of a few years a great change has come about in the transportation of products upon the Mississippi river, much of which comes from his own thriving State. Instead of loading down a packet and running it through, a tow-boat is taken, with a large number of barges, requiring much more space than formerly in the transportation of the productions of that section of country. He will remember another difficulty, and a very serious one with us. From the State of Wisconsin, and his own State, perhaps, a large quantity of the lumber used in our section of country is brought upon the surface of the Mississippi river. These rafts are sometimes three hundred, four hundred, or five hundred feet in length, and repeated difficulty in getting them through between the piers of a bridge has been experienced at the town of Rock Island. He may say that a raft is never so wide as two hundred and fifty feet. I do not know in regard to that, but I know that some of them are very wide. He will remember, however, that the current in high and low water is not always the same on the Mississippi or any other stream. The passage of rafts between the piers of these bridges will certainly require a space of more than two hundred and fifty feet. Perhaps the Senator from Minnesota can enlighten me on the subject, but if I am not much mistaken, in high water, when the current is strong, and when the piers themselves are not in a line parallel with the current of the river, a raft may be started through properly, but before the entire raft gets through it will strike the piers, as has frequently been the case at Rock Island, if I am not mistaken.

Mr. GRIMES. At Rock Island the bridge is right at the foot of the rapids where the current is very strong; but no such condition of things can exist here.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The span there is only one hundred and twelve feet.

Mr. RAMSEY. The whole difficulty at Rock Island is the obliquity of the piers to the current.

Mr. HENDERSON. That is the very difficulty that I am suggesting.

Mr. RAMSEY. That is well guarded against in this bill. They are required here to be in the line of the current.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am very well aware of that; but the Senator will recollect that he may have them in the line of the current in low water and they will not be parallel with the current in high water. The Senator knows perfectly well that the current of the Mississippi is not always in the same line; that the current changes even in high and low water. The current of a river, I apprehend, is controlled more or less by the height of the water and by the obstructions that may present themselves, and those obstructions may be different in high water from low water. The building of a wharf at a town may change the entire current of the river for miles above and below the town. Such things have frequently occurred. The smallest obstacle in nature will oftentimes change the current even of a river like the Mississippi. The Senator need not tell me that when a pier is built at an ordinary stage of water parallel with the current of the river it is always so. We know to the contrary. We know that the current is different in high water from low water. Hence it is an utter impossibility; and when you come to abate these bridges as a nuisance in the courts it will be found that the testimony is never sufficient to do it, and when they are once fastened upon the surface of that river we shall never get rid of them.

I would gladly say to-day that no bridge shall be constructed on the Mississippi river. I do not wish to put obstacles in the way of railroad transportation; but when you bring into competition with the transportation upon the Mississippi river the transportation upon the lines of the railroads of this country, I infinitely prefer that great river. Nature has made a better railroad there than man can ever make, one upon which the productions of that great country can be transported much more cheaply than they ever can be carried upon the lines of railroad built by mortal man. The road is already made. All that man has to do is to construct the car—the steamboat—and put it upon that magnificent stream. So far as I am concerned, I would not mar that stream, nor would I mar the stream of transportation that must pass upon it in all time to come, by the construction of these bridges.

But, sir, when the Senator tells me that the Senate of the United States is to enter upon a scheme of building these bridges, and proposes a bill the mere effect of which—not the object—is to benefit a little town in the State of Illinois at the expense of the people of my own State, and I offer to amend it so as to give them equal privileges with the people of Illinois, I am met with the proposition that no committee has examined it. What if they have not? I know that country perfectly well; and if ten thousand committees were to examine it, they could not enlighten us upon the subject. The Senator from Illinois knows the country perfectly well. I apprehend the Senator from Minnesota knows it. The lines of railroad from the East go directly to the city of Hannibal; and why not give us a bridge twenty miles from Quincy if a company will build it? I propose to amend the bill so as to let us have a railroad bridge at Hannibal, if Quincy is to have one. If we are to enter upon this system of railroad bridges far down immediately upon the surface of that great stream, and to have bells rung for the opening of the draws, when every half mile of that mighty stream in the course of a few years will be covered with the commerce of a mighty nation—for when I speak of the West I almost speak of this nation, and when I speak of the nation I speak of the West as it will be in the course of twenty years from to-day—when it is proposed to have these bridges, let us make them equal, and let the people of every State be equally benefited by them, if anybody is to be benefited; and if anybody is to be injured, let all be injured alike. I do not mean to vote for the building of any bridge so far as I am concerned, even if this proposition shall be amended. I hope that the Senate will not refuse me this amendment, because otherwise the bill would be unjust. Will any Senator tell me why the Toledo and Pittsburg and Fort Wayne road should not have a connection direct at Hannibal as well as the northern cross-road? It is a direct line from Toledo, by the way of Hannibal, to St. Joseph. It is as straight as it can be, much straighter than the other road. Then why not build a bridge there? I know of no point on that great stream better fitted for building a bridge than the town of Hannibal.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business of yesterday, which is Senate bill No. 74, for the admission of the State of Colorado into the Union, the pending question being on the motion to reconsider the vote of the Senate rejecting the application of that State for admission.

Mr. RAMSEY. Will it be in order to make this present bill which we are now considering the business of the morning hour to-morrow, or will it become so as a matter of course?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It would not become the special business of the morning hour under the present rule of the Senate.

Mr. GRIMES. It would come up after we got through with the morning business.

Mr. POMEROY. We had better make it a special order for to-morrow at half past twelve.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope no special orders will be made.

Mr. GRIMES. I have an amendment which I desire to propose to this bill, and I should like to have the privilege of offering it now that it may be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the Chair will receive the amendment, and the order to print will be entered.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I suggest that the bill be made the special order for half past twelve to-morrow, so as not to interfere with the morning business, and I make that motion, so that we shall be able to get it up to-morrow.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not think we ought to make special orders now, especially of a bill of this character.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will not insist upon it if the Senator from Ohio objects. We perhaps can get it up to-morrow morning without having it made a special order. I hope the Senator will allow it to come up then.

Mr. SHERMAN. I shall have no objection to its coming up, but special orders interfere with the general business of the Senate.

ADMISSION OF COLORADO.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of Mr. WILSON to reconsider the vote by which the Senate refused to order the bill (S. No. 74)* for the admission of the State of Colorado into the Union to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NYE] in the course of his remarks yesterday was pleased to allude to me as having been instructed by the Legislature of Wisconsin to resign my seat in the Senate, and as misrepresenting my constituents on this floor. It is not my purpose to-day to go into any lengthy argument to defend my course here. I may ask the attention of the Senate to that matter on some other occasion, when those resolutions shall arrive of which we have been informed in advance by the telegraph. I will only say for the present that when I entered upon my second term of office as a Senator for six years from the 4th day of March, 1863, at your desk, sir, I took a solemn oath, not to obey the resolves of the individuals who might happen to be elected as members of the Legislature of Wisconsin, or to follow the opinions or caprices of any other body of men, but to support the Constitution of the United States, and faithfully to discharge the duties of the office which was placed upon me; and God helping me, I shall keep that oath.

Upon the other allegation, that I stand here misrepresenting the views of my constituents, the people of Wisconsin, I will only say that by no word or vote of mine on this floor have I in the slightest degree deviated from the formally expressed opinion of the Union party in Wisconsin in its last convention, upon which this very Legislature was elected, as well as the Governor and State officers—not in one word, not in the dotting of an "i" or in the crossing of a "t."

But, sir, there were two propositions brought forward in that convention which, by a large majority, were put aside: first, the proposition to make negro suffrage, as it is called, a party test in the State of Wisconsin; and second, to make it a further test that no representative from the southern States should be admitted into Congress, and the States of the South should not be admitted into full communion until they should adopt impartial suffrage—suffrage just as free to the blacks as suffrage exists in favor of the whites. Those two propositions, by a large majority of the Union convention of Wisconsin, were laid upon the table; and upon that vote, and because I acted with the convention in favor of putting those resolutions on the table, I am called in question by certain gentlemen in Wisconsin and elsewhere. In support of the action which the majority of that convention assumed to take, and which I advocated, and for which, so far as I had voice or influence, I admit myself to be responsible, what did we say? We said to the people of Wisconsin, in advance of the election to come off, "If you adopt negro suffrage as a part of your party creed in Wisconsin you will be voted down by a majority of thousands; four fifths of the soldiers who have come home from the field will vote against it; and the soldiers of Wisconsin who are still in the field will also vote against it."

Now, what are the facts? We went into the canvass; we put aside negro suffrage as an issue; and what did we do? We elected a Union Legislature and a Union Governor and State officers by ten thousand majority. But what became of negro suffrage? It was voted down by ten thousand majority in the State of Wisconsin. The result justified what the majority said in the Union convention, and what I among them said. When the soldiers of Wisconsin came to vote, four out of every five of them voted against it. What was the fact in relation to the soldiers in the field? There were still 1,172 votes cast by our soldiers in the field, and out of the 1,172 votes that were cast on the question of negro suffrage how many do you suppose voted for it? Three. And yet men talk about pressing negro suffrage as a political question before the people of the country, and denounce me because I had the courage to tell the people of Wisconsin what I tell the Senate here: place yourselves upon that issue and you will be buried out of sight. They would have been buried in Wisconsin had they not followed my advice, which saved the Union party in Wisconsin, and elected this very Legislature which now undertakes to instruct me on this question as to how I shall act and what I shall do.

The other point was whether we in Wisconsin—and there this great battle began—should insist, as a condition-precident to the admission of the representatives from the South, and the admission of those States into full communion, upon negro suffrage at the South. The people of Wisconsin decided against it, and they will decide against it a hundred times over.

Mr. HOWE. If my colleague will excuse me, I did not quite understand what it was that the people of Wisconsin decided against. I was occupied at the time.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I say the Union convention laid that upon the table by a large majority.

Mr. HOWE. What was "that?"

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The proposition to insist upon negro suffrage as a condition-precident before admitting the States of the South into full communion. The Union party of Wisconsin refused to do that, and because they refused to do it they sustained themselves in Wisconsin.

As I have said, I do not propose to go into this question at length. The members of this Legislature were elected upon a platform which rejected, as a party measure, negro suffrage in the State of Wisconsin, and rejected as a party measure the insisting upon negro suffrage at the South as a condition-precident to their being admitted into full communion; and they could not have been elected without it, and this Legislature, that that convention, acting with me, put in power, now assume to instruct me because I do not follow their behests! Mr. President, let me warn my friends here, as I warned my friends in Wisconsin—and I do it in all sincerity—that is a rock on which you will split; if you fall upon it, you will be broken; let it fall on you and it will grind you to powder; try it on just as soon as you please.

While I insisted that it was wrong for the Federal Government to undertake to dictate to the States who should exercise the right of suffrage within their borders, and while I was opposed to making negro suffrage a part of the platform or creed of the Union party of Wisconsin, I, as an individual, did not object to negro suffrage in Wisconsin; and why? Because the class of colored persons who reside within our State are, from habit, from education, trained as freemen among freemen, capable of exercising the right of suffrage, and I advocated the extension of the right to them, and I voted for it as an individual.

Mr. COWAN. How many of them are there there?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Three hundred in the State. But, Mr. President, as I said in the beginning, I do not intend to go into that question now at any length. My purpose is to come directly to the question pending before the Senate. I agree with my honorable friend from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] in very much that he has said on this question. There are some things in which I do not concur with him, but at the same time I always accord to him the highest patriotism and perfect sincerity of purpose and character. One of the points on which I differ with him is this: I maintain that one of the rights which belong to the States under the Constitution, and which they have had from the beginning, is to judge for themselves on the question of suffrage. Believing that to be the right of a State, I do not feel at liberty to vote against the admission of a State because it declares that no Indians shall vote, or no negroes shall vote; or if it declares that certain classes of Indians may vote, or certain classes of colored men may vote; or even if it should go on to declare that women may vote. I should not vote to reject the constitution for that reason. If it established a property qualification, if it established an educational qualification, although I did not agree in the principle, perhaps, which was involved in the constitution, I would not oppose the admission of a State for that reason, because I believe that is a question that the State should pass upon for itself.

There is another point on which I feel called upon to say a word. I do not fully concur in the information which my honorable friend has in relation to the gentlemen who appear here claiming seats in this Chamber as Senators from Colorado. I do not know what may have occurred in the presence of the committee on the conduct of the war, or the sub-committee—

Mr. SUMNER. That is all that I quoted. I added nothing to that.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I say I do not understand what may have occurred in that committee. I only know that before another committee of the body testimony was taken on the same subject; I refer to the Sand creek massacre. Governor Evans, the person alluded to, appeared before that committee on two or three occasions, and I must say that there was nothing in the testimony which led those of us who heard it to suppose or believe that Governor Evans had any knowledge of the meditated attack of Colonel Chivington upon the Indians at Sand creek. Indeed, there was some testimony before us which tended to show that Chivington made the attack without any knowledge on the part of Governor Evans. I feel that it is but just to Governor Evans to say this. As to the Sand creek affair, I shall not speak at the present time. I have already expressed my opinion on that subject in very strong terms in the Senate.

Having said thus much, I come directly to the consideration of the question that controls my mind on this subject; and that is the question of the population of the Territory of Colorado. In 1861 there was a census taken of the population of Colorado, and the census showed that there were there 18,223 males, 2,622 minors, and 4,484 females, making the aggregate population 25,329. At that time there were 10,580 voters in the Territory, or one voter to every two and a half of the population. If you assume the relative proportion of voters to the population to be as one to two and a half you can form a very correct estimate of the population during the years 1862, 1864, and 1865, for in each of those years elections were held, and the votes of the people of the Territory were taken. In 1861, as I have stated, there were 10,580 voters in a population of 25,329. At the election held in 1862 there were 8,224 votes cast, and the same ratio would give us a population of 20,560. In 1864 there was another election held, at which there were 6,192 votes cast, and the same proportion would give a population of 15,480. In 1865 there was another election held, and the number of votes cast was 5,905, and the same proportion would give a population of 14,762.

The question arises, if the population of Colorado was 25,326 in 1861, how can it be that that population now is but 14,762? The causes are sufficient to any one who is familiar with the history of the time. Colorado is surrounded by other Territories full of mines, and these miners, who are without families generally, can, without great expense, and without any trouble or the breaking up of family ties, at once migrate from one mining district to another, and the mining districts of Idaho and Montana have actually drawn off this population from Colorado. General Pierce, the surveyor general, says, speaking of the population of Montana, that it was about 40,000, one fourth of which came from Colorado. According to that statement nearly 10,000 of the mining population left Colorado to go to Montana. Others, perhaps, went in and to a certain extent supplied their places.

Then, another cause has been in operation to diminish the number of people in Colorado. While the war was pending there were two or three regiments raised in Colorado; they were employed mostly in fighting the Indians, and some few came further east into Kansas, and into the service of the United States. The Indian wars and difficulties upon the plains interrupted the communication between the States and Colorado, and made provisions in Colorado so very expensive that it was impossible for them to sustain mining operations with any great degree of success; and it is a fact which you, Mr. President, and I very well know, (for we witnessed it with our own eyes last summer,) that very many of the mining operations were suspended in Colorado. Out of perhaps thirty mills but three or four were in successful operation. In consequence of the two facts to which I have referred, the emigration of the miners into other districts, and the interruption of communication across the plains, the expenses of living and feeding a single person were at least five dollars a day. How would it be possible in the Territory of Colorado to maintain the successful operation of mining at such a high price of provisions?

Mr. President, we know very well that in the south part of Colorado, over in the San Luis Park, the greater portion of the population is Mexican, and we know from all accounts that all that portion of the population are very much opposed to Colorado coming as a State in the Union in its present condition.

How, then, stands the question in relation to the people of Colorado? Do they desire to be admitted? Sir, the balance of the testimony is decidedly against it.

Mr. POMEROY. I do not like to interrupt the Senator, but I do not understand that the people in New Mexico, or that portion of them in Colorado, are at all opposed to it, because New Mexico herself has formed a constitution, and I am glad to say they have not got the word "white" in it, and they are coming here to ask that they may be admitted. They are acting with great unanimity in New Mexico on the subject.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. What I stated was that that portion of the people residing in the southern or southwestern part of Colorado, in the valley of the San Luis Park, which is the Mexican population, who speak Spanish, are very much opposed to having Colorado admitted into the Union as a State.

Mr. POMEROY. I cannot see why they should be so opposed to it, when the Mexicans in New Mexico are in favor of a State. I have yet to learn that that is so.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. That undoubtedly is the fact.

Mr. McDougall. Allow me to say that I have been there. The population of the San Luis Park belong properly to New Mexico; all their relations are there. They are opposed to the organization of this Territory as a State, being compelled to connect themselves with an organization that is altogether American. They are in favor of a State in New Mexico. I examined with great care the natural boundaries; and the natural boundaries would throw that population of some seven thousand into New Mexico proper. Mere lines do not make the boundaries of States.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The Senator from California states the fact that the San Luis Park, which is separated from the residue of Colorado by immense mountains, was settled by the Spaniards, and settled from the direction of New Mexico, and it is a Mexican population speaking Spanish. They from the natural boundaries belong to New Mexico; it is an artificial line which has separated them from New Mexico and embraced them within Colorado. The fact that they desire to withdraw from Colorado or have an act of Congress to withdraw them from Colorado and allow the San Luis Park, or a portion of it, to be attached to New Mexico is one reason, perhaps, why they are opposed to Colorado coming in as a State, including them.

But, Mr. President, if we come to the votes themselves, what do the facts show? Do the facts really show that the population of Colorado desire to come into the Union as a State? We passed a law and submitted the question to the people of Colorado. They decided against it by a vote of three to one in September, 1864, when there was more population than there was last September, 1865. They decided then three to one against it; but since then, without any law, by mere voluntary election, called under a voluntary understanding of the committees of two political parties, a convention was got together which formed a constitution and submitted it to the people for their ratification or rejection; and they held an election at which the whole vote polled was 5,905, and of that vote 155 is the majority in favor of the constitution. Here are one hundred and fifty-five persons more in the Territory of Colorado who desire a constitution and State government, than there are who are opposed to it, by the vote that was taken last fall; and yet by the vote which was taken a year ago when their population was more numerous than it was last fall, when the vote was heavier than it was last fall, they decided against it three to one; there were but 1,520 for it and 4,672 against it.

Now, Mr. President, upon these facts, when the population is so small, when it is so doubtful even whether the people of Colorado desire or a majority of the people desire to be admitted as a State, is it wise, is it just for us to pass this bill to admit them as a State into this Union? When I look at this as a practical question, and think that the little county of Racine, in which I live, which is principally an agricultural county, a little county twelve miles by twenty-four, has more voters and population than this proposed State of Colorado which it is sought now to admit into the Union with two Senators on this floor, it seems to me so plain that it is unwise for us to do it that I can hardly argue the question. Here is a population of not more probably than fifteen thousand. The mayor of Denver, in the last letter which has been read in the Senate bearing on this question, claims that there may be a population of thirty-five thousand in the whole Territory. Suppose there were thirty-five thousand; that is just about one fourth of the number sufficient to entitle a district to one member of Congress, for it requires over one hundred and twenty thousand population to be entitled to one Representative under the present ratio.

Sir, it is said that States have sometimes been admitted with a small population. I remember that Florida was admitted with a very small population; but who does not know that it was a question connected with slavery that forced Florida into the Union with that small population, that Florida was to come in as a slave State to balance against the State of Iowa, which was a free State? So, too, in relation to Arkansas. She came in with a small population, but it was to balance against the great State of Michigan, and the act was always regretted afterward.

Mr. President, is there any political necessity upon us to force us to adopt this bad precedent, a precedent which has been condemned by all just-thinking men in the case of the admission of Florida and the admission of Arkansas with their small, insignificant population as States in this Union? That was then pressed as a necessity in order to balance off slave States with free States. They must, it was supposed, be admitted in pairs. Is there any such necessity now, when every State in the Union is a free State and no State in the Union is a slave State? Why should we do this great wrong?

Mr. NYE. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question? What was the excuse for admitting Oregon with a small population?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. What was the population of Oregon?

Mr. NYE. Very small when the act of admission was passed.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. It was alleged, if I remember aright, that Oregon contained a population of from forty thousand to sixty thousand when it was admitted, and that was many years ago, when the ratio of representation was not as high by one third as it is now. When Wisconsin was admitted she had three Representatives. When Minnesota was admitted she had two. When Michigan was admitted I believe she was admitted with two Representatives. Iowa, when admitted, had a sufficient population to be entitled to two Representatives. If, as is alleged, Colorado possesses such vast and boundless fields of agricultural and pastoral lands, if, as is alleged, her mountains are full of mines, we need not wait very long. Now that peace is once more established upon the plains, in the course of one, two, or three years Colorado may fill up sufficiently with a population to be able to bear the burdens of a State government. We may then pass an enabling act and submit the question to the people of Colorado, and determine whether or not she ought to be admitted into the Union.

Mr. President, there is another consideration that ought not to be forgotten. When the election was held in September, 1864, to determine whether they would come into the Union or not, it was held, under valid law, so that persons who were guilty of the crime of voting when they were not entitled to vote or who were guilty of perjury at the election might be punished; but when this voluntary election was held in 1865, it was without law, without any authority, it was just as void as any other assembling of the people without any authority of law. Hundreds and thousands, perhaps, might not have voted at all at such an election, regarding it as an election without force; the Mexican portion of the population, in the southern part of the Territory, may not have voted at all, and in other districts they may not have voted.

Mr. President, I certainly see no such necessity, political necessity or any other necessity, for the admission of this State at this time as to justify us in doing it. I know it is sometimes claimed that the enabling act has pledged the good faith of Congress that they shall be admitted. Sir, that enabling act was passed in the belief that there were at the time of its passage from forty to sixty thousand people in Colorado. The chairman of the Committee on Territories stated to the Senate that that was the amount of the population of Colorado at the time. That was a great mistake. It is proved by the census that there were but 25,000; and if Congress were deceived; if Congress were imposed upon; or if Congress in mistake of the fact passed an enabling act by which they could form a constitution and come into the Union it does not lie in the mouth of the people of Colorado or any one else to say that there is any want of good faith on our part after the people of Colorado have exhausted the powers under the enabling act, and the law itself has had its effect. Until some act of Congress has been passed, the faith of this Government is not pledged anew to the people of Colorado that if they held another election we should admit them as a State into the Union. Sir, they come here precisely as if they had originated a constitution without any enabling act. An enabling act is not necessary to the existence of a State or to its admission in the Union; but when the people of a Territory proceed without an enabling act they must show themselves in a proper condition to satisfy Congress that they can assume the responsibilities and duties of a State government. They do not show it. The contrary is shown. They do not show a population amounting to one quarter of what is sufficient to entitle them to a member of Congress. For these reasons I am opposed to the reconsideration of this bill.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. Mr. President—

Mr. HOWE. Will the Senator from Indiana allow me a short time on a question upon which my colleague has spoken?

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. Certainly.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, the State of Wisconsin and the action of her Legislature and the action of the last convention which assembled in that State representing the party which sent my colleague and myself here have been referred to to-day, and were referred to yesterday, and on one or two previous occasions, and referred to in a manner which seems to me to demand some attention from myself.

Mr. President, of course I am not here to say that my colleague is not perfectly justified in his own judgment for each and every one of the votes he has given since he has been a representative of the State of Wisconsin here; but when he goes further than that, and not only assumes but asserts that he stands justified for these votes by the action of the last State convention held in the State of Wisconsin representing the Union party, or by any convention which ever assembled in that State representing that party, I think he assumes too much and asserts what the record of that convention will not substantiate. There was nothing, as I recollect the action of that convention, which could justify either of the votes which my colleague has given during the present session of Congress on which he has differed from the great body of his political friends about him. I ought not to speak very confidently on this point, perhaps. My colleague ought to be presumed to know better what was the action of that convention than I myself. It is true, as he has stated, that he was a member of that convention. I believe he was the chairman of the committee which drew and reported the resolutions adopted by that convention. If I mistake upon any of these points, he will of course correct me. He was, therefore, a prominent member of that convention. I was not a member of it at all. He saw the whole of it, and he was a great part of it, I think; but still I believe I cannot be mistaken in saying that the resolutions adopted by that convention cannot be urged here as authority for some of the votes which he has given.

I heard this, as I thought, asserted by my colleague yesterday on the floor, and I have looked for a copy of those resolutions this morning to see what there was in them that could be held up here as a justification for these votes of which the recent Legislature of Wisconsin has complained. I have not been able to find a copy of the resolutions, but I find one of them in a speech which my colleague himself made in the Senate on the 17th of January, I think—at least some time in January. Probably that resolution goes as far to justify the votes which have been commented upon in the State of Wisconsin as anything to be found in the whole series. Let me reproduce that resolution:

“That the animus which caused the late rebellion against the United States was born of the pride and ambition of an aristocracy founded upon slavery, which the war and the emancipation proclamation of President Lincoln has rightfully destroyed; and we deem it essential to the regeneration of the late slave but now free States that they should in good faith accept their new constitution as free States, not only by abolishing slavery in their State constitutions, but by the ratification by their Legislatures of the amendment to the Constitution of the United States, submitted by Congress and now pending, which forever abolishes slavery in every State, and empowers Congress to pass all laws necessary to secure liberty to all the people, black and white. By its adoption the cause of the rebellion will be removed, slavery destroyed, liberty established upon a foundation which neither State, nor President, nor Congress, nor court, nor change of parties can shake; as enduring as the globe itself. By its adoption all the people of those States, all the world will know that they accept freedom as their situation and give up slavery, and all hope of restoring slavery, forever.”

Now, I think my colleague will agree with me that there is nothing in the whole series of resolutions passed by that convention which comes nearer to an indorsement of the particular votes of his which have been complained of than the resolution I have just read. I think I shall do my colleague no injustice if I remark that he himself was the author of that resolution, and I am certain that I do neither him nor the resolution itself any injustice when I say that right there in that resolution is found authority for every proposition which has been advocated by any one on this floor, and which has been denounced as radical, as disunion, and as disloyal. Mr. President, there and then, and through that very resolution which I have just read, my colleague instructed the people of Wisconsin and the people of the Union that to reorganize those communities down there, it was necessary, not indeed for them to put the ballot into the hands of black or white men, into the hands of one class or another, but that it was necessary for them to do certain things, to incorporate certain provisions into their own constitutions, and to assent to an amendment to the Constitution of the United States. Did he ever instruct the people of Wisconsin, or would he, without repudiation and indignant rebuke, have allowed anybody else to say to the people of Wisconsin, that the United States could tell them to put a paragraph or a word into their constitution, or to strike it out; have allowed the United States to tell Wisconsin that she must assent to one proposition or another as a part of the Constitution of the United States? Certainly not. No one yet has ventured to tell any State in allegiance to the Government of the United States what sort of constitution she shall form, or what sort of amendments she must incorporate into the Constitution of the United States.

I am not controverting the truth of what was asserted in that resolution at that time; but I do say to my colleague, to you, sir, to the Senate, and to the world, if they would only listen, that the power which can tell the State of Georgia or the State of Alabama to assent to an amendment of the Federal Constitution, or to incorporate any especial provision into her own local constitution, can do all things that we have been asked to do, and can make them put anything else into their constitution, or assent to the putting of anything else into our Constitution that we believe to be right. If you find anywhere the authority to say to the people of Georgia or Florida, “You must incorporate one amendment into the Constitution of the United States before you can be restored to the roll of States,” you can tell them to incorporate anything else into that Constitution. Instead, therefore, of this resolution affording a justification for the votes which my colleague has given, or for those peculiar views which he has urged here, and which have been complained of in our State, I must say again, as I said before, that I think it affords the most ample justification for every proposition which has been urged by the great majority of his political friends here, and which he has complained of as radical if not revolutionary.

Mr. President, the minority of the committee appointed by that convention to draft resolutions did, as I understand, ask the convention to adopt two resolutions, one declaring in favor of admitting negroes to the right of suffrage in Wisconsin; and I do not recollect the phraseology of the other resolution, but it was to the effect that they ought to be admitted to the right of suffrage in this southern insurrectionary portion of the country. My colleague says that those resolutions were laid upon the table by an immense majority. The decision of the chairman of the convention was that they were lost, that the motion to lay upon the table had carried. I am not here to say that that was not the fact, because the convention was not divided; but I think I am warranted in saying that it could not have been by a very large majority of the convention, because I have been informed by a great many very candid gentlemen who were members of that convention that, judging by the sound, there was actually a majority against laying the resolutions on the table, but the chairman decided otherwise. I believe it was the last vote taken in the convention, after a great many members had left the building and left the town, when all were in a hurry to go. It was the last vote taken except the formal vote of adjournment, and the convention was not divided.

But, Mr. President, that the Union party of Wisconsin did think that the ballot ought to be put into the hands of the colored population in Wisconsin my colleague will not deny. That a very large majority of them voted in favor of putting the ballot into their hands, he certainly will not deny, for the record proves it. My colleague thought, and so advised, that it was unsafe to commit the party to that proposition. I thought otherwise then. I told him that I thought otherwise. I think otherwise now. With all the light which the late election has given me on the subject, I think it would have been wise for that convention to have recommended to the people of Wisconsin to accord suffrage to the few hundred black men within the limits of that State.

My colleague says that he voted for extending the right of suffrage and he advocated it before the people. I am glad to hear him say that he voted for it. I shall not undertake to say that he did not advocate it; but my colleague will allow me to say to him that if he did advocate the extension of suffrage in our State last fall, he did not do himself full justice; that he is capable of advocating a cause more ably, more conclusively, and, when he is advocating a good cause, as that was—he admits it or he would not have advocated it at all—he is capable of advocating it more successfully than he did that. I recollected, when he made this statement yesterday, a speech which he made in the city of Milwaukee, and which was published extensively through that State, and which was published in the National Intelligencer in this city, and was headed his "speech on negro suffrage." That was the only speech of his I ever saw or heard of advocating negro suffrage; and now I want to call his attention more particularly to one or two extracts from that speech, to vindicate what I have just told him, that it was not his best style of advocacy:

"Now, then, fellow-citizens, while I myself, more than twenty years ago, in the State of New York advocated the extension of suffrage to the colored men there, because I believed that a large majority of them were of sufficient intelligence to exercise that right, and although when it was submitted in Wisconsin I voted for its extension and expect to vote for it again when I go to the polls, I tell you I will not consent to make this question a matter of close communion in the Union party in Wisconsin. Gentlemen tell me that this is arguing from motives of expediency. Sir, it is arguing from the highest expediency, doing that which is right, and therefore is always the best. I maintain that at the present time the highest duty of the members of the Union party is to maintain their supremacy in the administration of this Government until the rebellion is over, and until the fruits of this struggle are gathered. It is not only suicidal but a crime of the highest magnitude as now to become divided and disorganized, and thus surrender the Government into the hands of a party who has opposed and embarrassed it during the prosecution of the war. You know very well and we all know that this matter of prejudice, for you may call it by that name, if by no other, is the most difficult of all things to manage in the human heart. You cannot reason with it, but it is a stubborn fact."

Now, Mr. President, I think I have read all there is in that speech in support of extending the right of suffrage to the negro. I am not complaining of my colleague for not saying any more last fall in defense of that law.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. My colleague will allow me to state, without interrupting him, that in the convention to which he refers, I stated the same, and also in all my speeches that were published. I perhaps did not argue it at length for we were fighting other matters than that question; we were fighting to carry the Union party, and we did it.

Mr. HOWE. I do not dispute but that my colleague might have said as much as this in the convention which he attended. I do not dispute but that he might have said as much as this at some other meetings that he attended in that State. All I am saying or insisting upon is, that it is not as much as he can say in defense of a cause that he has at heart and wants to carry. He can do better than that, and therefore I infer that the extension of the suffrage to the negro did not have his best efforts last fall. I think, Mr. President, that if he and if that convention had lent to that measure of right and of justice the full benefit, the full weight of their names and their indorsement, the vote of that State would have been given in favor of the law.

Sir, if you look at the return of that vote you will find that while in most precincts the vote for the extension of suffrage fell below that given for the State ticket somewhat, in a great many of the precincts they ran right along parallel to each other, indicating that the same individuals who voted for the State ticket voted for the extension of suffrage, showing to a great extent that it was a party question, so treated in those precincts. The men who made up the Union party in those precincts were just like the men who composed the Union party in all the other precincts; but it happened that in the towns there were here and there politicians who thought there was something to be made, some evidences of wisdom to be exhibited, by avoiding the question of suffrage, and their influence was given against it; and you could almost count the individuals who reduced the vote for negro suffrage below the vote given for the State ticket. If the convention had indorsed that measure, as they indorsed the State ticket, we should not have seen these evidences, I think; and I think so the more, because of a very peculiar fact not at that time known to my colleague, and I am sorry to say not known to myself. That peculiar fact was that the law of our State at that very time did secure to every adult colored man the right to vote. The advice that my colleague gave to that convention, and upon which they acted, was simply this: it is not safe for you to put into your platform a measure which stands as the law of the State to-day. In 1849, if I am not mistaken in the year, the people of that State, a majority of them voting upon the question, voted to extend the right of suffrage to this very class. It was decided by the canvassers at the time that that was not sufficient to clothe them with the right, and they never claimed or exercised it until the late election. Then they did claim it, and it was denied to them; a suit was commenced, and since that time the supreme court of the State have decided unanimously that the vote given sixteen years ago did confer upon them the right of suffrage; and my colleague will not insinuate, nor will any man that knows the individuals composing that court, that it was dictated or influenced in any degree by political or partisan feeling. No one will assert that. Nay, more, I have not yet seen the first paper uttering the opinions of the Democratic party in that State, which assails the soundness or the justice of that decision of the supreme court.

Mr. President, the three measures upon which my colleague has differed most broadly from his former political associates in this body, and which have occasioned the most regret, not to say grief, among our friends in the State of Wisconsin, I believe may be said to be first his action upon that proposition recently pending which proposed to declare that these rebel States should not send representatives back here except with the assent of Congress embodied in an act; secondly, the vote he gave upon the question submitted to the Senate, Shall the bill extending and enlarging the powers of the Freedmen's Bureau be passed notwithstanding the objections of the President? and thirdly, the vote he recently gave upon the proposition to pass the civil rights bill, so called, under the same circumstances and over the veto of the President.

Now, I must be allowed to say, and to say very frankly, that not only is no one of these votes sanctioned by the action of the late State convention in Wisconsin, but every one of them is condemned by the express action of my colleague himself. He himself has declared individually against every one of these votes. The record has been presented here over and over again, showing that two years ago he voted for a proposition declaring in very words that no one of these States should send back representatives here until the assent of Congress was declared.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will ask my colleague how he voted on that question; for or against it?

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President—

Mr. JOHNSON. If the honorable members will excuse me, I rise for the purpose of inquiring what is the question before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the vote refusing to admit the Territory of Colorado as a State into the Union be reconsidered?

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not see that this discussion has much reference to that question.

Mr. HOWE. I am surprised that the honorable Senator from Maryland does not see the point. [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not.

Mr. HOWE. If this is not germane to that question, I cannot conceive very well what should be. [Laughter.] I am very clear that it is germane to the debate which has taken place on the question, and I supposed that the present debate was strictly in order; therefore in carrying it out I supposed that I was strictly in order.

But to answer the question of my colleague, I believe the record shows that I did not vote on that question. I believe the investigation shows that I was engaged at the time on the Finance Committee. I want to say that if I had been here, I do not think there is any rational doubt that I should have voted for that proposition, because the record of the debates which have taken place here will show that I have made repeated demands since 1861 for such a legislative declaration as that was.

Mr. President, I refer to that little passage of history now in connection with the statement of my colleague that his vote was sanctioned by the State convention, simply, as I said, to show that not only the State convention was silent upon that precise point, but that he himself had committed himself to the doctrine which is now entertained by the great bulk of his friends on this floor.

The second vote which he gave here, and which has occasioned great regret among our friends at home, was the vote he gave on the passage of the Freedmen's Bureau bill, so called, over the veto of the President. The expediency of that measure, and its constitutionality, I suppose, he had himself declared, as I understand, having voted in favor of its passage when it passed the Senate. To that he had given his assent. Of course, when he voted for that bill he was not voting in defiance of instructions which the late State convention had given him. He did not understand that that State convention had incorporated anything into their platform which precluded him from voting for the passage of that bill. If he had, he would not have voted for it.

When the civil rights bill, so called, passed the Senate, I believe my colleague did not vote for it; but I believe he did say, subsequently, that if he had been in his place he should have voted for it; and would he have said so, will he assert now that he would have made such a declaration, if he had supposed that the late State convention had instructed him against giving any such vote? I do not conceive that he would have made any such declaration.

I conclude, therefore, that I am abundantly justified in saying that to each one of the measures upon which he has given a vote which has occasioned regret in our State he had previously given his assent. And now I think I have a right, and I think it is my duty, to plead these facts in defense, not of myself, nor by way of prosecuting my colleague for one moment or by one inch, but to plead them in justification of the action of the recent Legislature of Wisconsin. He asserts that that Legislature, in instructing him to resign or instructing him as to his votes, have themselves violated instructions given to them by the convention from which he says they originated. In the first place, I think, it is fair to say that the members of the Legislature are in no way bound by the action of that convention. The members of the Legislature represent precisely the same constituency that the convention did. They do not take instructions from any convention. It would be fair to say this, perhaps, of officers elected by the State and selected by the convention; but the members who represented that State in its Senate and in its House of Representatives were not selected by that convention, do not represent it, are not responsible to it. Secondly, I say once more, what I have already said, that the convention from which he says that Legislature sprang gave no such instructions as he has appealed to.

Mr. President, I believe this is all I need say in defense of the Legislature of Wisconsin. I cannot quit the subject without saying once more that my purpose in saying this is not in any way to attack my colleague. I thought I was bound to say something in defense of the Legislature. I believe they acted in entire good faith. I believe the difference of opinion which has developed between them and my colleague has occasioned them heartfelt regret; but that they have represented the loyal—no, I will not use that term now, speaking of political parties—that they have represented the Union party of that State, I must be allowed to say there is no longer any room or any excuse for denying. That should be conceded. It has become the fashion, which my honorable friend from Nevada [Mr. NYE] yesterday legitimated—it never was legitimate before—to read from letters extensively. As I received one yesterday from a gentleman who never allowed himself to be called anything but a Democrat until this war broke out, a gentleman holding a very high official position in our State, a position assigned to him by the Democratic party, and holding it in a very strong Democratic neighborhood and district, I feel tempted here, upon this point and in this connection, to read one paragraph. He has been known in our State since the rebellion broke out as a war Democrat, so classified in the nomenclature of parties in that State. He says:

"The Union party, including the war Democrats stand by Congress in Wisconsin, and no palaver will wheedle our people on this simple issue. We are for reconstruction on the basis of justice, and not for the incorporation of the rebel element without either reconstruction or justice. Congress is right and the President wrong on this issue."

Mr. DOOLITTLE. What is the name?

Mr. HOWE. My colleague asks me the name of the writer of this letter. I think I have described him so well that my colleague cannot be mistaken as to who he is; but I think every gentleman will see that I ought not to repeat his name because I have no authority for repeating it. I do not think he would hesitate to be held responsible for every sentiment that is there contained; but still, without having the authority to use his name, I certainly should not do so.

So much in reference to the State of Wisconsin and to the action of her Legislature; and being very much to my regret, on the floor, I believe I ought to say a word or two about the proposed State of Colorado. I would not allude to the subject only that I believe the Senator from Maryland [Mr. JOHNSON] rather insists that that is the pending question. [Laughter.]

Mr. DOOLITTLE. My colleague will allow me, before he enters on that subject, simply to say that I will not now take the time or ask the time of the Senate to discuss this question between the Legislature of Wisconsin and myself until those resolutions arrive here which it has been said were passed; but at some time I will take up the question and then I will consider the subjects which my colleague has to-day presented. I simply intended to reply to-day to what was stated by my honorable friend from Nevada [Mr. NYE] yesterday; but my colleague has gone into some two or three other matters; and when the resolutions come here, I will express myself in full upon the whole subject and will reply to what my colleague has said.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, that is all perfectly satisfactory, of course. I declared that I was about to say a few words on the pending question; but I am aware that I took the floor from my friend from Indiana, and I took it for the purpose of making this explanation, speaking on a point really irrelevant to the issue. I do not think I have a right to keep it for any other purpose, and I now yield it to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. Mr. President, I do not propose to enter at any considerable length into the general discussion of the subject before the Senate. I rise more especially for the purpose of performing an act of justice toward an old, long-tried, trusted, and true friend, whom I have known for thirty years. If the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] had contented himself yesterday with referring simply to considerations growing out of the condition of Colorado and what he regards as the exceptionable features in the constitution of that State, I should not have felt bound or called upon to say one word further in the discussion of this subject.

The Senator from Massachusetts undertook, however, to disparage statements contained in the pamphlet signed by the two Senators-elect from Colorado by reference to the report of the committee on the conduct of the war, in which the name of Governor Evans, one of the Senators-elect from Colorado, occurs. That report was made under a misapprehension of the facts. The evidence was taken first before three members of a committee consisting of nine, then before two, and finally, as I understand, only one member of the committee was present. They acted, doubtless, with perfectly fair and honest intentions, but they did injustice unintentionally to Governor Evans, as I am prepared to show by an abstract of all the documents bearing upon the subject. The report of the committee accuses Governor Evans of prevarication as a witness before that committee. The point in issue was this—

Mr. WADE. As I do not know that I shall make any speech on the subject, and allusion has once or twice been made to what occurred before the committee on the conduct of the war, I barely wish to say that at the investigation which is alluded to here I was not present, although my name appears as chairman of the committee appended to the report. The evidence of Governor Evans, and all the rest of the witnesses, will be found in the report precisely, I suppose, as it was taken down, and every one can consult that and ascertain how it was. I only wish to say that I was absent in New York and Boston prosecuting another investigation connected with that committee at the time Governor Evans's testimony was taken, and therefore had no connection with this.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. That is true; and if the Senator had waited one moment I should have so stated. I make no charge of unfairness against the committee. The evidence is all reported, word for word; but they misapprehended the character of Governor Evans's testimony, as the published facts will show to any candid mind. I have no doubt their report was perfectly fair. The report, however, charges Governor Evans with prevarication as a witness, in this: the charge was that the Cheyenne Indians were a friendly tribe; that they had been brought to Fort Lyon under the invitation of Governor Evans and the Indian Bureau to make a treaty; and that they were set upon by a Colonel Chivington and murdered, men, women, and children, a charge well calculated to shock the moral sensibilities of the whole people. The committee took it for granted, as it seems to me, in their report that that charge was true; and because Governor Evans did not indorse the charge they accused him of prevarication. Now, what were the facts, as shown by the report of the Indian Bureau and the Secretary of War, which I have before me? If any gentleman controverts what I say, I am prepared to prove every word that I shall say.

In the first place, these Cheyenne Indians were not friendly Indians; they were at war with the people of the United States; they had been engaged in indiscriminate slaughter, plunder, robbery, and murder upon the plains. To show that they were friendly Indians, the committee on the conduct of the war report the further fact that although they had seven white prisoners with them they had purchased the prisoners. The proof taken before the council is, that every prisoner had been taken from murdered trains upon the plains by the very men who had them, and there was no purchase in it.

The committee assumed another fact, that Governor Evans offered a premium to the people of Colorado to go out and scalp Indians, men, women, and children, friendly or unfriendly. I have the proclamation of Governor Evans here, word for word, in which he expressly excludes all friendly Indians; and who else? All who had been invited to Fort Lyon to enter into treaty, where the massacre is said to have occurred. I have the further fact that Governor Evans was not in the Territory at the time, and was no more responsible for that massacre than any member of this Senate. I have the further fact from the War Department and the Indian Bureau that long before this massacre Governor Evans had turned over the whole administration of Indian affairs in that Territory to the War Department. As Governor of Colorado he was ex officio superintendent of Indian affairs; but when war broke out, when troops were sent to suppress Indian hostility, he very properly turned over the whole management of Indian affairs to the War Department, and Colonel Chivington was there, not under any order of his, but simply under the orders of the War Department. He was in no way responsible for anything that happened at that massacre. He had not only the authority of the War Department, but he had telegraphed to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and resigned the administration into the hands of the officers sent there by the General Government.

Now, you see the entire unfairness of an attack upon one of the Senators-elect growing out of this state of things, and I am utterly astonished that the Senator from Massachusetts, without having read these documents and looked at these facts, which are incontrovertible, should have gone out of the record to make an attack upon a Senator-elect who has no right upon this floor to reply. I speak as an act of justice for one who has no right to speak for himself. I give voice to the dumb and voice to my sense of right and of duty in rebuking such an attack as this. I can see no possible reason for it. Suppose there was a personal objection to one of the Senators-elect, is that any reason why Colorado should not be admitted as a State? Try personal objections to the member when the member presents himself; but it does not in the slightest degree affect the right of Colorado to admission as a State upon this floor. I cannot see any possible object in it except as a mere make-weight.

The Senator from Massachusetts, it seems to me, too, departed from his usual courtesy and prudence in another thing, when he said there were known and avowed arguments, and there were arguments whispered in this Chamber, that these men should be admitted because we needed their votes. Now, I know the Senator from Massachusetts would not say that his fellow-Senators, all of them, or any one of them, would be influenced by an unworthy partisan motive to admit a State not entitled to admission simply to carry partisan measures. I know he would make no such charge. I have done but little whispering since my wooing days were over, and I speak here in language heard by all present. Whatsoever I think to be right I avow it. I did say the other day that I should vote for the admission of Colorado for this, among other reasons, that they were organized upon a thoroughly loyal basis; and I shall vote in view of that very identical reason. If I thought they were organized upon a disloyal basis, I perhaps should not be quite so ready to admit them on this floor; neither, I am persuaded, would the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts. They are organized on a loyal basis, and that, to my mind, is one reason why we should admit them. We may need their votes; we may need the votes of loyal men; we shall need their votes, doubtless, before this great controversy is over; and if they are entitled to admission on other grounds, that is surely no reason, to my mind, why they should be rejected, simply because they have been elected and their State has been organized on a loyal basis. The great controversy is transferred from the field of battle to this high Chamber, and we need votes and support here as much as we ever did during our military campaigns. I believe that Colorado should be admitted. I shall vote to admit her for good and substantial reasons, and among those reasons is the very fact that I regard her people as essentially and intensely and thoroughly loyal. For no mere partisan purpose—my purpose wises higher than party—for the good of the country, the safety of the country, and to prolong the lifetime of the nation, I wish loyal votes to be multiplied here.

But the distinguished Senator, in order further to disparage this pamphlet of the Senators-elect from Colorado, takes the ground that the surveyor general has said that agricultural interests cannot be successfully prosecuted in Colorado except by irrigation, and from that he argues that no great agricultural population can ever exist in Colorado. Does the history of the world prove that? Look at the agriculture of ancient Egypt, the granary of the world, upon which were built the great cities of Cairo, Memphis, Thebes, and Alexandria, which made that little peninsula the storehouse for the whole ancient world. Every grain raised and every vegetable sold there was the result of irrigation. That civilization which built those wonderful pyramids, the grandest conceptions in architecture of human genius, which have outlived the mutations of forty centuries and outlived even the memory of their founders, was based upon an agriculture the result of irrigation. How was it with the agriculture upon the Euphrates, the original site of our civilization, perhaps the original birthplace of the human family; and Babylon, wonderful Babylon, with her hundred gates commanding the whole East for five hundred years? All the agriculture that supported Babylon and the nations on the Euphrates was the result of irrigation. The agriculture that built the great city of Mexico and that inaugurated a civilization, under Montezuma and his predecessors, higher in point of fact than the civilization of their Spanish conquerors, was all the result of irrigation. The agriculture that sustained and built up the wonderful empire of the Incas, which resulted in those grand temples dedicated to the worship of the sun at which scholars yet wonder, was all the result of irrigation. Nor has that experiment failed here. The one hundred thousand people residing in the valley of the Salt Lake owe their daily bread to irrigation alone. Then supposing that irrigation may be necessary to develop the agricultural interests of Colorado, that is no reason why that cultivation should not be most eminently successful.

I shall not refer to the "grasshopper" argument, because my distinguished friend from Nevada [Mr. NYE] has, I think, sufficiently exhausted that subject. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, when I had occasion to address the Senate a few days since on this subject I gave very briefly my reasons for the admission of Colorado. I have not changed those reasons. Why is that admission opposed? Because there is not enough population there. That is a mere matter of guess-work and speculation; no one knows what the population amounts to, and each one comes to a different conclusion. The mayor of Denver says the population is probably thirty-five or forty thousand; the Territorial Legislature thinks it is as much as fifty thousand; some other gentlemen put it down at twenty-five thousand. Why do I vote, then, to admit them with this small population? Because even though they did not comply technically with the enabling act, they did comply substantially; and granting, in the language of the Senator from Massachusetts, that that enabling act is null and void and expired by its own terms, what had the people of Colorado a right to infer from the passage of that act? That Congress was willing that they should organize a State government; and although they did not comply with the terms of the enabling act, States have been admitted without any enabling act at all; and we are so far bound at least by the passage of that enabling act, that it was an invitation to them to come, an intimation that their coming would be welcome; and even though they had acted upon their own motion, taken their own plan and not ours, they had a right to infer that they would be welcome when they formed a State government.

I suppose, however, the real objection is the word "white" in this constitution. I have already said I should prefer that that word were not in the constitution of Colorado. I should prefer that that word was not in the constitution of any State in the United States. But I will not vote to exclude Colorado simply because she does not permit negro suffrage. I will not vote to exclude any of the rebel States simply because they do not permit negro suffrage. If I believe that they are essentially right and loyal in every other respect, and if they disfranchise their rebel voters, I would not stand upon this qualification, because the whole practice of the Government has been different. Why is it necessary to strike out the word "white"? Because, we are told, it is in contravention of that provision of the Constitution which says that Congress shall guaranty to each State in the Union a republican form of government. From the foundation of the Government down to the present hour that interpretation of the Constitution has never for one moment obtained in Congress or in any other department of the Government. Every single Territory has been organized without questioning the right to determine the qualification of voters. Every single new State has been admitted with the word "white" in its constitution. We have recognized them as republican in form for three quarters of a century. The grand triumphs of this country in three wars, and its grand improvement in material interests have all been brought out under this interpretation of the fathers that a State might be republican in form and still have the word "white" in it. I look forward in the future, and no distant future, when the force of public opinion, mightier in this land than an army with banners, will strike the word "white" out of every State constitution; but I do not propose to make this a test in the case of Colorado when it has never been made a test in the case of any other State or Territory.

I have no fancy for dipping buckets into empty wells and growing old drawing up nothing. I believe in a more practical statesmanship than that. Here you have a people of vast wealth and untold mining interests knocking at your doors for admission, with a full-framed constitution and legally elected officers, claiming representation upon this floor, and representing from thirty to fifty thousand people, and among that number there are, as I am told, some seventy or eighty negroes, all told; and because the negroes are not allowed to vote, they are not to be permitted to enter, and they are to be thrown across the pathway in the victorious march of this grand young empire midway between the Pacific and the Mississippi. We are to stop and have our hands tied because these seventy or eighty negroes are not permitted to vote. The distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, as it seems to me, is still dipping buckets into empty wells, and will grow old drawing up nothing.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I propose to say a few words upon the pending question. Several objections are made to the admission of Colorado, and the chief one seems to be that it does not contain the requisite population to entitle it to become a State in the Union. I have to say as to that objection, that there is no provision of the Constitution, no law of Congress, and no precedents in our history that require a Territory to contain any particular number of inhabitants to be qualified for admission into the Union. Territories have been admitted as new States with populations varying from 30,000 to 200,000; and no rule, therefore, has been established upon the subject; but each application has been decided upon its individual merits, and according to the circumstances under which it was made. Florida was admitted with a population of about 80,000 white people. Arkansas was admitted with about the same population of white people. Oregon, at the time of its admission as a State, did not contain more than 40,000 or 50,000 inhabitants; and so from the formation of the Government up to this time Territories have been admitted without respect to numbers, and the question of population has been subordinated to other questions that have concerned the admission of the Territory.

To insist that Colorado, under existing circumstances, should be admitted as a State, is not to controvert any principle established by the founders of this Government. When the Union was formed, the State of New York contained eight or ten times the population contained in the State of Rhode Island; Pennsylvania contained eight or ten times the population of the State of Delaware; but those small States were allowed equal suffrage in the Senate with the large States, and their proportionate power was preserved in the House of Representatives; and it is still preserved; and if Colorado shall be admitted, New York will have her thirty-one Representatives in the lower branch of Congress while Colorado will have but one.

Mr. President, I am almost persuaded that I see in these arguments that are urged against the admission of Colorado as a State, the shadow at least of that doctrine which has so long distracted the country and has finally developed itself in a protracted and bloody civil war. Objection is made to the admission of Colorado because it is not as large in population as the State of New York, or the State of Pennsylvania, or some other States of the Union, assuming that there must necessarily be some antagonism between the State of Colorado and the State of New York and other States, in consequence of which there is a necessity of preserving in the Senate the relative power possessed at this time by the State of New York, the State of Pennsylvania, or the State of Massachusetts. State power, State pride, State jealousy, State rights are more than intimated in this argument which is urged here against the admission of Colorado. Senators say in effect, will not the admission of Colorado, allowing her to have two Senators upon this floor, impair the State power of the State of New York? I have not heard the Senators from that State make the suggestion, but for that State it is suggested that she would be wronged if Colorado with her population should be admitted as a State into the Union. No doubt that the local interests of Colorado may need the immediate and exclusive attention of the Senators who may represent her upon this floor; but I undertake to say that in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred of general legislation, tending to the prosperity, greatness, and glory of this nation, Colorado would have the same interest as the State of New York; and there is therefore no necessary conflict or antagonism between the two States.

Sir, look at this subject in another point of view. Take that vast territory lying west of Iowa, of Arkansas, of Kansas, stretching from Mexico to British America, a distance of more than two thousand miles, spreading westward to the Pacific ocean, boundless and inexhaustible in all the elements and resources of national power and greatness and glory; that vast domain, with all its great future, at this time has only six Senators in Congress and five Representatives. And now, when it is proposed to admit two more Senators and another Representative from that vast region, a great outcry is made as though it was an effort to introduce into the councils of the nation some dangerous and foreign element of power.

Mr. President, who are these people in Colorado that are asking for admission as a State? Are they strangers, aliens, foreigners? Are they not our own acquaintances, our relatives, our friends? Did they not go out from the homes of New England and the middle States, carrying with them an undying attachment to the places of their nativity, to make new homes in this distant Territory? Are not these the persons who are asking for recognition here as a State? What good reason can be given, I ask, if these people are willing to assume the burdens and responsibilities of a State, why they should not be permitted to do so? I ask if the agricultural interests of the State of Ohio will be prejudiced by the admission of Colorado as a State? Will the manufacturing interests of the State of Massachusetts be prejudiced by the admission of Colorado? Will the commercial interests of New York be prejudiced by the adoption of this bill? Are not the people of that Territory as patriotic as any other people? Will they not coöperate with us in building up the national power? Is there anything in the circumstances or population of that Territory that should make the Senators from New York afraid to associate here with the Senators from Colorado?

Can any Senator show any way in which any prejudice will be worked to any portion of the United States by the admission of Colorado as a State? The interests of this Territory will be promoted by this change, as the people believe, and as I have no doubt; and when any step is taken to promote the interests of Colorado or any other one of these western States or Territories, it is a step which promotes the interests of all the States and all the Territories, for their interests are identical; they are bound up together in the same common destiny, and equally concerned in everything that relates to the welfare of our common country.

Objection is made by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] to the admission of Colorado because the people have not formed a State constitution in conformity with his wishes. I suppose that the theory which has been recognized, and will now be recognized, is, that the people of a Territory have a right to make their own constitution. If the doctrine which is advocated by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts be the correct doctrine, then it is unnecessary to pass any enabling act, but the most direct way would be for Congress to make a constitution, submit it to the people, and say to them, "Take this or take nothing." The argument is, that this constitution does not correspond with the wishes of members of Congress, and therefore ought not to be accepted.

Objection is made by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts that this constitution excludes black persons from the right of suffrage; but I desire to call the attention of that honorable Senator to the effect of his argument and his position. Here are twenty-five or thirty thousand white American citizens of the United States living in the Territory of Colorado; they come to Congress and say, "We have no choice in the selection of the men who govern us; we have no representation in Congress; we have no voice as to who shall be the Chief Magistrate of the nation; we do not enjoy the rights and privileges of American citizenship under this territorial organization; and we ask Congress to consent to a change, so that we may resume those rights and privileges of which we have been deprived by living under a territorial government;" and the honorable Senator meets these twenty-five or thirty thousand white people of that country with the objection that they shall not have these rights and privileges because they have seen proper by their constitution to exclude a few dozen of blacks from the right of suffrage!

Now, sir, when a proposition was before the Senate of the United States to organize the Territory of Idaho, I remember that the honorable chairman of the Committee on Territories, in discussing that question, said it was a matter of very little consequence as to whether the organic act did or did not exclude black persons from the right of suffrage, because there were no black persons there upon whom such a provision could take effect, and it was, therefore, a mere abstraction; and it is so substantially in reference to Colorado. It is more of an abstraction than anything else, and the honorable Senator from Massachusetts persists in this objection more to advocate a certain theory than to produce any practical results. If Congress is bound upon this occasion to determine whether the thirty thousand white people of the State of Colorado shall have the right of suffrage, or whether seventy-five or one hundred black men shall have that right—and that is the question presented—I ask if it is not wise and just on our part to extend to these thousands of white men the right of suffrage and their privileges as American citizens rather than to deny them those rights and privileges for the supposed necessity of providing similar rights and privileges for a handful of black people.

Sir, the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, I remember, delivered an elaborate and an eloquent speech here, not many days ago, in which he proclaimed in learned words and thundering sound the doctrine that taxation without representation was tyranny. The twenty-five or thirty thousand white people of the Territory of Colorado are taxed like the citizens of Massachusetts, and they have paid within the last year more income tax and more revenue tax than some of the States of this Union; and yet those people have no representation whatever in the Government which imposes these taxes. I take up what the honorable Senator then said; I apply it to this case; I answer his argument with it, and I say that taxation without representation is tyranny.

I suggest to the honorable Senator that he ought not to be severe upon the people of Colorado because they adopted a constitution in this form, for I will remind him that on the 3d of March, 1863, he voted, without question or objection, to organize the Territory of Idaho with an exclusion of black people there from the right of suffrage. I do not advert to this circumstance to show the inconsistency of the honorable Senator, for I acknowledge that the opinions of men everywhere have undergone great changes on this subject, but I do it simply to show that he ought not to be too harsh upon the people of Colorado because they thought in 1865 just as he thought in 1863. They live in a distant Territory; they live under the shadows of great mountains; they have no immediate communication with the States of the Atlantic slope, and it cannot be expected that they would change their opinions as suddenly as the honorable Senator may, who lives in the full blaze of the intellectual day that fills the State of Massachusetts.

Moreover, I say that the people of Colorado ought not to be censured because they put this provision in their constitution; for, at the same session at which their enabling act was passed, and about the same time, the question arose in Congress as to whether or not the act organizing the Territory of Montana should or should not exclude blacks from the right of suffrage, and after a long discussion and due deliberation, the Congress of the United States, at that time overwhelmingly Republican, determined that the act organizing the Territory of Montana should exclude blacks from the right of suffrage. In 1864 the Congress of the United States decided that the organic act of a Territory should exclude black men from the right of suffrage; and can Congress now, with any consistency, turn around and condemn the people of Colorado because they, about the same time, decided in the same way? Had they not good reason to suppose that this decision, under the precedents and under the circumstances, would be entirely acceptable to Congress?

I would prefer this constitution if it did not exclude any class of persons from the right of suffrage; but it does not follow that they will be perpetually excluded if we adopt this constitution. I cannot concur in what the honorable Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. DOOLITTLE] has said, that the time will never come when the States will adopt negro suffrage. I believe that the day is not far distant when the Constitution of the United States will be so changed as to entitle men of all classes, without distinction of race or color, to enjoy the elective franchise.

Mr. JOHNSON. The Senator from Wisconsin did not say, as I understood him, that the States never would agree to it. He only said they would not agree that Congress should pass a provision on the subject.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understood the honorable Senator from Wisconsin to say that they would never sanction a proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States extending the right of suffrage to black persons. He may be right in that opinion; I may be in error; but I have misjudged the signs of the times if the day is not approaching when all distinctions as to classes will be abolished, so far as the elective franchise and civil rights are concerned, in this country. The States are moving in this matter as States; and it is not to be supposed that the public opinion which will produce such a change in any of the eastern or northern or middle States will not reach across the mountains and the plains to Colorado and there produce the same effect. If this constitution shall be accepted and this State admitted, it may be, as predicted by the honorable Senator from Nevada, [Mr. Nye,] that within a year, or perhaps some longer but not remote period of time, this constitution may be so amended as to allow all men the right of suffrage.

The honorable Senator from Massachusetts said in effect, if I did not misunderstand him, that no man could consistently favor the admission of Colorado as a State under this constitution and at the same time insist that negro suffrage should be required of the States lately in rebellion. I think there is a vast difference between the two cases. If negro suffrage be required of the States lately in rebellion, it must be upon two grounds: first, because the black people of those States constitute a large proportion of the population; they are largely interested in all State matters and State questions, and there is such a deep-rooted prejudice against them that suffrage becomes necessary for them as a protection for their lives, liberty, and property; and again upon the ground that these black men have everywhere been unchangeably loyal to the Government during the late struggle, and by extending to them the right of suffrage we enable the loyal sentiment of that country to predominate over the rebel and disorganizing sentiment, and in that way secure the perpetuity, the peace, and the integrity of the nation. These are two good and valid reasons, if it be necessary to discuss that question at this time, that might exist for requiring negro suffrage in the lately rebellious States which do not exist so far as the Territory of Colorado is concerned; for there there is but a handful of negroes, a few dozen; and there is no feeling or prejudice, I imagine, in that Territory that would greatly endanger the substantial rights and privileges of the colored people.

Now, sir, I have this to say on the question of population: admitting that the population at this time is not sufficient in the estimation of honorable Senators, I claim that upon all principles of good faith Congress is estopped at this time from controverting that question. Whatever legal or technical questions may be made upon the enabling act, I say that Congress then deliberately decided that the population of that Territory was sufficient to justify it in becoming a State. So far as that question of fact is concerned, it was then decided.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I should like to ask the Senator from Oregon how we can be estopped on this question. I know that is a term in the common law in some of the courts, and there is a law of estoppel; but it cannot apply to this case.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not plead any legal estoppel upon Congress. I acknowledge that Congress has the physical and legal power to change its opinion, but I say that Congress did decide at that time that Colorado had a population sufficient to entitle her to become a State, and when that decision was made, the people of Colorado, acting in good faith, proceeded to form a State government.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I will ask the Senator, did that conclude us?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think, in good morals and in good faith, it did conclude us. I think when Congress has said to the people of a Territory, "You may go forward and form a State government, and when that State government is made we will allow you to become a State in the Union," and the people, upon the strength of that promise, proceeded to organize a State government and apply for admission and are rejected, they have a right to complain that they have been disappointed and not fairly treated by Congress.

It is said that this enabling act is functus officio, because the elections were not held in conformity with its provisions; but, sir, that is sticking in the bark. What difference does it make to Congress whether the election in Colorado was held in June or August or September? What difference does it make when or where or how a convention was held, so long as a constitution was formed and submitted to the people, and they adopted it, and upon that constitution ask for admission? The only legitimate objection which Congress can make at any time is that the population is not sufficient; I say Congress has made a decision which ought to conclude its action upon that question.

Mr. President, I have helped to make two Territories into States, and it is in vain for any man to tell me that a Territory is in as good a condition as a State. It is as unreasonable to expect that a Territory should have the same power, the same strength, and the same resources as a State, as it would be to expect of a child the strength of a man, or to expect that a community ten, twenty, or twenty-five years of age should have all the power and resources of a community that has been growing and improving for two hundred years. This Territory, according to my understanding, has a people who are willing to undertake the burdens and responsibilities of a State government. They believe that a State organization will promote their interests. They are the proper persons to decide upon that question; and it seems to me that when they ask to become a State, instead of meeting them with distrust and hostility, it is our true policy to take them by the hand, and say to them, "Come up higher and go with us, and we will do you good."

Sir, territorial organizations only result from necessity, and are incompatible with the spirit and genius of our Government; for under them American citizens are ruled by a Government in the making of which they have no voice. They are in a state of colonial dependence and subjection; and whenever the people in such a Territory are competent to maintain a State government, and desire so to do, it seems to me justice and good policy dictate the consent of Congress, for by the multiplication of new States we add to the greatness and power of the nation.

Mr. President, I claim that there is enough before us to justify and require Congress at this time to admit Colorado as a State. I hope, therefore, that the vote rejecting the bill will be reconsidered, and that we shall soon have an opportunity to see another State added to the American Union.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, if the question whether Colorado should be admitted as a State depended upon the height of her mountains, the richness of her valleys, and the productiveness of her placers, I would admit that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. Nye] has the force of the argument; but if it is to be decided upon the question whether first the proceedings organizing the State government have been regular or in conformity to law, and whether, in the second place, there is such a population there as entitles them to admission, I think there was not that weight in the Senator's argument that we had a right to expect.

The first question that naturally presents itself for our consideration is, whether Congress is now bound by the act which we passed in March, 1864, providing for the organization of a State government. I am not able to see that, as the Senator from Oregon says, we are in morals and in good faith bound by the action of Congress at that time. What did Congress do? Congress provided that the people at a time specified might elect delegates, that those delegates should convene and organize into a convention, and being thus organized, should frame a constitution for the people of that Territory, and that that constitution thus made should be submitted to the people for their approval or rejection. Such an election was held; the convention met; a constitution was framed; it was submitted to the people, and by a large vote, three to one, they rejected it. Now, I ask, was it competent for the people of Colorado to proceed further under the act of Congress? Could the people take another step under the act of Congress? They rejected the constitution that was formed pursuant to the act of Congress.

Then, sir, what is the nature of the proceeding which we are now called upon to indorse? If the Territorial Legislature of Colorado had provided for the calling of another convention, I would have given that legislative proceeding great respect and weight; but the Legislature did no such thing. In no authoritative and legal manner was the will of the people expressed upon that subject; but the chairmen of the three political parties there, of the Democratic party, the Anti-Slavery party, and the Union Central Committee, not authorized even by a convention of their respective parties, but upon their own motion, called a convention. That convention was held, and they adopted a constitution irregular in every respect, not having the stamp of legal authority in any respect whatever. The convention was held; a constitution was adopted by that convention and submitted to the people; and what was the vote? A vote giving a majority of but 155 in favor of the constitution thus so irregularly adopted. I ask Senators if there be anything in this proceeding that binds the conscience of Congress. The constitution adopted pursuant to the act of Congress stands to-day rejected by the people; and a constitution formed upon the motion of the chairmen of the political parties of the Territory stands indorsed but by the small majority of 155. Then, sir, I give no weight or authority whatever to the proceeding by which this constitution was adopted.

That brings us to the next question, which I consider the important one in this discussion; and that is, has the Territory of Colorado such a population as entitles it to admission? Upon the other subject, the weight that should be given to the proceeding under the act of Congress, and also upon the question of population, I call the attention of the Senate to the only information that was before this body when the enabling act was passed in regard to population. When the enabling act was before the Senate the distinguished Senator from Vermont, now dead, (Mr. Collamer,) asked this question:

"I wish to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Territories whether he has any information as to the extent of the population of this Territory?"

What reply was made? I read:

"Mr. WADE. Nothing that I can rely upon with a very great deal of confidence. I have taken some pains to ascertain the facts from the Delegate in the other House, and from Mr. Edmunds, of the Land Office, who has some information on that subject. I understand there must be now about 60,000 inhabitants in Colorado; some think a great deal more than that. That is the smallest number I find intimated by those who profess to know anything about it. It is a Territory which is filling up very rapidly. Judge Edmunds tells me that he has not the least doubt in the world that before they finish their arrangements and become a State there will be sufficient population there for a Representative in Congress according to the ratio of representation fixed by the last census. That is about the information I got."

That was the response of the chairman of the Committee on Territories to a question propounded to him when the enabling act was before this body, expressing the opinion that at that time there were 60,000 people in the Territory, and that the Territory was rapidly filling up and would soon have a population entitling her to a Representative in the other House. The Senate unquestionably acted upon that information. Was the chairman misled in regard to it? I think to-day he will admit that he was; that his statement to the Senate, upon which the Senate acted, was not reliable. He relied upon information that he received from the Delegate and from another party that he mentions, and that information now proves not to have been reliable. What have we now before us that is reliable? In the first place, we have the census that was taken in 1861. At that time the population of the Territory was 25,329; and upon that population the Territory at the first election thereafter was enabled to give a vote of 10,580. With a population of 25,000 a vote of 10,000 was cast. What does the vote since that time indicate? It shows the fact that at every election from that time to this the population of Colorado has been decreasing instead of increasing, until when the vote was taken upon the constitution that is now before us in September, 1865, the aggregate vote was 5,895. Less than 6,000 votes were cast when it is claimed this constitution was adopted or ratified by the people. It is claimed by the Senator from Nevada that a vote is not a very satisfactory indication of the population. The vote in 1861, perhaps, did not very clearly indicate the population. What were the people voting on then? Upon the election of a Delegate, the trifling matter of selecting one man for an office instead of another man. In 1865 they came to cast their votes upon the most interesting and exciting question that can ever be presented to any free people, the question whether they shall adopt a State government and what sort of a State government they shall adopt; and upon that question, that is calculated to call out the last voter of the Territory if they take any interest in their great questions at all, they could command less than 6,000 voters.

Mr. STEWART. Is the Senator aware that immediately after that, in the fall of 1865, in the election of State officers, 7,000 votes were cast?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Yes, sir, I am aware of that fact.

Now, sir, assuming that a population of 25,000 in 1861 could give a vote of 10,000, then what population does a vote of 6,000 in 1865 indicate? Just 15,000. On the same ratio, upon a more interesting question, instead of having 25,000, according to the vote in 1865 the Territory has a population of but 15,000, if we make an estimate upon the vote that was cast upon this constitution. Then I assume that the Territory at the time of the adoption of this constitution had a population of less than 20,000. I have a right to assume that it is but 15,000, taking your calculation from the vote that was cast.

But, sir, the Senator from Oregon, with great force and earnestness, appeals to us to give to these people the right to vote for President of the United States, to control the legislation of Congress, to control the financial policy of the Government. He referred in his remarks to these matters; and to give force to his argument he alludes to the position of the Senator from Massachusetts, that taxation without representation is tyranny. Sir, is it possible that a small community in the formation of the laws shall have the same voice that a great community shall have? Representation must be equal and just, else representation of itself becomes tyranny. If you say that 15,000 persons in Colorado shall have the same voice in the legislation of the country that the 1,300,000 people of Indiana have, you adopt a tyranny as oppressive as to deny representation altogether. What has been the policy of the Government upon this question? The first position assumed by the Government was before the adoption of the Constitution, in the celebrated Ordinance of 1787, by which it was provided that out of the Territory of the Northwest, which now has in this Union such great empire States, there might be formed three or five States, but that no State should be admitted until it had a population of 60,000, about double of what was then the ratio of representation in the House of Representatives; and my colleague and I represent a State that came into this Union under that provision. The people of Indiana had no voice in the making of the Federal laws, the people of Indiana had no voice in the selection of the President of the United States, until they could number 60,000, until they could show a population entitling them to a Representative in the other House. But now it is claimed as tyranny if this Territory with a population of 15,000 shall not have a voice in the Senate of the United States, equal to the 1,300,000 people of Indiana.

Why, Mr. President, contemplate the proposition of the Senator from Oregon for a moment. He says that it is an act of injustice, that it is an act of tyranny, if the people of Colorado shall not have a voice in the selection of a President of the United States. Her population, in comparison with the population of the State which my colleague and I represent, is about as one to ninety. In the Senate of the United States one man in Colorado will have the voice of ninety men in the State of Indiana. Is that equality? Is that democracy? Is that justice? Or is it tyranny? And when you come to select a President of the United States in 1868, is it right, is it just, is it consistent with the policy of our Government, that one man in Colorado shall have the voice of ninety men in Indiana? How many it would be in New York, I know not. But the Senator says he has heard no complaint from New York; no complaint from the great State of Pennsylvania. As one of the representatives from Indiana, I differ from my colleague, and I am not willing that in the selection of a President at the next great election, which is to be a very sensitive period in our history, one man in Colorado shall equal ninety of the men whom I represent. It is not according to the policy of the Government. It is not according—

Mr. STEWART. I should like to inquire of the Senator how he figures that out. He says that Indiana, as compared with Colorado, estimating her population at fifteen thousand, has ninety to one in population; but Colorado will not have the same number of votes in electing a President that Indiana has.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The criticism of the Senator is right in respect to the election of a President. I have not made the calculation as to what would be the disproportion in the election of a President. I made my calculation in respect to the voice in the passage of laws through this body, and then applied it without very much reflection to the election of a President. The disproportion would be very great, and it would give to a man in Colorado far greater power and voice in the selection of a President than to a man in the State of Indiana. As to the two electors that are based upon the senatorial representation, my argument is correct. Colorado at the next presidential election, if she is admitted, will elect two senatorial electors, and those two senatorial electors will cast a vote equal to the two senatorial electors that are selected by the 1,300,000 people of Indiana. In respect to the two senatorial delegates, my argument is correct, that one man in Colorado would have a voice equal to ninety men in Indiana.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Do I understand the Senator from Indiana to say that the policy of our Government and the Constitution of our Government require equality in these things?

Mr. HENDRICKS. No, sir, I do not say so.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Take the State of Delaware, take the State of Florida, which the Senator is so anxious to get in, and he will find an inequality, if not so great, yet very great between those States and the State he so ably represents here. It is not the policy of our Government, I apprehend, to have equality in these things, and we do not have it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The existing inequality in the Senate of the United States was so ably discussed by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCKALEW] some time since, and has been answered, or attempted, at least, to be answered by some Senators, that it is not necessary now for the Senator from Iowa or myself to rediscuss that question. The fact that there is inequality in the old States that came in as colonies into the Union and helped to make this Government does not justify us in carrying that inequality beyond any point known in our history heretofore. In 1787, as I have said, when a territorial government was given to the Northwestern Territory, it was required that before the admission of a State from that Territory there should be a population entitling the State to two Representatives in the House—a population of sixty thousand. I believe the same provision is found in the territorial government for the Southwestern Territory, and in the territorial government for the Territory of Louisiana, showing a policy and purpose by our forefathers; and I understood the chairman of the Committee on Territories to say that that has been the sentiment constantly from the foundation of the Government up to the present time, sometimes, for particular reasons, departed from, as in the case of Kansas.

Mr. STEWART. Was it not departed from in the case of Florida and Arkansas to a greater extent than in the case of Kansas? Neither of them, as I understand, had as much as fifteen thousand.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I was quoting the remark of the Senator from Ohio as authority. If the Senator from Nevada is not content with the argument that I present, I shall be obliged to him if he will answer it when I get through.

The Senator from Ohio, in the argument of this question a few weeks since, when he opposed the admission of Colorado with very great ability, stated, as I understood him, that the policy of the Government had been, though sometimes departed from under peculiar circumstances, to require a population entitling the people to a Representative in the House of Representatives. Now, sir, it would require about one hundred and twenty thousand to secure a Representative in the House of Representatives; and here with a population, upon the best information we can get, of about fifteen thousand, it is asked to give two Senators and a Representative to Colorado. I think the people of Indiana will hardly be satisfied with the argument of my colleague, based upon the loyalty of the people of Colorado, when he says, that in the making of the laws, so far as they depend upon the action of the Senate, and in the selection of a President of the United States, so far as it depends upon senatorial electors, he is willing to give to the people of Colorado, because of their assumed loyalty, a voice ninety times greater than to the men of Indiana.

Mr. President, it is claimed that the Territory can be very much more prosperous with a State government than with a territorial government. I have never lived under a territorial government, and have not the experience of the Senator from Oregon or the Senator from Nevada in that respect; but why is it that a Territory may not be prosperous? Why may she not be comparatively independent in the regulation of her own domestic affairs? She does not have the selection of her Governor, or of her judges; but she selects all her local officers; she selects her Legislature. Her Legislature, by the laws which it enacts, regulates all her domestic affairs. If they need a combination of wealth, the Territorial Legislature may establish corporations, and may do all those things which the local interests of the people may require. I think the history of the Territories does not support the Senator from Oregon in the position that they are less prosperous during their territorial existence than afterward. I think there is not much weight in the argument of the Senator from Oregon and the Senator from Nevada upon that point. The Territories up to this time have not complained, so far as I know, of the legislation of Congress that applies to them. It seems to me to have been just and fair; and in respect to their domestic affairs, they regulate them for themselves.

I have said about all that I desire to say on this question. I know of no change that has taken place in the population of Colorado or in the regularity of the proceedings by which this constitution was adopted since this bill was rejected by the Senate. I am curious to know what shall change the judgment of Senators in regard to it. My colleague says that he has not joined in any whispering that we need two additional Senators here, and yet he did say before he closed his speech that he was glad to have additional Senators if they represented a loyal constituency. Mr. President, I shall, as readily as my colleague, as readily as any other Senator, welcome Senators who come here from new States with a population which justly, fairly, and rightly entitles them to seats in this body; but I am not prepared to say that the small population of Colorado shall have an equal voice in the Senate with the large population of Indiana.

Mr. STEWART. There have been several allusions in the debate to the fact that this bill has been once defeated. I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that it was not defeated in a full Senate. The votes against it were only 21, and those for it 14, so that there were only thirty-five Senators voting. When we have a full Senate there are forty-nine here, there being twenty-five States represented. I say consequently that vote was not a fair test when there were only thirty-five members voting.

The assumption that the population of Colorado is only 15,000 is not a fair statement of the case. I think, myself, that the population is small; but placing it at 15,000 is certainly a very great exaggeration—a greater exaggeration than it would be to place it at 50,000. From the evidence fairly before us it is shown that at the last election for State officers they cast over seven thousand votes. Gentlemen say that is just as good a criterion of the amount of population as the vote in 1861 was. I deny it. Since that time families have been moving in; there were not so many miners roaming over the country that are only transient; there is a more settled population, and the numbers of voters in proportion to the population now is not as great as it was in 1861.

In 1861 they were huddled together in one or two small mining camps. Now they are scattered all over the Territory, and many of them following agricultural pursuits with their families. A vote of 7,000 now would indicate a larger population than a vote of 10,000 did when they were in one or two mining camps all voting, all males, before they had brought their families there. The population has changed from a mining to an agricultural one to a great extent, and the vote of 7,000 of last year to me indicates a larger population than a vote of 10,000 would situated as they were in 1861, not having extended their population over the Territory and being huddled together where they could all readily vote. Now they have spread over the Territory; they have brought their families; and a vote of 7,000 at this time indicates to my mind a population of at least 35,000, because they are so situated that they do not come to the polls so regularly; they are a long distance from the polls; they have settled in the little valleys all over the country as any person traveling through will see. I am justified, then, in saying that a vote of 7,000 at this time indicates a larger population than a vote of 10,000 would situated as they were in 1861; and I think that when we have before us the fact that they cast 7,000 votes it is an extreme exaggeration to say that their population does not exceed 15,000.

But Congress has passed upon the question of population. The Senate twice passed upon it by passing an enabling act in 1863, and again in 1864. The population is certainly as great now as it was then, and is increasing, and the prospects before the Territory are infinitely superior to what they were in 1864. In 1864 they were cut off by an Indian war; they were embarrassed in every possible way; their prospect for the future was gloomy to what it is now. The rebellion is over; they have a railroad approaching them very rapidly; they have learned something of irrigation, and they have learned, too, how to dispose of grasshoppers, so that they will not be so ruinous perhaps as they were before. The grasshopper question, the irrigation question, and the Indian war question are all better understood. The prospects of the country are good. The mines have proved to be very rich. The various ores are being worked now to better advantage, and the Territory is in a much better condition than it was in 1864. It has a larger population than it had when you passed on the question; and I say, with the Senator from Oregon, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] that it would be bad faith, after having given this invitation, and after this constitution has been formed and these representatives have come here, to change the invitation and deny them admission. Hereafter if you want to establish a different rule, establish it; but now, under all the circumstances, I say that upon any fair construction of these votes there is a larger population in Colorado than there was in 1864, and everything connected with that Territory shows that it is better able to support a State government, with better prospects, than when you passed the enabling act, and I contend that it is bad faith to deny them admission.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Mr. President, I wish it were quite as convenient to think as to talk, for in thought there is counsel, but in words there is often great want of wisdom. I said yesterday that on the former occasion I was in error as to facts which led me to a wrong conclusion. There is no man on this Senate floor more concerned in building up the interests of the mountains and the Pacific and the great West than myself; I have labored in it from my youth upward; but I cannot justify myself to myself in sustaining this measure, for the reasons that I will state briefly, for I do not propose to go into a discourse or make it matter of argument.

This Government was organized upon a system. In this Senate Chamber each State is represented by two Senators, although it may be entitled to but one Representative in the other end of this building. To adjust the equilibrium was one of the great troubles of our grandsires. That for some factitious purpose a State should be introduced not possessing the qualifications that should justify it in claiming a member of the House of Representatives would be a wrong upon the system as it has been best understood. What are seven thousand votes in the Territory of Colorado? I speak with a knowledge that is not uninformed, for I have lived on the frontier from my young manhood, and inhabited about that part of the world, and I was in Colorado, I believe, before any gentleman on this floor. Seven thousand votes there would indicate a population of about fifteen thousand, not more. It has been regarded heretofore as a rule that no State should come into the Federal Union until her population would come up to what was required by the enumeration for a member of the House of Representatives. I do not remember the precise number now required, but I know it is something over one hundred thousand. Two Senators in the Federal Senate for a population of fifteen thousand would be a great injustice; and to that injustice I cannot be a party. I did vote for this bill in the first instance. I did it for the reason that I want to build up the interests of the Pacific and the mountains; but I cannot on consideration agree to such a wrong. This is not a community yet established; its foundations have not yet been laid. When they are well laid, with the proper population, a well-organized society, then they shall be of the community of States by my voice, but not now.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, I was not present in the Senate at the time the vote was taken rejecting the bill. Had I been here I should have voted for the bill, and I regret very much that I did not happen at that time to be in my seat, because I have a very strong conviction of the expediency and propriety of admitting Colorado as one of the States of the Union.

There appear to be two objections raised against the admission of Colorado. The first is insufficient population according to the opinion of some gentlemen, and the second is that the right of suffrage as defined in the constitution itself is too limited in excluding colored persons.

Now, sir, I confess that I do not regard either of these objections of sufficient weight to induce me to vote against the admission of Colorado. I consider the objection based upon the alleged insufficiency of the population in point of numbers as out of place entirely. On the 21st of March, 1864, Congress declared in very plain terms that—

"The inhabitants of that portion of the Territory of Colorado included in the boundaries hereinafter designated, be and they are hereby authorized to form for themselves, out of said Territory, a State government with the name aforesaid, which said State when formed shall be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatsoever."

It is said that this statute, which in its subsequent clauses provides the mode by which the people shall organize themselves into a State, has spent its force and become functus officio; and we are therefore called upon, by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts especially, to pay no regard to the act of 1864. I do not regard the statute in that light; I do not regard it as having spent its force. I regard this first section, which I have read, as containing a pledge of the Government of the United States to the people of Colorado that whenever they shall form themselves into a State and provide for themselves a government, they shall, so far at least as population is concerned, be admitted into the Union.

I have said we passed this statute in March, 1864, and in the same breath we passed another statute giving the same privilege to the Territory of Nebraska, and another giving the same privilege to the then Territory of Nevada; and we did it at a time when the population of these several Territories, as ascertained by the official agents of the Government who took the census in 1860, was as follows: the population of the Territory of Colorado at that time, according to the census from which I give these figures, was 34,277; that of Dakota Territory 4,837; that of Nebraska Territory 28,841; and that of the then Territory of Nevada, perched like an eagle's nest upon mountains, was 6,857.

The people of the Territory of Nevada proceeded regularly, as required by the statute, to institute for themselves a State government at a time when they certainly had not a smaller population than six thousand eight hundred and fifty-seven. The probability is that in 1864, when they went through the process of forming themselves into a State government, the population was larger, but what it was I am not now able to say. It was certainly, as I presume, not greater than the population of Colorado. If I am wrong in this my friend from Nevada will be able to correct me. We have admitted Nevada as a State of the Union, which in 1860, being then a Territory, had a population of only six thousand eight hundred and fifty-seven inhabitants.

If the Territory of Colorado in 1864 possessed a sufficient population to justify Congress in granting them the privilege of forming themselves into a State government, and if, as is indubitably the truth, that population has not diminished since then, upon what ground is it, I ask, that gentlemen allege insufficient population as a reason for refusing admission to Colorado? I insist, sir, that so far as Congress are concerned, so far as the spirit of the law is concerned, we are estopped from insisting upon this objection.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Will my friend from Michigan allow me to ask him, is there any such thing as an estoppel as against a judge on the bench, he being bound to do justice? Is there any such thing as an estoppel where one has authority? It may be applied to parties litigant, but not to the judge.

Mr. HOWARD. I am not speaking of technical estoppels in trials at law. We all know right well that estoppels are mutual. What I mean to say is that we are upon every political and moral principle precluded from urging now, as an objection against the admission of Colorado, that she has not sufficient population, because we acted upon that identical question in 1864, and said to Colorado and said to the whole nation that Colorado then possessed a sufficient population to justify us in forming her into a State.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Allow me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Michigan yield the floor to the Senator from California?

Mr. HOWARD. With a great deal of pleasure. I hope my learned friend from California will now indicate his ideas in a tone of voice which will enable me to catch them on this side of the Chamber.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Only one word. Suppose I was wrong then; suppose I acted unadvisedly—

Mr. HOWARD. That is not a supposable case.

Mr. McDOUGALL. And I change my opinions, have I not a right to express it by my voice? Answer me that.

Mr. HOWARD. I suppose, according to the Senator's speech, he has availed himself of that high privilege of changing his opinion and changing his vote. I will now ask him a question; and that is, whether he did not vote for the act of 1864, giving this privilege to Colorado?

Mr. McDOUGALL. I believe I did.

Mr. HOWARD. And I think, as I am informed, he voted for the bill which was recently under discussion in this Chamber.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Yes, sir; I did.

Mr. HOWARD. And made a speech, too, a very good speech, undoubtedly, in favor of it. Most undoubtedly every gentleman has a right to change his opinion; but I say that without further light upon a given subject, without further facts to justify such a mental mutation as my friend from California seems to have undergone, he can scarcely say that he has a moral right so to change his opinion as to change the proper course of legislation upon the question.

However, sir, that is a question which he must settle for himself. I cannot act as casualist in so grave a matter. He must be his own judge.

Mr. McDougall. The Senator from California takes care of his own conscience.

Mr. Howard. I hope he has a very considerable task at times in doing so. [Laughter.]

Mr. McDougall. Very.

Mr. Howard. And now, Mr. President, I think that I have answered that objection, certainly in a manner satisfactory to my own mind, however unsatisfactory I may have been in regard to the minds of others.

The next objection relied upon by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts appears to be that the constitution which has been actually framed and is now before us is not in perfect accordance with that clause of the enabling act which requires that the constitution shall not be repugnant to the Constitution of the United States nor to the principles of the Declaration of Independence; and he seems to hold that the restriction upon the right of suffrage found in the constitution of Colorado, by which all persons who are not white persons are excluded from the electoral privilege, is a departure from that clause of the enabling act, the clause in the State constitution declaring that every white male citizen of the age of twenty-one years, &c., shall have the right to vote.

I do not understand that this is any violation of or departure from the principles of the Declaration of Independence. I was never able to discover in the Declaration of Independence that it was the right of every person, white and black, to vote at the polls. There is certainly no such clause contained in it, and I believe it has never received such a construction.

Mr. Sumner. I would ask my learned friend if the Declaration of Independence does not contain the proposition that all men are equal in rights.

Mr. Howard. The Declaration of Independence declares that "all men are created equal."

Mr. Sumner. That means equal in rights.

Mr. Howard. And that "they are endowed with certain inalienable rights."

Mr. Sumner. Then permit me to ask him, does it not go further and say that all just government stands on the consent of the governed? My learned friend will see that by this constitution one whole class is excluded.

Mr. Howard. I see plainly that one whole class is excluded by this constitution. That is very true; but it does not follow from that fact that it is a violation of the principles of the Declaration of Independence, in my judgment. I suppose that notwithstanding the Declaration of Independence, it is the right of every organized political community to regulate the right of suffrage according to the opinions and desires of a majority of that community. When we come to the question of government in a republican country the great and only final test is the will of the majority, whatever may be the component parts of the population. If, therefore, it be the will of a majority to exclude certain classes from the right of suffrage, where that will is exercised freely, I do not know any higher law pertaining to a republican government than that will. It must be submitted to. It may be right or it may be wrong in point of morals, in point of philosophic principles, but it must be submitted to as a practical rule of conduct, whatever may be the theory in regard to it.

I do not, I confess, Mr. President, regard this restriction of the right of suffrage in the Colorado constitution as of importance enough to withhold my vote from the bill now under consideration. If there was a large portion of the people of Colorado who were colored, if they were an important portion of the population, the question would then present itself in a different aspect, and it might become a very serious question whether they ought not to be admitted to a participation in the privileges of government; but as I understand it, the number there is only some forty or fifty.

Mr. Sumner. One hundred.

Mr. Howard. Suppose there are 100, and suppose the population of the present Territory of Colorado to be 30,000 or 35,000 or 40,000 or 50,000; I ask you, sir, especially as Congress has already passed upon this question, according to my apprehension, whether we ought now to hesitate and to keep the State out of the Union simply because her people happen to have exercised the same right, the same power, be it right or wrong, which is exercised in the constitution of almost every other State in the Union.

Mr. Sumner. Do I understand my learned friend as arguing that you may deny rights to one hundred persons but you may not deny them to a thousand?

Mr. Howard. I leave that question to the decision of the majority of the people of Colorado as the best test, as the most satisfactory rule for my conduct at present, especially as the number of that class of persons is so very small. I beg to say, however, and this I speak from my deepest convictions, that I think the time is not far distant when every citizen of the United States, black or white, ought to be and will be admitted to the right of suffrage. I could wish it were otherwise in the present case; I could wish that the people of Colorado in forming this constitution had seen fit to omit the word "white" as a qualifying provision before "person," in reference to suffrage, and I shall vote under the expectation that that generous and enterprising people who have done so much according to their numbers to uphold the Government of the United States during the late war will see to it hereafter that this error shall be corrected in their constitution, and that all persons, black and white, shall be permitted to vote in that State. I hope the same principle will be carried throughout the States, and that we shall all live to see the day—I expect to live to see it, and at no very distant period—when there shall be no such distinction in respect to suffrage as "colored" or "white." I believe that it is as much the right of the colored man to vote at an election as the white man; but still we must look to these matters in a practical sense; we must contemplate them as practical questions of legislation, and not as mere theoretical questions.

But, sir, it is said that this constitution originated irregularly, without the sanction of law, and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. Hendricks] has passed some severe criticisms on this feature of the case. I do not regard this constitution as having originated without law. I look upon the statute of 1864 as containing, as I before remarked, a pledge to the people of Colorado that they should come into the Union, as a pledge to them of the privilege of forming a State constitution, Congress having adjudged that their numbers were sufficient and that their situation at that remote point was such as to make it necessary and proper that they should form a State constitution and be admitted into the Union. It is very true that certain provisions of the act of 1864, relating to the proceedings to be taken in the Territory, had lapsed and ceased to be operative in consequence of the lapse of time. In such a question as this, Mr. President, is the mere lapse of a few months' time of such importance as to justify gentlemen in saying that Congress is under no obligation to the people of Colorado? We know very well that in all legal proceedings, even in proceedings of the most solemn character, where life itself is at stake in a court of justice, the court, in most cases, holds time to be merely immaterial; it is the substance of the thing to which the court looks; and it seems to me, in this case, it is the substance, it is the promise, the encouragement, the pledge which we in our sincerity held out to the people of Colorado, that ought to govern us, and not the mere question of the lapse of time.

Now, sir, I have not heard any complaint made that in the proceedings preliminary to the election of delegates to the convention that framed this constitution there was any fraud or unfairness whatever. The Senator from Massachusetts has made no such allegation. He does not pretend, nor does any Senator pretend, that the mode of taking the vote was unfair, that there was any fraud or corruption in the whole proceeding; and I take it that if Senators are silent upon this, which would appear to be a very grave objection, it may be taken for granted that the proceedings were entirely fair; that although the constitution originated spontaneously with the people, and was carried forward by their consent until it finally became consummated in the form of a constitution, that is no reason whatever why we should disregard the constitution itself, or look upon it with suspicion.

I have in my mind, sir, a precedent which may not be without its interest on this occasion. It is one relating to my own State. The State of Michigan organized itself under an act of the territorial government of the Territory of Michigan, and utterly without the sanction of Congress or any fundamental law, in the year 1835. It called a convention, which assembled, framed and adopted a State constitution, and that constitution was submitted formally to the vote of the people of the Territory in the fall of 1835, if my memory serves me, and the people of the Territory assented to the constitution and ratified it. Subsequently, in 1836, Congress passed an act declaring that Michigan should be admitted into the Union as a State, provided a convention of her people should give their assent to a change of her boundaries on the southern border. The Senator from Ohio, perhaps, is old enough to recollect that rather stirring controversy between his great and gigantic State and the little Territory of Michigan. The Territory of Michigan called a convention in pursuance of a regular territorial statute. That convention met and took into solemn consideration the proposition of Congress to assent to a change of boundaries which stripped us of several townships on our southern border, and decided that they would not consent to it; and the convention dispersed and went home. The Democratic party, then entirely omnipotent in the State, discovering that it might be necessary in order to give strength to Mr. Van Buren, who was then a candidate for the Presidency, took upon themselves, through their leaders, to call a popular convention, which the boys at that time were in the habit of calling the frost-bitten convention. A vote was taken in a most irregular manner throughout the Territory, without oath, without challenge, without any of the forms of law ordinarily observed at such elections. Another convention was elected in this irregular way; that convention assembled together, although it was supposed that the law itself had spent its force under which the former convention was called, and gave the assent of the Territory to this change of boundary; whereupon a no less distinguished individual than Andrew Jackson, then President of the United States, issued his proclamation, founded entirely upon the assent of this irregular popular convention, and announced to the people of the United States that the State of Michigan was admitted into the Union. I do not refer to this precedent as one to be followed in all cases. At the time I regarded it more as a warning and as an admonition for the future than as a thing to be approved; but there it is upon the statute-book, and there is the proclamation of President Jackson, and here stands Michigan to-day admitted into the Union in virtue of such a popular decree.

Mr. President, I have consumed more time than I intended upon this subject. I regard, as I said before, the statute of 1864 as holding out to the people of Colorado the pledge of Congress, that upon the formation of a constitution by them which is republican in form, and not inconsistent with the Declaration of Independence, they shall be admitted into Congress as one of the States of the Union on an equality with the other States; and I shall vote to reconsider the bill, and I hope to have the good luck to vote for the bill upon its final passage and to see it adopted by a very respectable majority of the Senate.

Mr. Edmunds. Mr. President, as I feel constrained to vote against this reconsideration, and as the reasons which impel me to that course are somewhat different in degree, if not in kind, from those which have been advanced by other Senators upon this floor, I beg the indulgence of the Senate for a very few moments while I state them.

The principal objection which induces me to oppose the admission of this Territory at this time, and to oppose it in spite of the personal respect and esteem which I feel for the distinguished gentlemen who would otherwise represent her in this body, is found in the nature of the constitution itself which she has presented, rather than in the irregularity with which it has been adopted or in the want of a sufficient population to entitle her to admission; and I presume that nobody will question that I misrepresent Vermont on this question when I say that it grows out of this much discussed word, "white."

In my own State from its foundation, when it was an independent State for many years, not a member of the Union, its constitution from the beginning to this day has adhered to what I understand to be the principles of the Declaration of Independence thoroughly. It has tolerated no distinctions between human rights of one race and another, or of one color and another, or of one sect and another. While my State, as all other States do, recognizes distinctions among men, while it acknowledges the paramount right and the paramount duty of a majority of the whole people to determine what are the true qualifications of electors, it discards the dogma of delusion and of wrong which declares that these qualifications and distinctions are to rest upon unreal and accidental foundations. Its laws always have, as the laws of all States do, provided that lunatics, non compos, criminals, and a variety of classes of persons upon whom the law under similar circumstances operates equally everywhere, are not entitled to exercise a voice in the government of the State.

Now, sir, in the case we have before us, independent of the question what are State rights, independent of the propriety of anything in the constitution of any State which already exists, we are called upon, in the exercise of a constitutional power, to decide as a matter of propriety for which we are responsible, what is fit and necessary to be contained in the constitution of a State which we are about to admit. We have entire power over the subject. It appeals to our sense of justice and to our duty to the country. It appeals to that sense of justice and to that duty in the lessons we have derived from the past and the hopes which we have for the future. I am not to be told, for one, that the rejection of a constitution because it imposes the qualification of color upon its electors is a thing that has never been done before. As the honorable Senator from Massachusetts said the other day, when is the time to begin if it is not now? In all preceding time the condition of the country, the rights of States, the situation of the people were different. We have reached the culminating point where the bitter fruits of errors of years ago have been reaped in a large degree, and where now, turning our faces once more toward the arts of peace and the hopes of prosperity and of equality, and fraternity too, I should hope, we are to begin a new era. There is, therefore, eminent fitness according to the spirit of the times, there is great appropriateness that now when we have the first opportunity after what has passed we should put ourselves right upon the fundamental principles of government; and accordingly there have been in this spirit introduced already in these enabling acts qualifications and requirements which were never introduced before. It has not been usual, according to my recollection, to insert in these enabling acts that "the constitution when formed shall be republican and not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States and the principles of the Declaration of Independence." That ancient charter of our liberties has again been referred to, and among its principles I believe is the cardinal one, which has been stated by the Senator from Massachusetts, of the equality of man, and that further principle which has been stated by him, which that instrument emphatically declares, that the obligation and the right of those who govern is derived from those who are governed.

Now, there is offered to us a constitution which contains in it the fundamental declaration that the obligation to obey law, the power of those who are to exercise law, does not depend upon the consent of some portion of the governed at all; but that by reason of the accident of the color of a man's skin or of his race, of origin, independent of color—because I take it the word "white" in this constitution means white as a race distinguished from the negro race—a portion of the people are to be excluded from participation in the government. We are called upon under this constitution, I say, to declare, if we approve it and submit it to this people, that a provision, fundamental in its nature, in this constitution of that description is correct. I cannot consent to the doctrine. If I rightly understand the theory of the formation of government, it is that constitutions are formed (aside from the mere framework and machinery of government) for the protection of private rights and the fundamental rights of minorities and individuals against the powers of majorities, against the exercise of arbitrary power or of tyranny on the part of the Government.

Now, sir, what is there so sacred, what is there so fundamental in the right of the white men to rule the black, that the white men cannot be trusted with the power of wielding it by a majority? What is there in the nature of this question which makes it our duty to say to the people of Colorado, "We will not trust a majority of your voters to repeal the clause, but we will allow you to put it in your fundamental law so that the free will of your majority can never get it out?" I fail to see what there is so sacred in this right of white suffrage and in the duty of the absence of suffrage on the part of the black man, as to require it to be inserted in the fundamental law of the Government.

You will find, sir, and Senators will find, that this constitution contains the usual clause that two thirds of the Legislature are requisite to amend it in any particular. It is not, therefore, as I said before, the question whether it is right or fit that a State should decide for itself who or what portion of its citizens should vote, but it is the fundamental question whether we will allow a Territory over which we have control to impose upon itself an obligation which it cannot recede from, to exclude from any of the political rights of government any class of its citizens. That is the question. I do not know but that if this were left, as the original enabling act left it, to the people of that Territory to declare of themselves when and under what circumstances the colored race should be clothed with political rights, I should not be satisfied. I should then have preferred indeed that we should have some voice in the matter; but I fail to perceive how we can be appealed to to give to these people a constitution which ties up their own hands from doing what every one of my political brethren says is an act of justice.

What is there so sacred in this thing that this same constitution does not require the Legislature, by two thirds of its members, to allow any other class of citizens to vote? Is it not the subject of ordinary legislation to declare who shall vote and under what circumstances? And if so, why is it necessary to insert in a constitution which cannot be controlled by a majority of white men, that the mere accident of race or color shall be a fundamental objection to any allowance on the part of the whites to the blacks of the right to vote?

Mr. President, it appears to me, without enlarging upon this topic, that the aristocracy of class, the aristocracy of caste, is as bad as the aristocracy of kings. It is the same evil, anti-democratic spirit precisely as that which animates the aristocracies that govern the monarchies of the Old World, only the form of the aristocracy is developed in a different way. For myself, I am a Democrat in the thorough sense of the term, as I understand it. I believe in the political equality of all men. I believe in the sacredness of the private rights of all men. And yet I am asked as a political friend of these gentlemen, as one having an ardent political desire that my party as it represents, as we suppose, the hopes of the country, should succeed—I am asked to deny my principles in order to achieve a temporary success. Sir, I cannot deny, I cannot turn my back to those principles which are cardinal and essential for the sake of any temporary success. A success of that description, in my judgment, is one not worth winning upon mere grounds of policy. It is one which no man who is convinced as I am of the cardinal error in this constitution can possibly be influenced by.

But where is the harm, Mr. President, to put it upon mere grounds of temporary policy? Are not these people still in the Territory? Can we not send this constitution back to them and say, "Try your hand at it again; reconsider your reconsideration once more; see if you cannot trust yourselves by a majority to declare whether you will allow negroes to vote or not? Have you not confidence enough in yourselves to leave it out of your constitution and not to tie yourselves up forevermore to a principle of this description?" And then, on the first Monday of December, if a majority of that people are still desirous of being represented in this body, can they not present themselves to us with a constitution to which no objection can be made, which sets no bad precedent in morals or in fundamental right that will come to plague us by and by when we apply necessary legislation to other portions of the country? And will these people have been harmed? The tyranny of taxation without representation, if it be a tyranny, will not then have lasted long. I see no difficulty in that course, and without occupying the time of the Senate in dilating upon these questions, I say therefore it is that I feel compelled for one, representing in part, as I do, a State whose sentiments on that subject have never been mistaken; I feel compelled, against my sense of what I should desire to do personally for the respectable gentlemen who come here; in spite of my wishes to accede to the desires of that young and growing population, I feel compelled by a sense of duty which cannot be put aside by temporary considerations to vote against this reconsideration.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, I cannot forbear returning my thanks to the Senator from Vermont for the noble utterance that we have heard from him. He has reminded you of the true principle on which you are to pass. He has held up before you the dignity of the occasion, and has rallied this Senate to its duty. I thank him, sir. His speech ought to produce an effect on his associates in this Chamber. It ought to remind them that there is a truth which cannot be put aside for any temporary expediency. I am grateful to the Senator for the speech he has made. I think the Senate will do well to sleep upon it to-night, to reflect upon it, and when they come here to-morrow to do their duty in maintaining those principles which he has so clearly advocated. I move that the Senate do now adjourn. ["No," "No."]

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. CRESWELL. Mr. President, when this question was before the Senate on a former occasion I voted against the admission of Colorado as a State, and were it not that I to-day propose to change my vote I should not trespass on the time of the Senate, at so late a period of the discussion, to make any remarks whatever touching the issue now presented by the motion for reconsideration.

The difficulty in my mind, and which induced my vote in the negative on the occasion to which I have just alluded, was not any of those which the Senator from Massachusetts or the Senator from Vermont has presented, nor was it a difficulty arising out of the paucity of population or the regularity of the election. My trouble was with regard to the permanency of the population. I think I can safely say that the practice of the Government heretofore has never been to require any stated population as a condition precedent to the admission of a State, nor has it ever required any special form of proceedings with a view to qualify the people of a Territory for the rights of State sovereignty. With regard to all that I was satisfied, but doubts were entertained by me with regard to the permanency of the population then and now occupying the soil of Colorado.

Since the discussion on the occasion to which I have referred with reference to the admission of Colorado I have examined with more care into the state of affairs existing in that Territory, and I shall refer to the statement of facts made by Messrs. Chaffee and Evans, so far as it is not contradicted by the statement of the remonstrance or the statements of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, in support of the position I propose to take to-day in now voting for the admission of Colorado. The proposed State of Colorado, according to the facts adduced, contains about one hundred and six thousand square miles, of which forty-two thousand square miles lie east of the Rocky mountains, and the residue, some sixty-four thousand square miles, west of the mountains. The region lying to the east of the mountains is nearly all valuable by reason of its adaptability to the pasturage of cattle; that lying to west of the mountains constitutes the great mining region of the State. With regard to the quantity of land actually in cultivation there seems to be some difference in point of fact, some gentlemen contending that not more than two hundred and fifty thousand acres are now in cultivation, while others contend that nearer ten times that amount is in cultivation. As to the quantity that is susceptible of cultivation there is also a difference of opinion. I think it is clear or can be clearly deduced from the statements of fact presented that all that portion of the Territory lying east of the mountains is valuable by reason either of its adaptation to agricultural or pastoral pursuits.

With regard to the mineral resources of the State the testimony seems to be entirely clear. So far as the mining interest is concerned, I quote from the Report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office for 1864, page 81:

"That Colorado is a rich mining country, no one acquainted with its resources can for a moment doubt. The gold occurs in veins of copper and iron pyrites, varying in thickness from six inches to forty feet, and in the yield from $15 to $500 per ton. I am not far out of the way in saying that there is no gold-bearing vein in Colorado that will not pay with proper machinery and economical working. I send you herewith a map of the gold region of Colorado, in which I have colored the parts that are known to be gold-bearing by actual development.

"In the county of Gilpin alone, the smallest of the gold counties, and I think no richer than others, there are now on record over seven thousand gold-bearing lodes; on these an average of twenty claims of one hundred feet each have been recorded, making one hundred and forty thousand claims in that county alone, and every day adds to the number of lodes. Comparatively few of these lodes have as yet been fully developed, but enough have been worked to show that under proper management a great majority of them can be made to pay."

"Rich mines of silver have been discovered this summer, and the latent wealth of the Territory has been vastly improved."

But it is not in the precious metals alone, Mr. President, that the soil of Colorado is richly endowed. General Pierce, the surveyor general of Colorado, in his report for 1865—and by the way that report of General Pierce has been referred to by gentlemen on the other side of this discussion as being entirely correct and very thorough in its examination—says:

"To a geologist nothing can be more certain than that at least one third of the plains of Colorado contain coal, and it has been found in enough localities to prove that that theory is correct. As yet very few coal veins have been opened and worked, and most of those are in lands that had been surveyed previous to the discovery of the coal, so that the amount found and returned by the surveyors is comparatively small.

In a country where there is not a stream that does not contain some indications of coal, it is difficult to say what land should be reserved as coal land, and I have colored on the plats only such as is proved to contain workable veins that are accessible."

So much for the mineral wealth of Colorado, around which a permanent population may be settled. Now, sir, what are the facts with reference to the population already in that Territory? It may not be very large; different estimates have been presented to the Senate varying from twenty-five thousand (and one gentleman, I believe, stated it to be as low as fifteen thousand) up to fifty thousand. I shall not make a point with regard to the numbers, because, in my mind, the necessity resting upon this Government to fill up that vast extent of territory stretching from the western portion of Kansas and the other States lying north of it, to the eastern frontier of the States lying on the Pacific is paramount. I believe that the sooner we fill up that vast territory with States, remove from the arena of angry and perhaps dangerous controversy on the floor of Congress all that immense section of country, the sooner shall we be in a position to bear our present heavy burdens of taxation, and to advance more rapidly in the path of prosperity.

Already in Colorado the people, according to the statement of the remonstrance filed here against its admission, and their friends, have expended thirty millions in one year with a view to permanent improvement for mining purposes. In Gilpin county alone there are seventy-five or eighty quartz mills, which cost from $25,000 to $100,000 each. The smelting works of one company cost about two hundred thousand dollars. The mineral developments in the other counties indicate beyond a doubt equally rich and more extensive mines of both gold and silver. The report of the Superintendent of the United States Mint shows that Colorado, as a gold-producing territory, is second only to California.

This last assertion, I very well remember, the Senator from Massachusetts in some measure attempted to controvert as to its precise accuracy. I will only say that I cannot take issue with that gentleman, although certainly it appears from the statements adduced by him that the gold and silver product of Colorado is sufficient to assert their right to claim that they stand among the first States in the Union in regard to their mining products. They have a population there which seem to be civilized in a measure; they seem to avail themselves of the ordinary pursuits of mankind, and not only that, but they seem willing and able to pay their taxes. When gentlemen speak of their inability to maintain a State government, I beg leave to refer them to the figures compiled in the bureau for the collection of internal revenue.

In Colorado there were collected last year $130,052 01 for the purposes of internal revenue, independent of the receipts for stamps. The tax of six per cent. on clothing and other articles of dress amounted to $705 59. The tax of six per cent. on furniture and other articles made of wood amounted to $1,372 77. The tax on the manufacture of iron castings amounted to $216 61. The tax of one eighth of one per cent. on brokers' sales of merchandise and other goods amounted to $1,876 05. The tax of six per cent. on bill-heads, cards, and circulars, printed law blanks, and other printed forms amounted to $410 20. Licenses paid by bankers amounted to $1,100; licenses of commercial brokers, $1,353 36; licenses for stock-brokers, $658 33; licenses for builders and contractors, $462 51; licenses for business and trade, or professions, $854 16; licenses of butchers who sell butchers' meat at retail, $497 50; licenses for livery stables, $215 01; licenses of peddlers who travel with two horses or mules, $2,246 07; income tax, $38,079 67; tax on banks and insurance companies, $765 04; licenses of wholesale dealers, $3,531 83; licenses of retail dealers, $3,755 01; licenses of hotels, $2,205 41; licenses of lawyers, $593 33.

This indicates clearly to my mind that the population of Colorado must remain there from the very necessities of their case. We have scriptural authority for saying that where the treasure is there will the heart be also; and it seems that these people have not only invested their means, but invested their means largely, in these various pursuits which necessarily fix them in that locality, attach them to that soil. So far as lawyers are concerned, we find a tax of $593 33. I know they are called a parasitic class of society, but I think that the fact that $593 was paid for lawyers' licenses in that locality, when lawyers pay but ten dollars a year, indicates a very considerable fungus growth with regard to the institutions of Colorado which I think indicates permanency. Being a lawyer myself, I may be permitted to make that remark. [Laughter.] So it is with reference to many other of these pursuits. They are permanent pursuits, and only such as men engage in who intend to remain, perhaps, the balance of their lives in the localities where they settle.

This doubt, then, being removed from my mind by an inspection of the facts as applicable to Colorado, I am prepared to-day to vote for her admission. I am glad to be able to do so, because I voted against her before very reluctantly.

One more remark, and then I shall close. It has been intimated as to the motives which actuate gentlemen in voting on our side of the question, that we have been prompted by a desire to increase the force of our own side on certain questions in this body. I hope I may be permitted to say, without intending any rudeness to the gentleman from Massachusetts, that I think that assertion was a very unwarrantable one. At the time this question was before the Senate before there were pending then great issues about which this whole nation, from one end of it to the other, felt the most profound concern. If I had been actuated then by any such motive, I should, without questioning for a moment the propriety of the admission of these gentlemen from Colorado, have voted, not as I did, but rather in favor of the bill then pending. That necessity has been in a measure removed. Those questions have been settled; the Senate has declared itself with regard to them, and they are definitely disposed of. What may come in the future is only conjecture. We then had the certainty staring us in the face of perhaps a very closely contested contest with the President upon those measures. So far as I am concerned, that consideration does not in any way affect my vote. I stand prepared, so long as I shall remain a representative of my State upon this floor, to vote always in accordance strictly with my conviction of right and justice, and to repel every imputation that I may be controlled upon any measure by any such motive as the gentleman has attributed.

Mr. WILSON. I hope we shall now proceed to take the vote on the reconsideration. I think we have spent sufficient time in this discussion.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I am willing to say what little I have to say now, or in the morning if it is the pleasure of the Senate at this time to adjourn; but I do not ask an adjournment on my account. What I propose to say I can submit within a reasonably brief period.

I am opposed to the admission of Colorado, and I am opposed to it upon two grounds, the first of which would, of itself, be sufficient without the other. My opposition to it in the first place is the want of the necessary population. The Senate are aware, every member of the body must be aware, that in the deliberations of the Convention by which the present Constitution was adopted, the cause of all others which threatened most the defeat of the object which they had in view was the disparity between the States. From day to day the patriotic men who constituted that body were solicitous to avoid, if possible, the giving to the smaller States a voice in the Senate of the United States equal to that which the larger States were to receive. The States that were then the largest—New York, Pennsylvania, and Virginia—were not only through their delegates in the Convention, but with, I believe, almost the unanimous opinion of the people of those several States opposed to giving the smaller States an equal voice in the Senate of the United States. It was said that such an equality was not republican, that it was hostile to all the ideas of republican liberty entertained at that period; and it was not until they became satisfied that the Constitution would not be adopted without it, that they agreed to give the smaller States an equality of representation in this body, counteracting the admitted mischief of that inequality by providing for a numerical representation in the other branch of Congress.

I think, therefore, Mr. President, it may safely be said that if it had been proposed in that Convention that any State should thereafter be admitted with a population anything like as small as is the population of Colorado, rating it at the highest number which the friends of this measure say is to be found there, it would not have received the vote of a single member of that Convention; it would not have received the vote of the members who represented the larger States. They consented to give to the smaller States the equality of representation only because they became satisfied that without it the Union would not be formed which they had so much at heart; and the smaller States had the larger ones practically in their power, looking to the object which the larger States had in view as well as the smaller States. Each of these States, small as well as large, was at that time perfectly independent; each was a nation of itself, invested with all the attributes of nationality; and there was no means by which the larger States could enforce a union or could persuade the smaller States to adopt a constitution by which that Union was to be formed and perpetuated, as they hoped the Union which they wished to form would be, except upon the condition that they would listen to the demands, in the particular of equal representation in the Senate of the United States, made by the smaller States.

At that time there were but thirteen States in the Union, or about to come into the Union. They had gone through a common struggle. Each had brought to the contest which resulted in our independence an equal loyalty and an equal patriotism, and all felt, the large as well as the small, a natural solicitude that there should be no separation in the future. Having gone through as one people the perils of the Revolution, they were willing, more than willing, they were anxious, that they should remain as one people. While, therefore, the larger States were of opinion, and for a long time unwillingly advocated it, that there should not be equality of representation in this body, they finally yielded it because in the past the smaller and the larger States had constituted practically but one nation.

Mr. GRIMES. If the Senator will give way, I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. WILSON. I hope not.

Mr. GRIMES. I withdraw the motion merely for the purpose of saying that it must be evident to the gentlemen who have charge of this bill that there is no desire to speak against time. Two thirds of all the speaking that has been done to-day has been by the friends of the bill. It is past the usual hour of adjourning. I do not know of anybody who desires to speak at all on the subject except the Senator from Maryland. I therefore move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. SHERMAN. I call for the yeas and nays, because there is a pressure of public business, and this thing has occupied now several days. I think the discussion has gone as far as is necessary.

Mr. GRIMES. I trust we shall have the yeas and nays, and let us see whether or not members of this body are afraid to have their names recorded when a gentleman rises at this period of the day and asks for an adjournment to enable him to be heard.

Mr. SHERMAN. The gentleman from Maryland does not ask it.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am in the hands of the Senate.

Mr. GRIMES. The Senator yielded the floor to me to move an adjournment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. POMEROY. I understood the Senator from Maryland to say that he was willing to go on now.

Mr. JOHNSON. I said I was in the hands of the Senate.

Mr. POMEROY. If he is willing to go on I shall vote against adjourning.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. STEWART. I desire to say that Mr. HARRIS and Mr. HENDERSON have paired off.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I desire to state that Mr. DIXON, and Mr. LANE, of Kansas, have paired off.

The result was announced—yeas 14, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cowan, Davis, Doolittle, Edmunds, Foster, Grimes, Guthrie, Hendricks, Johnson, Morgan, Poland, Riddle, and Sumner—14.

NAYS—Messrs. Chandler, Clark, Conness, Cragin, Creswell, Howard, Howe, Kirkwood, Lane of Indiana, Nye, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Willey, Williams, and Wilson—21.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Dixon, Fessenden, Harris, Henderson, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Morrill, Nesmith, Norton, Saulsbury, Wright, and Yates—14.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I rather regret that the motion was made because we have lost so much time by it. Perhaps I am as able to go on now as I should be in the morning. I made no request of the Senate to adjourn, because I was unwilling to put the Senate to any inconvenience or to keep them from voting upon this bill, if they were desirous of voting upon it at this time. I am the more willing to go on now, because I have some reason to believe that some of the Senators are in a better condition than some others. They perhaps have dined.

I was saying, Mr. President, when the motion was made that if the proposition had come from any member of the Convention that States thereafter to be admitted might be admitted if they had a population such as is the population of Colorado, the suggestion would not have received the sanction of any other member of the body. Now, what is this population? The largest number that I have heard it estimated at is 35,000. Of that 35,000, 6,000 at least, some have stated it to be 10,000, consists of the original population of the Territory, Mexicans by birth, wholly unacquainted with our institutions, and who I understand, so far from joining in the application to have this Territory admitted as a State, are against it. But in relation to the population of 35,000, I think it will be found that in point of fact the population is much below that number. I found that opinion upon the vote which has been given upon the several occasions when a vote has been given in this Territory. The usual estimate is, and I believe it is found to be true, that for every vote there are in addition some four persons; that is to say, five persons furnish one vote. That is because in the general and in most of the older States the voters are heads of families or connected with families. The Senate must see that the emigrants to these new Territories for the most part do not take their families with them; they are for the most part young men, men in search of fortune, experimenting with a view to fortune, and they leave behind them their families, those who have them; but for the most part those who go into the wilderness in search of a new home go without families, and particularly those who go into a country where gold or silver is supposed to exist.

Mr. RAMSEY. Will the honorable Senator from Maryland, now that he is speaking on the point of the voting population as the test of the real population, allow me to call his attention to what has occurred in the State of Minnesota? In the year 1864 there were polled upon the presidential contest 42,238 votes. In the year 1865, in the contest of that year for Governor, there were polled but 31,000 votes, and yet in that year the census of the State evidenced a population of 250,000.

Mr. JOHNSON. What is the conclusion to which the honorable Senator comes from those facts?

Mr. RAMSEY. I arrive at this conclusion: that notwithstanding the increase of population there was a diminution of votes. There is a difficulty in these new and frontier States in the people getting to the polls, so that sometimes there is a diminution of votes when there is not of population.

Mr. JOHNSON. But does the honorable member deny the fact which I have stated, that for the most part the emigrants, particularly to a Territory such as Colorado, are emigrants without families? That I suppose we all know to be true beyond all doubt; and the general rule as to the proportion of voters to people does not apply to such a population as is in one of these Territories. But independent of that, if you deduct the six or ten thousand Mexicans who form now a part of the population of that Territory from the 35,000 claiming to be there, and suppose that one half of those who did vote were voters without families, you find the population to be in all probability not more than 15,000. But suppose it to be 35,000. It is true that the Constitution of the United States in no part of it, with reference to the admission of new States, prescribes any number of population of which the State is to consist; but if they had contemplated as possible that the Congress of the United States under that authority would have admitted any State with a population such as is the population of Colorado, supposing it to be the largest number which any person has stated it to be, they would have prevented it, in my judgment, by constitutional prohibition. What did they do? A great many of the members of the Convention were members of the First Congress. In 1790 Congress directed the first census to be taken. In 1792, when they came to apportion the members the States were to have, they directed that there should be only one Representative for every thirty-two or thirty-three thousand of the population, so that the very men, or most of the leading men who constituted the Convention, when they came to act upon the question how the people were to be represented, provided that 33,000 should be necessary in order to be represented by one Representative. And now what are we about to do? To let these twenty or thirty thousand persons be represented by one member certainly in the House of Representatives, although the number now required as the basis of representation in that House is 127,000, and to give them two Senators on this floor, and why? I do not speculate as to motive; I have no right to speculate as to motive; but why is it necessary? Is it to protect the people of the Territory? Cannot we protect them by our own legislation? What is the condition of the people of this District, numbering now more than 100,000? They are not to constitute a State at any time. We are their representatives, and under the Constitution we are alike the representatives of all who may settle in these Territories before they are in a condition to be received into the Union of States.

In my judgment, the admission of States into this Union is a high function and a very important function. Some of the honorable gentlemen who are favoring this bill may, perhaps, not consider it so important as I do, because they give a latitudinarian construction to the Constitution, of which, in my judgment, it does not admit. They seem to believe that they can legislate for the States after they get into the Union. My opinion is that the moment the State is admitted it is wholly independent of any legislation that Congress may adopt, except such as falls within its delegated powers; that nearly the whole sphere of subjects with which the local rights of the State are concerned, or the business of the people of the State is concerned, is to be submitted to the legislation of the State, and entirely independent of that which Congress may think proper to adopt. And I submit to those who are about to vote for this proposition that it is not republican in point of form. I do not mean upon the ground upon which my friend from Massachusetts places it, or on which the Senator from Vermont places it; but in the true sense of a republican government, it is not right in principle to give to fifteen or twenty thousand people an equal voice in this body with one or two or three millions.

The time may come when those who are for receiving now the State of Colorado, with that limited population, may regret the precedent that will be established if she shall be received. The admission of States is not to terminate with that of Colorado. There is an immense territory yet to come in when it comes to be sufficiently peopled. There is in some of these States now territory enough and population enough to make a dozen States. If the Union is restored actually to-morrow, and the whole of the southern States come in, they may have a policy of their own. They may think it necessary, in order to carry out that policy, to divide their own States; to make of Texas four; to make of Georgia just as many almost as they may think proper to make, for she has forty times the population of Colorado; to make of Virginia as many; and what will the States of New England be able to say in opposition if Colorado should be admitted? Virginia will insist, because it is sure to be so in the end, that having a population of five or ten millions she ought to be represented upon this floor by more than two Senators, and insist upon a division of her State into as many States as her policy for the time may dictate. How can you refuse to allow it? In the first place, you cannot refuse her on principles. In the second place, upon the hypothesis which I have assumed, you will not be able to refuse her by votes. What is to become of the New England States and the smaller States which are here upon the sea-board? I do not mention it by way of a threat, for threats are thrown away, as I trust, upon the members of this body; I appeal to it merely for the purpose of bringing to the attention of the Senate a fact which I think should enter into their deliberations as statesmen upon the possible tendency of this measure.

The honorable member from Nevada [Mr. NYE] who spoke so well yesterday—and the same thing has been said in substance by others—seemed to suppose that these people have a right to be admitted because of the extent of this Territory and the extent of the mineral wealth. That is not my idea of a State, Mr. President; and that is not the idea that our fathers had. The States that they designed were States to be composed of men and not of mere wealth. Otherwise the city of New York might furnish fifty States if wealth only was to be the test by which States are to be constituted. It is not the wealth in the mountains or the wealth in the pockets of the citizens; it is the citizens. The mere suggestion that twenty or thirty thousand people of all sorts, constituted of men, women, and children, native Mexicans, and others, are to be put upon the same footing in this body with the great State of New York seems to me—I was about to say to be so absurd—to be so anti-republican that the people of the country will never sanction it. If you can let a State in with 15,000, why not let her in with 5,000? The honorable member from Oregon stated that there was nothing in the Constitution which limits the number of people that is to constitute a State. That is true. Well, if in the absence of any particular provision on that subject in the Constitution, you can let in Colorado although she has a population of only fifteen or twenty thousand you could let in any other territorial possession that we have if it should turn out to have a population of 3,000 and should ask for it.

It is, therefore, upon the ground of the want of population principally that I am opposed to the measure, but there is another reason which operates influentially with me. There is nothing to show that the people of the Territory even desire it—nothing satisfactory to my judgment. The only majority claimed is 155 out of a vote of some 6,000, and I suppose it is perfectly legitimate to infer that in the 6,000 who voted not one of the native Mexican population is to be found. And how was the election held? Not held under your enabling act of March, 1864. They did not pretend to hold it under that enabling act.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President—

Mr. JOHNSON. It is pretty late to be interrupted.

Mr. HOWARD. I was merely going to make a correction.

Mr. JOHNSON. What is the correction? I will hear the correction.

Mr. HOWARD. I was going to say that the documents which are before us show that the Mexican population in those two counties to which the Senator refers voted at the most recent election of members of the Legislature of Colorado, participated fully in that election, and also voted on the question of adopting the constitution itself. They cast a very large vote.

Mr. JOHNSON. I understand, outside of the constitution itself and the record of the actual vote, that the whole Mexican population are decidedly opposed to the admission of the State.

Mr. HOWARD. They were opposed to becoming part of the United States.

Mr. JOHNSON. But they are a part of the United States now, I presume.

Mr. RAMSEY. I think the only votes in Colorado against the constitution were the votes of that Mexican population. The American population all voted for it.

Mr. JOHNSON. All? That is not my information.

Mr. RAMSEY. Substantially all.

Mr. JOHNSON. But how was the election held? You passed the enabling act in March, 1864, and you provided specially how it was to be held, and you were very cautious in those provisions. They were intended to guard against fraud; they were designed that notice should be given to everybody; there was protection against improper voting. How has this constitution been adopted? Rejected at the election held under your enabling act of 1864 by a majority of 3,000 or 4,000 in a vote of not more than 7,000, it is now carried by 155; but how was that election held? The Territorial Legislature itself, even, did not pass an act authorizing the convention to be held. The presiding officers of the partisan committees, as I understand, or those who represented the political parties into which the population of the Territory was supposed to be divided, got together and themselves devised the mode by which the convention should be elected; but provision as to who was to vote, under what sanctions the vote was to be given, how fraudulent attempts at voting were to be frustrated, how they were to be punished if successfully attempted, is nowhere to be found, and nobody can tell whether the whole of that majority of 155 was not the result of illegal voting.

It would seem to be hard, very hard, that you should force upon such a minority as voted against this constitution a State government. They think, and think properly, that they may be taxed beyond their ability to meet it. They think it is better for them to remain in a territorial condition. Some of the most thoughtful, some of the most loyal to the Territory think so. We all know how these conventions are got up. Gentlemen are anxious to come to Congress, to the Senate and to the House; anxious to receive the offices which will be at the disposition of the Executive after they are admitted; but the body of the people have no such interest. It is better for them, until they have a fixed and permanent existence as a people, that they should remain in a territorial condition; and I have no doubt that if you pass such an enabling act as was passed in 1864, rejecting the present application to be admitted and put the question again to the people of Colorado, they will vote against coming into the Union. I have said, Mr. President, substantially what I rose for the purpose of stating, not as well perhaps as I should have stated it in the morning if there had been an adjournment; and now close by saying that I shall not vote on the question, because I have paired off with one of the Senators from Illinois who is not now in his seat, [Mr. YATES.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CLARK in the chair.) The question is, Will the Senate reconsider the vote by which they refused to order the bill to be engrossed for a third reading? And on that question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. SUMNER. I had intended to say something before the debate closed in reply to different Senators who have spoken. What I said yesterday has been alluded to by various Senators and has been criticised. I do not wish to occupy the time of the Senate. I hope I have not abused its indulgence; but I feel strongly on this question, and I feel that the Senate is about to make a great mistake. I make no question with regard to the motives of Senators. I concede freely to all about me what I claim for myself. I feel, however, that they are about to make a great mistake; but it is too late for argument; I know that nothing I could say would influence a vote; and my only motive now in speaking would be to vindicate myself. There is nobody out of this Chamber that at this moment I care to reach on this question; I only wish to reach my associates in this body; I wish to appeal to them and to plead with them not to make the sacrifice which it seems to me they will make if they take the step which is now proposed. I will not detain the Senate, however, by another word.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. WADE. I ought to state that I have paired off with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. COWAN.]

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I was requested to state, by the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. DIXON,] that he had paired off with the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. LANE.] He would have voted "nay;" the Senator from Kansas would have voted "yea."

Mr. GRIMES. By the authority of the Senator from Maine [Mr. FESSENDEN] I secured a pair for him with the Senator from Oregon, [Mr. WILLIAMS.] Had he been here he would have voted in the negative.

Mr. STEWART. I am requested by Mr. HARRIS to state that he is paired off with Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. HARRIS would have voted against the reconsideration, Mr. HENDERSON for it.

Mr. JOHNSON. As I said just now, I am paired off with Governor YATES, of Illinois.

Mr. RIDDLE. My colleague [Mr. SAGLEBURY] has paired off with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NORTON] on this question. He would have voted "nay" if he were here.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am paired with Mr. FESSENDEN.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Permit me to ask a question for information. Do pairs count? Do they help to make a quorum?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. They are not counted.

The result was announced—yeas 19, nays 13; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chandler, Clark, Conness, Cragin, Creswell, Howard, Howe, Kirkwood, Lane of Indiana, Nye, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wiley, and Wilson—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Davis, Doolittle, Edmunds, Foster, Grimes, Guthrie, Hendricks, McDougall, Morgan, Poland, Riddle, and Sumner—13.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Cowan, Dixon, Fessenden, Harris, Henderson, Johnson, Lane of Kansas, Morrill, Nesmith, Norton, Salsbury, Wade, Williams, Wright, and Yates—17.

So the motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is now before the Senate and open to amendment. If no amendment be proposed, the question is,

Shall the bill be engrossed and read a third time?

Mr. SUMNER. I hope the Senate will now adjourn. There are a couple of amendments which I have to move to the bill. I do not wish to move them to-night.

Several SENATORS. Oh, yes; move them now.

Mr. SUMNER. Senators say, "Oh, yes, move them now." I hope the Senate will adjourn. I move an adjournment.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. I have an amendment to move. It is to add at the end of the bill the following proviso:

Provided, That this act shall not take effect, except upon the fundamental condition that within the State there shall be no denial of the elective franchise or of any other rights on account of color or race, but all persons shall be equal before the law. And the people of the Territory shall, by a majority of the voters therein, at such places and under such regulations as shall be prescribed by the Governor thereof, declare their assent to this fundamental condition, and the Governor shall transmit to the President of the United States an authentic statement of such assent whenever the same shall be given, upon the receipt whereof he shall, by proclamation, announce the fact; whereupon, without any further proceedings on the part of Congress, this act shall take effect.

On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and being taken, resulted—yeas 7, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Edmunds, Foster, Grimes, Howe, Morgan, Poland, Sumner—7.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Cragin, Creswell, Davis, Doolittle, Guthrie, Hendricks, Howard, Johnson, Kirkwood, Lane of Indiana, McDougall, Nye, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Riddle, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Willey, Williams, and Wilson—27.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Cowan, Dixon, Fessenden, Harris, Henderson, Lane of Kansas, Morrill, Nesmith, Norton, Saulsbury, Wade, Wright, and Yates—15.

So the amendment was rejected.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. SUMNER. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GRIMES (when Mr. FESSENDEN's name was called) said: I desire to repeat what I stated before. It is known to the members of the Senate that Mr. FESSENDEN has been confined to his house for some ten days or two weeks by indisposition. At his instance I secured a pair for him on this question. Had he been here he would have voted against the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON (when his name was called) said: I am paired on this question.

Mr. WADE (when his name was called) said: I am paired as I stated before.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called) said: I have paired off with Mr. FESSENDEN. If he were here, he would vote "nay," and I should vote "yea."

Mr. SPRAGUE. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. LANE] desired me to say that he was paired off with the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. DIXON], as has been already announced by the Senator from Wisconsin. The Senator from Kansas would have voted "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 19, nays 13; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chandler, Clark, Conness, Cragin, Creswell, Howard, Howe, Kirkwood, Lane of Indiana, Nye, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Willey, and Wilson—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Davis, Doolittle, Edmunds, Foster, Grimes, Guthrie, Hendricks, McDougall, Morgan, Poland, Riddle, and Sumner—13.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Cowan, Dixon, Fessenden, Harris, Henderson, Johnson, Lane of Kansas, Morrill, Nesmith, Norton, Saulsbury, Wade, Williams, Wright, and Yates—17.

So the bill was passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 511) imposing a duty on live animals.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 511) imposing a duty on live animals was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, April 25, 1866.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by Rev. HENRY N. BELLOWES.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

TELEGRAPH TO THE WEST INDIES.

Mr. ELIOT. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on Commerce Senate bill No. 26, concerning telegraphic communication between the United States and the island of Cuba, and other West India islands, and the Bahamas.

Mr. CHANLER. I object.

DUTIES ON IMPORTS.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill to amend an act entitled "An act further to provide for the collection of duties on imports."

Mr. ROSS. Does it increase the duties on imports?

Mr. BOUTWELL. No, sir. This bill has been drawn with great care by well-informed persons on the subject, and the committee wish the benefit of having it printed.

The bill was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. SHANKLIN. I rise to make a personal explanation. I discover that I am reported by the Chronicle and National Intelligencer a few days since as having perpetrated a long written speech in the House on last Saturday, a thing, sir, that I never did, never expect to do, and do not know that I could do. My colleague [Mr. RITTER] is entitled to the honor of having made the speech referred to. And while I am unwilling to appropriate any of the laurels of a gentleman of his eminent ability, I am equally unwilling that he shall bank on my capital or make speeches in my name. I hope, therefore, that that will be corrected.

Another error in the same report. I am reported as having followed my colleague on my right, [Mr. SMITH], a matter which I am satisfied never entered the head of any gentleman here. I will say that I have always found my colleague [Mr. SMITH] a very agreeable gentleman when met with, but the idea of following him, or the idea of expecting him to follow anybody long, certainly never entered my mind or the mind of anybody that knows him as well as I do. [Laughter.] I hope that may also be corrected.

Mr. SMITH. I wish merely to say that if my colleague would follow so good a leader as myself he would not have gotten into so many rebellious scrapes and bad company as he has done during the last few years.

WASHINGTON ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

Mr. DONNELLY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to incorporate the Academy of Music, of Washington city, District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

SALE OF ARMS, VESSELS-OF-WAR, ETC.

Mr. ORTH, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution, authorizing the sale and transfer of arms, munitions and vessels of war; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

ISAAC RAMSEY.

Mr. HUBBELL, of Ohio, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution for the relief of Isaac Ramsey, internal revenue collector of the eighth district of Ohio; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

PERSONAL EXPLANATIONS.

Mr. BLAINE. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to make a personal explanation.

No objection was made.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. Speaker, in the debate yesterday on the Army bill in relation to the Provost Marshal General, there was some personal controversy between the gentleman from the Utica district of New York [Mr. CONKLING] and myself. That gentleman has been longer a member of Congress than myself, but I have understood—

Mr. WARD. I would inquire if my colleague from the Utica district is in his seat.

Mr. BLAINE. He is here. I should not have sought to make this explanation if he had been absent. I supposed the member was equally familiar, with myself, with the rule understood to obtain among members in respect to the Globe reports of personal controversies. I understand, as I presume we all do, that it is quite allowable for a member who makes a speech here not affecting any personal interest, to alter the reporter's notes and place them in such form as is most agreeable to himself. I have equally understood that in personal controversies between gentlemen it is a point of honor that as the reporter puts down what takes place it shall be printed, or that if alterations are made they shall be made by mutual understanding and knowledge.

I called at the Globe office this morning, and on reading the Globe at twelve o'clock I found essential alterations, and upon inquiry at the Globe office of the proper person, I was told that those alterations were made by the member from New York, [Mr. CONKLING], and are in his handwriting. I now hold the report of his remarks in my hand, and there is scarcely a page but what has been altered. But I do not intend to comment upon the alterations at any length. I merely want to call the attention of the House to one point, where the gentleman sought by an alteration to take away the entire point of my reply to him. I characterized some of his bravado as "cheap swagger" when he talked about meeting me "here or elsewhere." The gentleman eliminates that important part of his speech and inserts instead these words:

"I have stated facts for which I am willing to be held responsible at all times and places."

Now, the phrase "here and elsewhere" is a phrase well known in Congress; it is the phrase of bullism. It was a phrase upon which I commented, and which I denounced and justly denounced, and which the gentleman had no right to alter at the Globe office.

I desire to say that I never saw the notes of my remarks of yesterday. I did not know what the reporters had put in the Globe, and I should have considered that I was violating the first principles of honor which should exist between gentlemen had I ventured to do it.

Mr. CONKLING. I hope the member will yield to me for a moment to ask the loan of the sheets which he has obtained from the Globe office.

Mr. BLAINE. There was nothing surreptitious about it; they were obtained openly; and I hope the gentleman will give them back to me, as I am responsible for them to the Globe office.

Mr. CONKLING. I place myself under obligations to the gentleman by asking him not to give me that pile of manuscript, but to indicate to me the sheets to which he refers where alterations have been made.

Mr. BLAINE. On page of the manuscript No. 188½ he says, as reported, that he is entirely responsible "not only here but elsewhere," and that is cut out.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask merely to see the sheet. Before looking at it or making any remarks upon it I wish to say that I do know, what the member from Maine announces as if it were new to somebody or especially appreciated by himself, that no member of this House has a right by any alterations, even of his own remarks, in any respect to affect the rights or the position of any other member with whom he has had a discussion, whether in the way of controversy or not. And I hope that it is unnecessary for me to assure any gentleman with whom I am acquainted that I am as incapable as the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] pretends to be, of doing anything in violation of the rule which I state.

I deny entirely, speaking at a venture of all these sheets which are here—and I challenge a refutation of what I say—I deny that in any respect or particular have these notes been so altered by me as to change at all the position of any gentleman in this House, whether he took part with me in the debate or not. And I affirm—speaking of this sheet which I will look at particularly in a moment; and speaking of every other sheet upon which the debate of yesterday was reported; and speaking also of every other sheet of Globe reports that ever came into my hands—that I have made no alterations, none whatever, except those alterations which all gentlemen make, rejecting the surplusage and diffusive style which will always enter, more or less, into extemporaneous speaking, so as to prune down a little, into fewer words, the sense which was expressed.

On yesterday there was properly before this House the public administration of a public officer. It was a suitable theme for discussion. At all events, whether it was so or not was a question addressed to every gentleman for himself. I commented upon the public administration of this public officer and his subordinates; I spoke of facts of which I had the right to speak, because I had investigated them, and I thought I knew whereof I affirmed.

The member from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE,] with frivolous impertinence, put into the debate an imputation upon my motives; and attributed to me dishonorable personal resentment. Suppose what he said had been true; what had that to do with the matter which we were discussing? What light did an imputation cast upon me throw upon the question whether the Bureau of the Provost Marshal General ought to be petrified forever in the military system of this country?

Not only did he make a statement, which I repeat was frivolously impertinent and personal to me, but he made a statement in which he was mistaken. He added, in substance, that I traduced this officer in his absence, and that I did it here; thereby meaning to put upon me the further imputation that skulking behind the constitutional privileges of debate I was defaming an absent man.

In answer to that I said that I had no such intention; that I stated what I believed; that I was ready to state it here or elsewhere, and to be responsible for it, not only here but anywhere else. The gentleman says those are technical words. I did not know that they were technical words. I have heard them used here repeatedly. I heard them used the other day by a gentleman to whom I will not refer more especially; he said, in the precise phrase which I did not use on yesterday, that he would be responsible, not only here but elsewhere. What I said was that I was ready to stand by the statement I made; not to shelter myself behind the privileges of debate, but to be responsible to any person who should be aggrieved, everywhere and whenever he might see fit to raise the question.

Now, it was rather a cheap mode of clawing off from an ungentlemanly passage in the debate for the member from Maine to rise here and pretend to this House that he understood I meant to talk in the language of the duelist or to intimate in any way that I sought a personal controversy with him. I beg to assure him that my observation of him, if nothing else, would remove far distant from me the impression that in that way or in any other way it was worth while to attempt to get out of him any such controversy as that.

Now, sir, I made no such intimation. I had no such intention. I made no such statement. But on the contrary, I said what I will proceed now to read as it stood originally upon this paper; and then I will state to the House the alteration which has been made; and I will submit whether I will be compelled to sit at the feet of the gentleman from Maine and derive from him instruction as to what is gentlemanly and honorable.

Now, this sheet, which is handed to me without what precedes it, commences in the middle of a sentence. I would like to have the commencement of the sentence.

Mr. BLAINE, (handing a page of manuscript.) I will say here—

Mr. CONKLING. No, Mr. Speaker; I would like to continue my statement so far as to read this sheet.

Mr. BLAINE. I hope the gentleman will state what is in his own handwriting.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. Speaker, I shall understand which is my own handwriting; and I shall be very frank and very fearless in stating all the particulars about this matter. If the gentleman will only be quiet he will find that he will lose nothing of the truth by waiting to hear my statement.

This the gentleman says is in my own handwriting, as it is:

"I say to him further, that I mean to take no advantage, such as he attributes, of the privileges of this place, or of the absence of General Fry."

I believe that is not the alteration complained of.

"On the contrary, I am ready to avow what I have here declared anywhere."

Not "elsewhere," but "anywhere." I believe that not much is lost by that variation.

"I have stated facts for which I am willing to be held responsible at all times and places."

The alteration, complained of, as I understand, is that instead of avowing a willingness to be held responsible here or elsewhere, which he says the phrase was, I say, "I am willing to be held responsible at all times and places."

Well, sir, if there is any diminution of responsibility here; if, by this alteration, making the declaration cover all space and all time, there has been avoided any responsibility which was assumed by saying "here or elsewhere," then I admit that I am subject to the censure of gentlemen whose position and character are such as to entitle them to give instruction upon such questions.

Now, the words stricken out, in lieu of which those words are inserted, appear thus in the reporter's notes:

"I am responsible, not only here but elsewhere, for what I have said and what I will say of the Provost Marshal General."

That I understand to be the alteration complained of. The notes were, "I am responsible not only here but elsewhere;" while, in making the correction I have said, "I am willing to be held responsible at all times and places." Mr. Speaker, I stand by that alteration. I will not undertake to say whether it is more or less precise than the original utterance. I will undertake to say, and I submit it to every gentleman in this House, that not only is there no alteration here which puts the gentleman from Maine in any different position from that which he occupies, but there is no alteration by which I relieve myself from any responsibility to any human being which in the original utterance I took.

Now, sir, having said this much, I conclude by saying that I throw back to the gentleman any sort of imputation which he seeks to cast upon me; and I say to him that the time will be far hence when it will become necessary for him to dispense to me any information or instruction with regard to those rules which ought to govern the conduct of gentlemen.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine asks unanimous consent to make a personal explanation. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. BLAINE. I desire to say a single word. The reporters of the Globe, with their usual accuracy, have reported me in my rejoinder with the phrase "here and elsewhere" in quotation marks. I want members to understand the precise point of my complaint. Though I am reported, and correctly reported, as referring to the gentleman's phraseology "here and elsewhere," and commenting upon the bravado of his manner, yet a person reading the debate might be led to ask what I was replying to when I quoted a phrase of that kind, the very mild phrase "at all times and places" having been cunningly substituted in the remarks of the gentleman from New York.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I never expected to make a personal explanation in this House in my life. As to courage I am like the Methodist deacon about his piety—I have none to speak of. If I had I should be loath to introduce it in competition with a gentleman who left such a brilliant reputation for courage in the Thirty-Seventh Congress.

Mr. CONKLING. I beg to say one word, that I did not see, of course, as gentlemen will understand, the remarks of the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. BLAINE. I am told at the Globe office he took the notes and did not return them till twelve o'clock and one o'clock this morning. That is said on my responsibility from Mr. Lewis, the superintendent of the composing room in the Globe office.

Mr. CONKLING. The member's zeal outruns his discretion, which perhaps is not the first occurrence of that kind in his life. Mr. Lewis, I undertake to say, and no other man who stands respectfully in the community, told the member from Maine that I had for one moment the sheets containing his rejoinder or any part of them. So far from that, one of the Globe reporters, Mr. Lord, handed to me here for the first time, between nine and ten o'clock, during the evening session, the sheets upon which my remarks appeared, and those alone, and not all even of the sheets upon which my remarks appeared. They contained nothing else except the point of order submitted to the Chair and the remarks made by the then occupant of the chair [Mr. DAWES] in deciding that point of order. I took those notes in haste, went into a committee-room, read them over rapidly, and corrected them. I never saw the notes of the gentleman from Maine. I did not know they contained any statement about "here or elsewhere." I did not think there was the slightest significance in those words more than in any other for this purpose. I say the statement he makes, that I had his notes until midnight or any other time, is without any shadow of foundation in truth.

But, Mr. Speaker, a member of this House capable of doing precisely that which upon four marked occasions during this session I have detected in the gentleman from Maine is capable of saying precisely what he said here, and putting me in a position when I answer it which makes me feel I owe an apology, if not to myself, to the members of this House, for detaining them one moment on such a matter.

DUTY ON LIVE ANIMALS.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee of Ways and Means a bill imposing a duty on live animals imported from foreign countries, and that it be acted upon by the House at this time.

The bill was read.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that we shall act upon the internal revenue bill, which will be reported to-day, before we can act on the tariff bill, it seems to the committee to be necessary and proper to report this in advance, for the reason that there is at the present time no duty on any live animals whatever. We understand the Canadians have adopted something of Yankee ingenuity, and are driving over their herds to this side of the line, keeping them here until shorn and then driving them back again. This is to prevent practice like that. I suppose there will be no objection to the immediate passage of the bill.

The bill was read a first and second time, ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NATIONAL BANKS AND CURRENCY.

Mr. DARLING, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to amend the act in relation to national banks and currency, approved June 3, 1864; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

REBEL COTTON LOAN.

Mr. KASSON, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to this House, if not incompatible with the public interest, any negotiations that have been entered into by or proposed to the executive department of this Government respecting the rebel debt known as the cotton loan or any other rebel indebtedness.

WEST VIRGINIA.

Mr. LATHAM, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution to extend to the counties of Berkeley and Jefferson, in West Virginia, the provisions of an act approved July 4, 1864, entitled "An act to restrict the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims and to provide for the payment of certain demands for quartermaster's stores and subsistence supplies furnished to the Army of the United States;" which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania, presented papers in relation to the contested election in the twenty-first congressional district of Pennsylvania; which was referred to the Committee of Elections.

RAILROAD IN MINNESOTA.

Mr. JULIAN, from the Committee on Public Lands, by unanimous consent, reported House bill No. 497, granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the city of Yankton to the west line of the State of Minnesota, in the Territory of Dakota; which was ordered to be printed, and recommended.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was recommended, and to lay that motion on the table. The latter motion was agreed to.

EMIGRANT VESSELS.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to.

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be requested to inquire what legislation is necessary to prevent vessels from foreign ports carrying an undue and disproportionate number of passengers and emigrants to their ship accommodations, and whether any precaution should be adopted to prevent the introduction into this country of cholera and other infectious diseases in such overloaded vessels.

DEFENSE OF MONTANA TERRITORY.

Mr. SMITH. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill to provide arms and ammunition for the defense of the inhabitants of Montana Territory.

Mr. SPALDING. I object.

ESCUTCHEONS OF WEST VIRGINIA AND NEVADA.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following report from the Commissioner of Public Buildings; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations:

OFFICE COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC BUILDINGS,
CAPITOL OF THE UNITED STATES,
WASHINGTON, April 25, 1866.

SIR: In compliance with the resolution of the House of Representatives of the United States of February 13, 1866, I have caused to be painted and placed in two of the panels of the ceiling of the House of Representatives the escutcheons of the States of West Virginia and of Nevada.

I am, with high respect, your obedient servant,

B. B. FRENCH,
Commissioner of Public Buildings.
Hon. SCHUYLER COLFAX, Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States.

NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I call for the regular order of business.

The House accordingly proceeded, as the regular order of business, to the consideration of the unfinished business of last evening, being House bill No. 414, to secure the speedy construction of the Northern Pacific railroad and telegraph line, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes.

The pending question was the question raised by Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, on the reception of the report, upon which the previous question had been seconded and the main question ordered, and the yeas and nays ordered.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I understand the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PRICE] expresses a willingness, if the report shall be received, to give full and ample time for discussion. I therefore waive all objections to the acceptance of the report.

Mr. WENTWORTH. How long will he give?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. He is willing to give until August if necessary.

Mr. WENTWORTH. Does he say so? [Laughter.]

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Oh yes, sir. He means by that, of course, a reasonable time.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I want to be heard on this question.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I have the pledge of my friend from Iowa [Mr. PRICE] and I will indorse it.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I would rather have the Speaker's indorsement. [Laughter.]

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I withdraw objection to the reception of the report.

The SPEAKER. The question then is, Shall the bill be engrossed and read the third time?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I now raise the question of order whether the bill is before the House—whether after it was recommitted to the committee they reported back the bill which was before the House or another bill.

The SPEAKER. The question of reception is withdrawn, and now the question of order is raised in regard to the bill being properly before the House.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. My point of order is that the bill before the House was never referred to the committee; that they never had it in their possession, and did not report it back.

The SPEAKER. That involves the question of reception. The Chair will decide the point of order. The subject of a Northern Pacific railroad having been referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad by petitions and bills, that gave them jurisdiction of the question, and they had a right to report the bill referred to them or any other bill on the subject. The Chair, therefore, overrules the question of order and the bill is before the House.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I call for the reading of the bill, reserving the right to raise a question of order upon it when it has been read.

The bill was read.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, their Secretary, informed the House that the Senate insisted upon their amendments, disagreed to by the House, to the bill of the House No. 238, to amend an act entitled "An act relating to habeas corpus and regulating judicial proceedings in certain cases," approved March 3, 1863, and agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon; and had appointed Mr. CLARK, Mr. TRUMBULL, and Mr. HENDRICKS the conferees on the part of the Senate.

NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD—AGAIN.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. It will be remembered that last night, when this bill was presented, I raised the point of order that it was an appropriation bill. Since that time I have conferred with many gentlemen, both those who are favorable to this measure and those who oppose it, and I have heard from them but one opinion, and that is that the Speaker, in giving his opinion and sustaining the point of order, was clearly correct.

The bill as now reported again differs in no material manner from the bill reported last evening. I therefore raise the same point of order, that this is an appropriation bill and must go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The bill now contains the following proviso:

Provided, however, That no money shall be paid on account of this bill until an appropriation shall be made for that purpose.

The Clerk will now read from the Globe a decision made upon this point by one of the predecessors of the present occupant of the Chair in the year 1863.

The Clerk read as follows:

"The SPEAKER. It has always been held that in order to bring a bill within the rule, the appropriation must be sufficient, without requiring further legislation, to take money out of the Treasury."

That has been the uniform ruling of various occupants of the chair, and as this bill will not, without further legislation, take any money out of the Treasury, the Chair overrules the point of order and decides that this is not an appropriation bill.

Mr. PRICE obtained the floor.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I ask the gentleman from Iowa to let the report be read.

Mr. PRICE. I am not aware of there being any report.

Mr. Speaker, I am glad that the stress of weather by which this bill has been incumbered is clearing up, the fog is lifting, and its friends feel pleasure in finding it on the open sea of free discussion.

I will say at the commencement that I do not propose to indulge in any attempts at oratory or eloquence in reference to this bill. I am of opinion that it is a matter of dollars and cents, facts and figures. Unless the facts and the figures will establish the other important fact that the bill has merits of its own and ought to pass this House, then I, as one of the advocates of the bill, as one of the committee who report it to this House, am perfectly willing to see it voted down.

This Northern Pacific railroad was chartered at the first session of the Thirty-Eighth Congress, and gives an extensive grant of lands to the company. Nothing, as I understand, has been done by the company up to this time, for the reason that the lands granted cannot be made available for the purposes intended. They now come forward and ask additional assistance in the shape of a guarantee of a certain amount of stock to enable them to make the grant available. I want gentlemen to remember that it is a limited amount of stock for a limited time.

The only question to be settled in reference to this matter is, whether the guarantees that the Government is to give to the company who agree to the construction of this road will be repaid to the Government and the country by the benefits derived from it. On the first three hundred and eighty miles of this road the bill proposes to guaranty stock to the amount of $20,000 per mile. I will be obliged to gentlemen who feel an interest in this bill, either for or against it, if they will give their attention to these figures. Figures, as gentlemen know, will not lie, unless they be put down wrongly; and it is the business of members to see whether I put them down wrong or not.

On the next six hundred and twenty miles of this road the bill proposes to guaranty stock to the amount of $25,000 per mile, making the guarantee upon the stock $20,000 per mile and $25,000 per mile for the first thousand miles of the road, the average being $22,500 per mile. The interest upon that stock at six per cent, the rate specified in the bill, which interest is to be paid in currency, will be $1,350 per mile, or $135,000 for the first one hundred miles.

Now, it will be remarked, and this is an item worth noticing and remembering, that the bill provides in express terms that when twenty-five miles of this road shall have been completed and put in running order, and not until then, the Government shall guaranty the amount of $20,000 per mile. Another fact, and a very important one, connected with this item, is that immediately on the completion of the twenty-five miles for which stock is guaranteed, the company shall pay into the Treasury of the United States twenty-five per cent. of the gross receipts. Now, I hope that members will not confound this with gross earnings or net earnings. One fourth of all the moneys received by this corporation on the twenty-five miles of road upon which the stock has been guaranteed to a limited amount must be paid into the Treasury of the United States.

Now, I have taken some trouble to ascertain what will be the probable earnings; and I adopt as the basis of my estimates the earnings of western roads—new roads in a new country. I have now in my mind one road on the west bank of the Mississippi eighty miles long, with earnings of about six hundred thousand dollars per year. Taking that as the basis of my calculation, I calculate that one hundred miles of the Northern Pacific railroad would give $750,000 a year. By this calculation, one fourth of the earnings during the year would be $187,500. This amount the Government of the United States would receive each year for the guarantee of the stock of the company upon the first hundred miles.

Now, gentlemen will remember that the bill provides that the proceeds of all the lands on the south side of this road are to be paid into the Treasury of the United States. This, at $2 50 an acre, will give you $24,000 to be added to the $187,500, which is one fourth of the gross earnings of the road. And I ought to have stated, in connection with the $187,500, that it is $52,500 more than the amount guaranteed by the Government.

Now, if these figures are correct, and the calculations approximate anywhere near the truth, at the end of the year we would have $76,500 more money from the proceeds of the sales of the land and the quarter of the gross receipts of the road, than has been guaranteed by the Government. Now, gentlemen may answer that by saying that the land will not be sold, or if sold will not sell for that amount of money. Well, I will give them the benefit of that objection, and admit, for the sake of argument, that not an acre of land shall be sold, and that the earnings of the road shall only be such as other roads have earned in new countries. And then you will still have $52,500 at the end of the year on this calculation, more than has been guaranteed by the Government.

Now, I am at a loss to know how this argument is to be met. It may do to say in broad terms that $60,000,000 or $50,000,000 are to be taken out of the Treasury of the United States for the benefit of a great corporation. It is one thing to make a declaration; it is another and a very different thing to back up that declaration by the facts and the figures. But I appeal to the living facts for the basis of my calculations, and for the conclusions at which I have arrived in this argument. If this road will earn what other roads in the new countries have earned heretofore, then at the end of the construction of the first hundred miles of this road the Government will have received $52,500 more than they have guaranteed to the company.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE. I would like to ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PRICE] a question. I desire to inquire whether this twenty-five per cent. of the gross earnings of the road is to be paid at any time previous to the completion of the entire road. I understand the language of the act requires the entire completion of the road before any of the proceeds are to be returned to the Government.

Mr. PRICE. The question of the gentleman shows me what I have always believed, that when bills are read from the Clerk's desk, not one man in ten in this House knows what is in the bills.

Now, I will reiterate a fact I have already stated, that there is an amendment, not printed, but written, in the bill, by which the committee have attempted to guard the matter particularly. The amendment provides that when the first twenty-five miles of the road are made, twenty-five dollars of every $100 they earn, or, if you please, twenty-five cents on every dollar they earn, goes right into the Government Treasury; not of the net earnings, but of the gross receipts; not even of the gross earnings, but of their gross receipts. If the company receive money in any way, fair or unfair, the Government is to have one quarter of it.

One reason why the committee are in favor of this bill, is that they believe they can by this means aid the company to open and foster the vast regions of the Northwest, which for ages past have been, and probably to come will be, unsettled, undeveloped, unimproved, and untenanted without this aid; and at the same time that they give this aid, the Government will not be paying out a dollar.

Then, I ask, what becomes of the declaration, which appears in the Globe of to-day, and which has gone to the world, that the committee recommend a proposition taking from fifty to sixty million dollars out of the Treasury of the United States? I take occasion here and now to repudiate that declaration, and to say that from first to last that was not the intent of the committee in any respect whatever, nor can any authority be found in this bill for the declaration.

Mr. LYNCH. I would ask the gentleman if he includes in the gross receipts the sales of lands by the company.

Mr. PRICE. The Government is to get fifty per cent. of the sales of the lands, and twenty-five per cent. of the receipts of the road.

Mr. LYNCH. I understand that fifty per cent. to be of the proceeds of the sales of the lands on the southern side of the road. But if lands are sold on the northern side of the road, is the Government to be entitled to twenty-five per cent. of the receipts from that source?

Mr. PRICE. I do not understand that any portion of the proceeds of the land north of the road is to be given to the Government.

Mr. LYNCH. Would not the term "gross receipts" include all the receipts of the road from sales of lands and otherwise?

Mr. PRICE. It might be so construed; but that was not the intention of the committee. When they had provided for the value of half the lands they thought they had done tolerably well for the Government, especially when in addition to that they include twenty-five per cent. of the gross receipts of the road.

I think I have sufficiently answered the financial argument of this subject to prove that there is no money to be drawn from the Treasury of the United States; that this is a safe arrangement in that respect.

Mr. Speaker, the object of land grants to railroads in this country has been to develop its resources. The construction of railroads induces settlement and causes the wilderness to blossom as the rose. It is necessary that this country should be developed in its agricultural resources. In addition to developing those resources we propose also by this road to reach for all time to come the vast mineral resources of the mighty regions now almost deserts and almost inaccessible. I think it is demonstrable, then, that the Government will not only be compensated by the one fourth of the gross receipts and proceeds of one half the lands, but I am of the opinion that the additional benefits to be derived from this road will be immense, and extend not only to this but to future generations. They will be more than tenfold the amount guaranteed by the Government to the company. Any gentleman at all acquainted with the mineral resources of Montana and Idaho, and the difficulty of reaching those places, must see that when we have annihilated the space between here and there by the construction of railroads the dollars which come from there now will be swelled to hundreds and thousands, if not millions.

This country is to be developed. It is the mission of the men of this day to develop the heritage intrusted to us. In no other way can the regions teeming with untold wealth be developed.

Now, let us look at the road in a military point of view. I shall not indulge in any conjectures. I find that Major General Rufus Ingalls, assistant quartermaster general, uses the following language:

"In my opinion, from an experience of many years in the quartermaster's department in the West and Northwest, it is of the utmost importance to the nation that this road should be constructed at the earliest moment possible, and a through line of communication opened from the great lakes to the Pacific ocean, by the head waters of the Mississippi and Missouri."

That is not all. Let me now read from Quartermaster General Meigs's report for 1865. He says:

"I am convinced that there is no difficulty to be apprehended from the rigor of the climate, or the depth of snow, in the working of the Northern Pacific railroad, which has not been not successfully and overcome in the construction and regular daily working of railroads in the States of Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Michigan, and Minnesota, and in Upper Canada, along the line of the Grand Trunk."

"Of the advantages to result to the country from the speedy opening of railroad communication along the contemplated line, it is hardly necessary for me to speak. I can add little to the argument so well set forth by the Senators and Representatives of the Northwest in their appeal to Congress of the 9th of this month."

"Heretofore the War Department has not had any considerable interest to protect in the northern central region, for whose development and protection this road is now so urgently needed."

He says in another place:

"The enterprise is one worthy of the nation. As a military measure, contributing to national security and defense alone, it is worthy of the cost of effectual assistance from the Government."

"The Central railroad to San Francisco will secure that admirable harbor and its trade, and the rich State of California, against all serious danger from a foreign foe."

"But our communication with the harbors of the northwest coast, Puget sound, the mouth of the Columbia, and with the growing population of Oregon and Washington, by sea from San Francisco, will be liable to interruption by a hostile fleet. With the Northern Pacific railroad in operation, troops and materials of war could be rapidly sent from the East to succor and defend our rising empire in the Northwest."

I will now call the attention of the House, and particularly of my friend from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN,] to the letter of Lieutenant General Grant indorsing those statements. I ask the Clerk to read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

HEADQUARTERS ARMIES OF THE UNITED STATES,
April 20, 1866.

The construction of a railroad by the proposed route would be of very great advantage to the Government pecuniarily, by saving in the cost of transportation to supply troops whose presence in the country through which it is proposed to pass is made necessary by the great amount of emigration to the gold-bearing regions of the Rocky mountains. In my opinion, too, the United States would receive an additional pecuniary benefit in the construction of this road by the settlement it would induce along the line of the road, and consequently the less number of troops necessary to secure order and safety. How far these benefits should be compensated by the General Government beyond the grant of land already awarded by Congress, I would not pretend to say. I would merely give it as my opinion that the enterprise of constructing the Northern Pacific railroad is one well worth fostering by the General Government, and that such aid could well be afforded as would insure the early prosecution of the work.

U. S. GRANT,
Lieutenant General.

Mr. PRICE. Now, Mr. Speaker, I undertake to say, from that declaration of principles set forth in that letter, that if the Lieutenant General were here he would vote for this bill, for he says that the prosecution of the construction of this Northern Pacific railroad is well worth the fostering care of the General Government.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I would ask the gentleman whether the Lieutenant General is not one of the corporators. [Laughter.]

Mr. PRICE. I will say to my amiable friend that I have not looked at the list of corporators recently so as to be able to tell whether he is so or not. If he is, I have only to say that it is rather late in the day to call in question the integrity, honesty, or ability of that distinguished general, and I presume no gentleman here will undertake to insinuate that he wrote that letter because he was a corporator. Such an insinuation would be unworthy of any member of the House, as it would be unjust to that distinguished man. I know that my friend does not mean to insinuate it, but puts in the remark very much in the same way as he has done a great many other things—for Buncombe; as, for instance, his frequent remarks about soldiers with one leg and one arm.

Now, in addition to this testimony, I wish to say that in the Quartermaster General's report made to the House in 1865, there will be found on page 34 this statement:

"Cost of transporting military stores westward across the plains, by contract for year ending June 30, 1865, to Utah, and points on that route, $1,524,119. Cost of transportation of grain to Utah and posts on that route, where the grain was delivered by contractors and the transportation entered into the price paid same year, $2,526,727 68; making cost for transportation in one year in this region $4,050,846 68."

The Quartermaster General goes on to say what is unnecessary to say, because everybody knows it, that the railroad would reduce the cost of transportation at least seventy-five per cent. There are twelve military posts now, some of them garrisoned by one hundred and some by two hundred men, along that very route, and there will be a very great saving in the transportation of supplies to these posts if this road is constructed.

From whatever standpoint you view it, either in a military, financial, or civil point of view, it becomes an inevitable conclusion that this road will be of immense advantage in developing the agricultural and mineral resources of the country.

These are some of the reasons that induced the committee to report this bill. I repeat that if my calculations are correct it will not take a dollar from the Treasury, and until gentlemen can show that the estimates upon which these calculations are made are erroneous they should not undertake to deny the fact. And that fact once established, every other objection to the bill must necessarily fall. If the road can be constructed with the simple guarantees of the Government affording the means to pay the expenses of construction, it will enable the company to refund every dollar that is paid to them as rapidly as the road progresses, and it will at the same time develop the resources of the country, and aid the civil and military operations of the Government. These facts being established, no gentleman can find any ground of opposition to the bill now before the House.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I would ask the gentleman whether there is any provision in this bill for the repayment to the United States in any event of anything more than the actual amount they have received. In other words, whether the Government is to have any interest on the money it pays to aid in the construction of this road. I call his attention to the provision in the second section, that "the amount so paid shall equal the amount paid by the United States, as provided in section one, after which all further payments to the United States shall cease." And the other provision, so far as I understand it, contemplates only the payment of the actual amount which the Government has furnished—nothing for interest on the money that has been paid by the Government.

Mr. PRICE. I reply to that by saying that the committee did not contemplate that any sum should be paid by the company to the Government for interest on the guarantee of these bonds. And further, I call the attention of the House again to this provision: if on the 1st day of July, 1867, twenty-five miles of that road shall be finished, then the company come to the Government and say that it must indorse their bonds for $20,000 a mile on each of those miles. Mind, that before the ink is dry on the indorsement the road is in running order, and is earning money, which money, by another provision of the bill, is to be paid into the Treasury. At the end of six months the holder of the stock comes to the Government to receive the interest on his guaranteed stock. If in the mean time enough money has been paid in to the Government to pay said guaranteed interest, the Government pays nothing. There was no intention on the part of the framers of this bill that the Government should receive any interest on the payments it might make on account of guaranteed interest on stock.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I wish the gentleman, chairman of the committee which reports this bill, would let me state what I understand the effect of this bill to be in some of the respects in which I think it bad. In the first place, the original bill incorporating this company bestowed upon this corporation forty sections of land to the mile in the Territories and twenty sections to the mile within the States. Then the third section of this bill enables the corporation to sell this land in fee-simple, and place the proceeds in the power of the corporation. This vast revenue is thus taken from the Treasury of the United States, and the only pledge or security that any of the proceeds of this land will ever go to pay back the interest on stock which the Government has paid, and which interest may amount to from forty to sixty million dollars, is that the treasurer of the corporation is directed to pay into the Treasury of the United States, which is just no security at all.

And then, sir, there is no provision at all for the payment of any interest to the United States upon the moneys the Government has paid out for this six per cent. interest on stock, but only the principal is to be paid back.

Then, again, although the United States has virtually built this road, and the stockholders have not, yet they require the Government to come in and guaranty to them that the road, which the Government land has built for these stockholders, shall pay them six per cent. upon all the immense amount of stock to be issued, and that, too, from the date of the issue and for not exceeding twenty years.

I wish to know if these provisions are in substance in this bill; and if so, does the gentleman think this right?

Mr. PRICE. Before my friend goes further, I submit that he has not fairly stated the case; because before any guarantee is made, and long before any money is paid, the company must spend at least a million or a million and a half on the first twenty-five miles of the road, and so on from time to time in twenty-five-mile sections. There is to be no guarantee of interest on stock until that is done. I am perfectly willing, if the gentleman from Ohio prefers it, that an accurate interest account-current shall be kept, and that you shall credit the Government with interest on payments and charge it with interest on payments made by the company. So far as I am concerned, I ask nothing but a fair and square transaction, such as would take place between two men in a legitimate business transaction; and if the gentleman wishes an amendment of that kind made, I presume there will be no objection to it. I do not think, however, it will have any practical effect on the bill.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have no more to say at present upon this matter. I do not desire to consume the time of the House, because I am desirous for an early vote on the bill. And as I do not wish to deprive others of the same privilege of debate that I enjoy, I now yield the floor.

SERVICE ON A COMMITTEE.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I understood yesterday that the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. Cook,] my colleague on the Committee on the Judiciary, was unwell and would not be able to be in the House. He is in his seat this morning, and I therefore ask to be excused from serving on the committee of conference on the shabeas corpus bill, so that that gentleman may be placed upon it as he had charge of the bill when it was reported to the House.

There being no objection, Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, was relieved from service on the committee of conference, and Mr. Cook was appointed by the Speaker to fill his place.

NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD—AGAIN.

Mr. WENTWORTH. Mr. Speaker, there is a vast deal of difference between being for a Pacific railroad and being for a particular kind of railroad covering or intended to cover the same ground. Now, there is no individual here, nor is there an individual whose constituents are more interested in a northern Pacific railroad than mine are. We of the Northwest, generally, are deeply interested in a bill for a northwestern Pacific railroad; but we have always before when a bill of this kind, involving millions, came up here allowed it to be discussed, and let everybody talk about it who wanted to do it; at least we were always willing to give our friends a fair and impartial hearing. But, Mr. Speaker, I have myself always distrusted any bill that brought with it a "lobby." I have always distrusted any bill where that class of men known as "the lobby" have to go behind my constituents and get them to instruct me.

Now, sir, I have lived in my district since I was twenty-one years of age. I know about everybody there, and about everybody there knows me. And yet this class of men have thought that they could instruct me about a matter involving the interests of my constituents among whom I have lived and among whom I expect to die. Within the last three days I have had sent to me nineteen extracts from western papers, not to speak of sundry instructions from the Chicago Board of Trade. Now, I hope that the man who went out there and got up those instructions for me got his per diem and mileage. [Laughter.] And if he cannot get other jobs of this kind, then let some one try to get him the place of a clerk of one of our committees, or recommend him to a place in some of the Departments.

Now, the first knowledge I had of this bill was conveyed to me by a constituent of mine, who stated that there was some effort being made to create public feeling in favor of this bill. "But," he says, "I think there is some trick in it; you better watch the bill; I fear they want to change the location, for it looks to us as if it was intended to be a Canada road."

Now, I supposed that when this matter came up I would be allowed to know something about it, to have a chance to examine a subject that so interests the great Northwest. But I do not know anything about it.

Mr. PRICE. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WENTWORTH] says he knows nothing about it. I would ask him if he has seen the Chicago Tribune.

Mr. WENTWORTH. If the gentleman had paid attention to my speech, he would have seen that I alluded to all these articles in the papers.

Last evening was set apart for the discussion of this bill. And when we came here we found a bill before us involving millions of dollars, concerning my constituents, concerning the whole northwestern country. And it was to be put through under the previous question. And how is the thing to be managed? A man gets the floor and then allows about three minutes or five minutes each to a few men to say something upon it. And considering the number who were to be allowed to speak, I estimate that each member was worth about ten million dollars to the company. [Laughter.]

Now, I take up the bill and examine it, and I find that there is a forerunner in it. Now, though not much of a lawyer, I have always understood that if an original charter has been violated in any way, and you can by hook or crook get it recognized by any little side-way legislation afterward, it will remove all the difficulty. Now, I looked at the bill with that view. And then I went to the original charter, and I find there a large number of corporators. Now, it is always the way, when you want to dignify a thing of this kind, and want to take a great appropriation out of the public Treasury, to put in a large lot of names of distinguished people. And the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PRICE] has had read here a letter from General Grant. All I would ask is, if General Grant has ever been concerned in this company since his name was put in the original charter?

Now, in our western country when we get up calls of meetings we always put on some big names as the speakers, although we do not know that they will be there; and then we have our board of managers to attend to all the little business of the meeting. A great many names of big men are published in big letters on the bills as having been invited and as being expected to attend the meeting. [Laughter.]

If members will turn to the act of incorporation of 1864, they will find the names of these corporators. They were not taken, as is often the case, from those who are members of the body passing the legislation, for I find among them the name of but one member of this House. But there is the name of General Grant; and not only his name, but the name of General Frémont also. Now, the question I want answered is, what have these men done? They were named in the charter; and if they were not willing to comply with the conditions of the charter, are they willing to give it up and let others come in and take the charter? Have they ever organized under that charter? My friend from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM.] whose name I find here, I know will take no offense if I ask him if he can give us any information upon the subject.

Mr. BINGHAM. I can only say, in reply to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WENTWORTH,] that I learned this morning for the first time that my name was inserted in this statute. I was not a member of the last Congress, and was never consulted upon the subject. I have no information upon the subject, and therefore can impart none to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. WENTWORTH. Now, I have proved exactly what I wanted to prove, that a large number of respectable men are in the same position as the gentleman from Ohio, and do not know that their names have been used in this act as corporators. But there are some persons who know their names are here; there are some who are running this machine under the names of these distinguished men. Now, who are they? They ask this House to give them fifty or sixty million dollars. Yet one of the men who are named in the act as corporators did not know that his name was there. Still, because I say this it is intimated that I had better look out or I shall be set down as an enemy to my own section of country and an enemy to the Northern Pacific railroad.

Now, I want to know who are really the corporators in this company—who are the active men. I want to know who is the president of this road, and I want to know how near he lives to the Canada line. Can anybody tell who the president of this road is? I would like to have an answer, if anybody can give it officially. I do not want any guess-work.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I can inform the gentleman who is the president of this road. He is a personal friend and an old acquaintance of mine, formerly Governor of my State—a gentleman for whose integrity and ability I will vouch here and elsewhere. His name is John Gregory Smith. He is one of the railroad men of Vermont, operating one of the most extensive railroads in New England; and he desires the protection of these interests, so that this road to the Pacific may go through our own country, contributing to its wealth and prosperity, instead of going through her Britannic Majesty's dominions in Canada, where the road must go unless this company can get some aid from Congress.

Mr. WHALEY. I ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WENTWORTH] to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. WENTWORTH. Does the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WHALEY] wish to say anything on this subject?

Mr. WHALEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. WENTWORTH. Then I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WHALEY. I merely wish to say that when I saw my friend from Illinois upon the floor I thought it an excellent opportunity for me to speak on this subject for three or four minutes, which I know he would not refuse to grant me. Let me say that the argument which that gentleman has presented against this bill, it appears to me, is, to use a western phrase, a "stumper."

I wish to say further, that while during the last five years I have voted for almost all works of national improvement, stretching from Maine into the Territories, I have come to the conclusion that before we impose upon our people any heavier taxation for carrying on works of this character, before drawing from the Treasury of the United States increased appropriations of money, or pledging the credit of the United States to any greater extent, we should, in a straightforward and honest manner, meet our obligations to the brave soldiers of the nation, and pass a bill to equalize the bounties of the men who volunteered in 1861 and 1862.

Mr. WENTWORTH. Now, Mr. Speaker, I want gentlemen to understand what I am driving at. I want to know whether we are to have this Northern Pacific railroad completed or not. I do not want to be personally offensive, because I am now speaking in the dark; and "in the night," it is said, "all cats are grey." I want to know who else are interested in this road; and I would like to know, if my friend from Vermont can tell me, whether they have ever paid in anything.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I am not able, Mr. Speaker, to give the gentleman the information he requires. I have had no personal connection with this road. But I am assured by gentlemen in whom I have the utmost confidence that this enterprise is undertaken in good faith, and it is to be controlled by one of the most intelligent, influential, and wealthy men in my own or any other portion of the country.

Mr. WENTWORTH. Now, Mr. Speaker, I was at one time the mayor of a city; and we sometimes arrested men for playing what was called "the confidence game." [Laughter.]

Now, sir, I shall not vote this number of millions out of the Treasury in any generous confidence. I know and have proved to this House by my friend from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] there is at least one man who does not know anything about it. I believe there are nine out of ten who are in the same position. Here is nearly a page of names of men from different States in the Union.

But where is the report? I call the attention of the House to the fact that we have not a single report to guide us. Suppose a man has to defend himself for supporting this measure; suppose he makes a statement and one in the crowd alleges that it is false, what can he do? Give us the documents; that will settle the matter. It is the question of veracity. That man will have to write here, "My dear friend, be so kind as to send me the report of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, as I am seriously attacked on the subject." We will have to reply there is no report. It is, as has been remarked, voting money out of the Treasury without a report.

Now, when you see a man with eyes which cannot bear light you may conclude they are weak. If men shun light it is because they cannot bear it. [Laughter.] I am one of the individuals who want light. I want to know whether I am to take this or not. Give me responsible railroad men, take out the names of politicians; take out the names of claim agents; give me responsible railroad men, one from each State, and I will vote for this bill. I will do anything to get a fair and honest Pacific railroad.

I have sought information from the House to know to whom this money is to go; who will give it to me?

One would suppose, Mr. Speaker, what they really wanted was money to build the road. There is always something else in these acts of incorporation. Hence acts of incorporation should be watched. More than all we should watch acts amending acts of incorporation. Let us see what it is. It is said that the people of Chicago are to be benefited by this. If so, then I shall be benefited with the people of my city.

I call attention of the House to the reason why this should go to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. In looking over the names I find among the corporators in the act passed in 1864 the present president of this road, John Gregory Smith, who represents this road not as a lobbyist and presenter of claims before this Congress.

Mr. WENTWORTH. Does he know that he is president? [Laughter.]

Mr. BLAINE. Among the incorporators of this road are presidents of two leading railroads in my own State, one at present one of the directors of this road—Richard D. Rice and Anson P. Morris—two gentlemen for whom I will vouch everywhere.

Mr. WENTWORTH. Do they know they are there? [Laughter.]

Mr. BLAINE. They know they are there, and I know they are there.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I ask the gentleman to yield to me.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I yield to my friend as he always talks sense.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I want to put a question to my friend from Vermont as he seems to be familiar with the history of this corporation. A statement was made to me by a gentleman of eminently good character, formerly a member of this House, that the fact might be known. He was a stockholder in this company, I understand, and is perfectly familiar with the facts. I understood he wanted the fact known, although he did not want his name connected with the matter. I know nothing about it personally. His statement was this: that the gentlemen who had been instrumental and at considerable expense in getting this act passed by the Thirty-Eighth Congress, and who are connected with it as stockholders, made a contract to transfer their interest; that it was to be put in writing, but it was wholly or partly repudiated; that the contract provided for the payment of some one hundred and fifty thousand dollars; and that now these parties having purchased the franchise, virtually repudiated their engagements, and come into Congress for the purpose of getting these large additional values to this franchise obtained under such circumstances. That is the statement. About the truth of it I know nothing in the world.

Mr. DELANO. Allow me to say in this connection that I have substantially the same information from another source.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I will answer that question so far as I know, and I am known well enough in this House, I hope, to have it believed; I would not lend myself or my influence in any respect to get through an improper, unjust, or dishonest claim.

Mr. WENTWORTH. Name the prominent railroad men.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. Mr. Onslow Stearns, a prominent railroad man in New England, a man who stands as high as Mr. Ogden of the gentleman's own district, who has done more to build up and develop the railroad system of the West than any other man in his district.

Mr. WENTWORTH. Gentlemen interrupt me and keep going off on side issues. What I want is the facts. All these big men are not in the bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. Yes, sir, they are.

Mr. WENTWORTH. Where is the proof of it? Why do not they tell me the names of the officers of the company?

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I know some of the officers of the company who are here; and I know what they are here for.

Mr. WENTWORTH. They are here for money.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. The gentleman is a little nervous. I intend to give my views on this question; but if it will answer the purpose of the gentleman as well, I am willing to answer his question now.

Mr. WENTWORTH. My object was to stir up a little inquiry on this subject. But I start upon this basis: that one of the worst things in the present time is the departure from the old safe precedent by allowing bills to pass without any kind of report. Nine tenths of the members do not know what they are doing when they are voting upon such bills. It is committing political suicide; for when members are called to account at home for the votes they have given they have nothing to defend themselves with.

Suppose, for instance, I had voted for this bill on the strength of the name of my friend from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] being in it. We all know him and what he has done for his country. What sort of a defense would that be before my constituents if I should be called on to explain it, say, four days before election? I would telegraph perhaps to my friend and he would send word back that he did not know anything about it. [Laughter.]

Mr. PRICE. I would ask the gentleman whether he does believe that in such a dark hour of trial, when his political enemies were seeking to oust him from his place, he would be protected by the ghosts of the soldiers with one arm and one leg who would come to his rescue. [Laughter.]

Mr. WENTWORTH. I know this, that if I have right on my side God will support me. [Laughter.]

But, Mr. Speaker, how long is it since a bill was offered to give some poor soldier eight dollars a month, and somebody called out for the report? "Where is the report in that case?" "Let us have the report." Now only look at this bill. The joke of it is that you yourselves do not know how much money you are to give. You not only give it without any report, but you cannot tell how much you give.

Now, here is a nice thing. But the people at the West understand these things. Some eastern man must have drawn this. When some of our Yankee friends first came out there and advocated it they said it was a good thing. But it is played out now. Live Suckers and Hoosiers know all about this, and what it means. Here is your original bill and charter. Certain things are to transpire when the road is commenced. Now, here comes in that dangerous thing, the amendment to the original bill, and that is to define what commences the road.

Now, if any of you do not know when the road is commenced, here is the law of Congress, a precedent to be quoted on us hereafter, an act of the Thirty-Ninth Congress:

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the commencement of the survey of the railroad and telegraph line in good faith shall be deemed and considered to be the commencement of the work within the meaning and intent of the act of incorporation.

I heard a man once say that he did not care much what they called him if they did not impugn his good sense. [Laughter.] Now, I do think that this is an insult to the good sense of this House, to make us define that to be the commencement of the road. But in order that members of Congress might not know anything about it we have had an evening session and had the previous question moved in the night. Everything was to be hurried through without any chance to consider the matter, and we were to decide when this road was to be commenced—how? Why, "within the meaning and intent of the act of incorporation." Now, it was not supposed in that hour's time that we should run back to the library—I do not know but what it is locked at night—and get this act of incorporation.

But I want to say that the drift of my argument now is to show that this bill should have been referred to the Committee on Public Lands. That was the committee that originated these measures, that started the precedent of all these land grants—the Illinois Central railroad. Had this gone to that committee they would have made it conform to prior grants, and they would not have made this supplemental bill interfere with the original bill. Here is what alarms me and my constituents.

I have been anxious, and am still, that the right sort of a bill should pass, and I say now, that when this bill shall be made to conform to the usual precedent in the case I shall probably be as warm a supporter of it as there is in the House. But I want it to go through the usual form. I want it to be properly discussed. I want this supplemental bill to be compared with the original bill.

Look at the sixth section of this bill:

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the said company may from time to time alter and change the location of its line whenever such change will the better carry out the purposes set forth in the act of incorporation, by filing in the office of the Secretary of the Interior a description of the new line adopted.

Now, we are not permitted to know the intentions of these men. They have not submitted their by-laws. I have been a director of railroads and we have had to have certain by-laws and certain minutes; and when we undertook to negotiate a loan, or to do this, that, or the other thing, we sent out extracts certified by proper authority from our minutes as well as from our by-laws. But here we have no information on that subject in regard to this company, and I, who represent the largest congressional district in the United States, am entirely uninformed on the subject.

Mr. PRICE. I would ask the gentleman whether, in all his exploration of the West in connection with railroad companies, he ever knew a railroad company that did not have the privilege of varying their line. And if he will look at this bill he will find that it provides that it shall not go further south than the forty-fifth parallel.

Mr. WENTWORTH. But they may go as far north as they please.

Mr. PRICE. They will not go into the British possessions.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I object to any member in this House or any one else coming and whispering and telling this man and the other what will be done. It will not defend me before my constituents nor save them from the results of wrong legislation. I want to know why it is that we have no information on this subject, and why we are not allowed to have anything official upon it.

But the gentleman from Iowa asks me a question, if I do not want to know that railroad companies are privileged to swing their line. I do not think that is a proper way to get a job through this House.

Mr. PRICE. Did the gentleman ever know a land grant of any other character?

Mr. WENTWORTH. I will state to the gentleman this: that is just what I am complaining about. I say that no individual in this House has the right to get up here and make an official communication of this kind. I say this bill should go to the Committee on Public Lands, so they may bring forward their report and put their names to it. And if the gentleman will move that I be added to the Committee on Public Lands, I will agree to state what I know, and put my name to it.

Now, I am seriously afraid, and my constituents are afraid, that it is the intention, if this bill shall pass through Congress, to carry this road, under the sixth section of the bill, into the British Provinces, and bring it around so as to communicate with the Grand Trunk road at Portland, Maine, and make this a great Pacific feeder for that road.

Mr. PRICE. I will ask the gentleman from Illinois if he does not know, as well as he knows he has an existence, that this road cannot by any possible means go into the British Provinces.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I do not know any such thing; neither does anybody else know it.

Mr. PRICE. The gentleman is the best know-nothing I ever saw. [Laughter.]

Mr. WENTWORTH. I do not profess to know anything that I am not certain of, and which I am not willing to put my name to. I never knew so big a lot of know-nothings as these men are who come here to get money out of our Treasury.

Now, I ask the gentleman from Iowa why he objects to allowing this bill to go to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. PRICE. It affords me a great deal of satisfaction to answer the gentleman. It is simply and entirely because there is not an ounce nor an inch of land in the bill, any way you measure it or weigh it.

Mr. WENTWORTH. Then, if there is no land in the bill, there is money; for they must have something. And if there is money, the bill ought to go to the Committee of Ways and Means, of which I am a member. Let it go to that committee, and I will sign any report I may bring in.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. With the permission of my colleague, [Mr. WENTWORTH,] I would like to ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PRICE] a question. I am informed that some of the present officers of this road, under the new régime, are residents of Canada. Is that so?

Mr. PRICE. If that is so I am not aware of it. And I will take occasion to say, in this connection, that although that might possibly be true, even if it be so, I will say to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FARNSWORTH,] and to all others, that this Government pays no money to anybody until they have first expended their own money to build this road. That is a point in this case which I do not wish this House to forget. I do not know, nor do I believe, that any of the directors of this road are residents of Canada.

Mr. WENTWORTH. There it is again; it is "know-nothing" all around. [Laughter.] Nobody knows anything except the men who want this money.

Then "there is the little joker" again; "now you see it, and now you don't see it." [Great laughter.] Here is land, and there is money. When you say anything about this bill they say "there is no land in it;" and when you refer them to that bill they say "there is no money in it."

Mr. PRICE. That other bill was passed two years ago.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. If there is no land in this bill I would ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PRICE] what this third section means. I will read it:

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the patents for or lists of land granted to this company shall convey the fee-simple of said lands to said company in the most full and complete manner, and that none of the lands granted to said company shall be subject to any general or local tax, for any purpose whatever, till after two years from date of said conveyance.

Now, if there is no land in this bill, what does that section mean?

Mr. PRICE. I suppose the gentleman wants me to answer that question, and yet I can hardly think he does. He pretends to be a lawyer, and for aught I know he is a very good one. Does he not know the difference between granting land to a company and carrying out the provisions of a grant of land long since made? There is no grant of land in this bill, but only provisions for carrying out a former grant to this company upon their complying with certain conditions.

Mr. WENTWORTH. Now, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman stated that this had nothing to do with public lands. I asked him why he objected to this bill going to the Committee on Public Lands, and his answer was that it contained nothing in relation to public lands. Now, as the gentleman admits that it does relate to public lands, I want to know whether he still objects to the proposition to refer the bill to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. PRICE. I do not admit any such thing. The bill does not contain the grant of an inch of land; and any gentleman who will read it must see that it does not.

Mr. WENTWORTH. Does the gentleman mean the bill or the charter?

Mr. PRICE. I mean the bill.

Mr. WENTWORTH. Well, this is only another illustration of "now you see it, and now you don't." [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, I think this is one of the most important bills coming before the House this session. There is not an individual in this House who will go further than I will to secure the object which this bill professes to seek. But before I vote to give away this large amount of money, I must know how it is to be expended, and who is to have charge of the enterprise. I know that men when they get into these corporations very often "water" the stock, sell out at an advance, and some irresponsible persons come in as stockholders. I want to know what responsible men are going into this enterprise. I want to know something about their organization; I want to know the history of the matter. I want to have something in the shape of official documents. I would like to have a report from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom I think this bill should be referred. I move, therefore, that the bill be referred to the Committee on Public Lands. I shall not call for the previous question; for I hope that every member who desires to speak on this subject will be allowed to do so.

Mr. HENDERSON obtained the floor.

Mr. MORRILL. Will the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HENDERSON] yield to me a moment that I may report a bill from the Committee of Ways and Means?

Mr. HENDERSON. I will do so.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

Mr. MORRILL, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee of Ways and Means a bill to amend an act entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1864, and acts amendatory thereof; which was read a first and second time, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire that this bill shall be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and that it be made a special order. I am willing to leave it to members of the House to say what time will be most convenient for its consideration.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I suggest to the gentleman from Vermont that he leave the time indefinite for the present. That can be fixed hereafter.

The SPEAKER. There are no special orders in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union except the Indian appropriation bill, which the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations has stated he is not ready to go on with.

Mr. MORRILL. I suppose that the country is desirous to have as early action as possible on this bill; and as it will take several days to have the bill printed, I would suggest that it be made the special order for Monday week.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. We had better fix an earlier day.

Mr. MORRILL. I move, then, that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and be made a special order for to-morrow week immediately after the morning hour, and from day to day until disposed of.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. As most of the members will, I presume, desire a larger number of copies of this bill than the regular number, I move that ten thousand extra copies be printed in pamphlet form.

The SPEAKER. That motion will be referred, under the law, to the Committee on Printing.

NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD—AGAIN.

Mr. BURLEIGH. I ask the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HENDERSON] to yield to me that I may ask the chairman of the Pacific Railroad Committee [Mr. PRICE] a question.

Mr. HENDERSON. I will yield for a question.

Mr. BURLEIGH. I have before me a map of the country through which this railroad is to pass; and I ask the chairman of the committee whether he can tell us the character of the land along the line of the road from the western boundary of Minnesota to the Bear's Paw mountains—a distance of seven hundred miles. The remarks of the gentleman, as made a short time ago, conveyed, as I understood them, the idea that this is a beautiful country, and under the operations of this railroad will be made to "bud and blossom like the rose." I wish to know whether I understood the gentleman correctly.

Mr. PRICE. That region, I understand, is a tolerably fair country; but I said nothing definitely with reference to the character of the country, because my knowledge of it, like the knowledge of almost every other member, is derived simply from the examinations and reports which have been made. I presume that in the course of the discussion information as to the character of that country will be developed.

Mr. BURLEIGH. I want to ask one more question.

Mr. HENDERSON. I believe I must decline to yield. The gentleman asks a question that can only be answered in a speech, and not in a minute. To tell the character of the land through which this road will pass would require an hour.

Mr. BURLEIGH. This road runs through the Territory which I have the honor to represent on this floor. Now, during the month of March last, when an appropriation was pending of $15,000 for surveying the lands in that Territory, the gentleman opposed it on the ground that the lands were not worth surveying. I ask the gentleman whether he takes that view now or whether he takes another view.

Mr. PRICE. This is outside of that question.

I will state, for the information of the House, that the Committee on the Pacific Railroad have now under consideration a general law making the railroad companies to which lands are granted pay every dollar of the cost of surveying.

Mr. BURLEIGH. I want to know why the gentleman has changed his view in regard to these lands.

Mr. HENDERSON. I cannot yield any further.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I think the subject under consideration is perhaps of more importance than any which has come before the present session of Congress. This measure is not only a matter of sectional interest, but of interest to all the people of the United States. It is a matter, sir, of national importance. It is not of slight moment. It affects the welfare of this country to an extent with which nothing else which has been presented thus far for the consideration of this body will compare.

Before proceeding to remark further in regard to this road I will say that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WENTWORTH] is known to be a man of great wit, and hence his vast display of wit and eloquence to-day. But, sir, I confess I fail to see any argument or reason in what he has uttered. In my opinion he is on both sides of the question. At the outset he appeared to be opposed to the road, but afterward he appeared to be in favor of it. I could not help thinking of a class of politicians on the Pacific coast who have been in favor all the time of the Union, who have been in favor of the Government of the United States, but who at the same time always laughed and cheered when they heard that the rebels had got the advantage in any conflict.

So the witty points that he made were cheered and laughed at by those who were opposed to the road. The enemies of the road were decidedly tickled and amused at the wit he exhibited. I confess that if all the friends of the road were like himself, it would be a long time before we should ever have the road constructed. I say, deliver us from all such friends!

I could not help being surprised at the anxiety which he manifested to have this bill referred to the Committee on Public Lands. I could not help being surprised that other men should have an anxiety that this bill should be referred to the Committee on Public Lands, especially when it is well known that the land has already been donated to this company. This bill does not propose to donate any lands. Then, why send it to that committee? It must be simply for the purpose of defeating the bill.

We know very well that delay often defeats a measure, and that referring a bill has a tendency to destroy it. I see no reason why any gentleman should ask this bill should go to the Committee on Public Lands unless it may be ultimately to defeat it.

If the bill asked for a grant of lands perhaps it would be just and necessary to send it to the Committee on Public Lands; but the lands have already been disposed of for eighteen months or two years. I see, therefore, not the smallest propriety in the reference of the bill as suggested.

Mr. Speaker, there has been a good deal of interest manifested as to the haste and hurry we are in reference to this bill. Why should we be in such haste? Why should we be in a hurry? The reason is this: men are ready to go to work, hundreds and thousands of dollars are ready to be invested in labor upon this road. But the company are not prepared to go to work until this bill shall pass. If we delay any longer it will be too late to go to work this summer. It must be passed soon or the work will be still further delayed. A few weeks of delay will defeat the measure at least for twelve months. It is important, then, that a bill of such magnitude and in which so many interests are involved should be passed immediately. It is necessary for the purpose of being able to send out the proper men that the work may be commenced this year.

It is said these lands are given away. I want to devote a portion of my time to that point. I deny that the public lands are being given away. There is no donation of the public lands in it at all. There is a provisional transfer, or I might say sale, of lands, but no donation. The Government has millions of acres of land lying there that have been lying there for thousands of years, and which have been of no benefit to anybody. And I say that without the construction of this road they would continue to be of no benefit to anybody. Gentlemen talk about a great sacrifice of land; millions of acres given away to speculating companies! Sir, I deny the truth of any such idea of its being a donation. Let us illustrate this point by plain figures. Suppose my friend here on the left [Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois] owns a thousand acres of land lying out on the commons, unfenced and unimproved, grown up with briars, and which has become the den of wild beasts; that land does him no good, and it does no one else any good.

Now, suppose that a gentleman should make a proposition to him of this kind, "If you will give me half the land I will fence the whole of it, I will sink a well so as to provide water, and clear off the brush so as to make your part of it profitable to you." He accedes to the proposition, the bargain is completed, and this land becomes worth to him, perhaps, five hundred or one thousand dollars a year. Then another man comes and says to him, in the spirit in which gentlemen speak here, and asks, "Why did you give away that rich and productive land?" I say that it was a fair bargain and sale, and when the individual complied with the terms of the proposition, he held it as honestly as if he had paid $1,000 for it.

Now, let me say in regard to this donation of land to the road that the land does not go to the company until the road is built, and when the road is built the value of the lands retained by the Government will be increased at least one hundred-fold. I ask any man to say whether that is a gift. If the company builds the road, and by so doing increases the value of the Government lands one hundred per cent., is that a gift of the lands? Is it a donation? Is it a waste of the lands? No sensible man will say that it is a gift, or a donation, or a waste. It is a sensible investment; just such investments as this Government is in the habit of making.

Gentlemen talk about wasting the public lands. I am not surprised that some of my friends from the Atlantic coast, who have never seen much of the wilds of the West, think these lands would be worth from one hundred to three hundred dollars an acre; but the fact is, that these lands have remained unsold for thousands of years, and we to-day are offering them at $1 25 per acre, and cannot get any price for them. And that state of things will continue until a road is built by which immigration can go to that region, and the country be secured from the savages.

Again, I say that the Government will not have to pay a dime of interest. The Government only lends its credit. Let us illustrate this point, also. Suppose that a father desires to assist his son to commence business, but, from misfortunes, has no ready money on hand, but has credit at the bank. He draws his notes for $10,000, and hands them to his son, and says to him, "Here are the notes; you can put them in the bank and do business upon them, but you must refund the money by the proceeds of your sales as rapidly as may be."

Now, suppose the son to be successful; he meets his father's notes when due: is there any money paid; is the father called upon to pay that $10,000? Not at all. He had no $10,000 to pay; but he had credit, and that credit enabled the son to go successfully into business. And, sir, this company does not ask the Government to advance $60,000 or any other sum, but simply to guaranty interest at six per cent., which would only become due when twenty-five miles of the road are completed. Then the interest on that amount is due; but one fourth of the gross receipts of the road are to be immediately applied to paying that interest. Another provision is, that the company can refund that money by transporting the mails and munitions of war of the Government; and there is no doubt that in a very few years the Government would get back in transportation all that it advanced.

But there is a third resource. The proceeds of the sales of the one half of these lands, all the lands lying on the south side of the road, would refund to the Government all the money it had paid.

Mr. Speaker, I have seen no man who has passed over this route to the Pacific coast, either going or returning, who opposes this measure. Every man who has viewed the Pacific coast, from San Francisco bay to Puget sound, understands the nature and necessity of this road. I know that many men seem to think that Puget sound and San Francisco bay are almost immediately together, and I wish to say that those two points are one thousand miles apart. There we have a coast of near two thousand miles. We have there an agricultural country that is unsurpassed in the world; we have a grazing country that is unsurpassed in the world; we have manufacturing facilities that are unsurpassed in the world; we have one of the healthiest climates and one of the loveliest countries in the world, and it will necessarily settle up very rapidly; and when this railroad shall span from the lakes to the Pacific shores you will then have sources of trade, travel, and commerce that will astonish the world. There will not only be a grand increase in the tide of commerce and travel from the Atlantic to the Pacific, but it will also increase the wealth of the Atlantic coast. For the trade from Asia to Europe must pass through their cities. I am, therefore, in favor of this bill. I want this road built in order that the starving men, women, and children upon the Atlantic shore may have the privilege of emigrating to the western shore of the Republic. We want them there, not to be subsisted by charity, but to labor. We seek laborers there. We can feed and clothe half a million men and women in that country. The difficulty is to get them there. If this road were built it would teem with emigrants to the western shore, where they would find happy homes and could secure an independence for themselves and their children instead of subsisting on charity in a state of pauperism.

Mr. Speaker, I have not said anything in regard to the magnificent gold mines that are there in our country. I leave that part of the subject to others. I feel less concerned as to that particular matter than I do in that of homes for men and women now destitute. I see no objection to this bill, and I believe that if we were to sit here and talk for six months there would be the same quibbling objections made to it that we have heard here. I believe that the bill is about as nearly perfect as we can make one, and that it is a safe bill both for the Government and for the company.

It has been intimated here that this company has sold out once and may do it again. All I have to say about that is that if they do sell out I hope their successors will be better prepared to execute this great work than they are, and if so let them do it; we want this work done, and we do not care who does it so that it is done, and well done.

Mr. Speaker, I most ardently desire to see this work prosper. We feel that it is almost the life of our Pacific coast to have a railroad connecting it with the Atlantic. I heartily favor the Central Pacific railroad terminating at San Francisco; but I want two roads, if not three, constructed just as quickly as they can possibly be.

One road could be very arbitrary; it might be very tyrannical; but when there are two roads we will have competition, which is said to be the life of trade.

I have heard advanced in this House at this session many arguments in favor of another railroad to the city of New York. It is said that we want two roads from Washington to New York, both to run almost on the same line. And why do they want two roads? In order to secure competition.

So we want two roads to the Pacific coast; we want competition on that line. And I firmly believe that within five years of the time when these roads will be completed each of them will be compelled to lay down a double track in order to accommodate the business they will have to perform. And let us have this road, and the Southern road, and just as many roads as men will build, without involving the Government in expense. And that is the character of this bill.

Mr. DELANO. Mr. Speaker, I regard the subject now before the House as one of very great importance. The measure itself has intrinsic merit; that is to say, the construction of this road would be important and valuable as regards the interests of the country.

But this bill is important independent of that consideration. It is important because, if passed, it will establish a policy which is to have upon the nation an influence that I fear will be disastrous to the country; an influence and a power that the country is not able to endure in the present condition of our finances.

I therefore propose to call the attention of the House to some of the important features of this subject, for I think it necessary, and I deem it important that we all should, without reference to any interest except the overriding interest of the country, bring our minds to the consideration of this question.

In the first place, I desire to say to this House that in July, 1864, an act was passed incorporating certain persons under the name of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company. By the terms prescribed in the eighth section of that act the company was required to commence the work on said road within two years from the approval of the act. They have not done so, (for what reason I am unable to say.) And now it is proposed, I will not say invidiously, but I will say ingeniously, to virtually exonerate this company from the duty of commencing this road until it shall be the pleasure of the company to commence it, by providing that the institution of surveys, &c., shall be considered equivalent to the commencement of the work.

Now, the original corporators, or at least a large portion of them, probably never knew that they were named in the act of incorporation. But their names were used, as the names of men who are in public life are often used, to give influence and character to what I regard as from beginning to end a scheme of public plunder. It is time to meet these questions, and to treat them as they deserve to be treated if we would save this nation from overthrow in its finances by those who are seeking to deplete and to bleed the nation at every pore and at every point where they can get their hands into the Treasury. The name of my friend and colleague, [Mr. BINGHAM,] was inserted in this charter, and yet I will venture to say he never knew it; I know he never knew it. And I suppose others are in a like situation in that respect.

As the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WENTWORTH] says, there were some parties, however, whose names were used, who did know it, and knew for what purpose they were used. They went on, and progressing a little way they found it necessary to sell out to a new band of speculators. It is admitted here, I believe, by the friends of the bill that the persons who originally organized under this charter have parted with their interest; and a new swarm are now pressing Congress for a new appropriation.

That is the attitude in which this thing is now presented. I do not know any of the men concerned; I do not know who they were who originally organized. But I undertake to say that the fact is that those who originally organized this company have transferred it to another set of men. And that is what I mean by the new swarm that is here for more appropriations, for more money. With their arms already in the public Treasury, they want to run them in further; nothing short of the elbow will answer their purpose.

That is the way in which I view this transaction; and if I did not deem the condition of the country's finances such as to call upon us to defeat this scheme of plunder, I do not know but that I should have remained silent. I do feel, however, that it is time that we should pause for consideration and should stop this continual squandering of the nation's resources; for we need them, and we may need them hereafter more than we do at present.

I have said that the first organization have sold out, receiving as a bonus for the charter $150,000, as I am informed, and the purchasers are here for more plunder. This is the "new swarm" to which I have already alluded. Now, I want to show the House what the company received originally. By the original charter there were granted to the company forty sections per mile for all the distance of this road through the Territories and twenty sections per mile for all the distance through the States. Now, for the purpose of showing this House what these gentlemen themselves think is the value of their original charter, I ask the Clerk to read a paragraph from a pamphlet which I send to the desk, entitled "An appeal to Congress in behalf of the Northwest, in connection with the construction of the Northern Pacific railroad and telegraph, by A. Ramsey, D. S. Norton, G. H. Williams," and others.

The Clerk read as follows:

"The company's lands amount to forty sections per mile in the Territories, and twenty sections per mile in the States. On the supposition that the latter are worth twice as much as the former, it may be said that the equivalent of twenty sections per mile (on the southerly side) the entire length of the line, is to be set apart for the security of the Government. This gives twelve thousand eight hundred acres per mile, which at $2 50 per acre, amounts to $32,000, about the average sum per mile on which the proposed guarantee is to take effect. Supposing, therefore, that the company should sell six per cent. annually of these lands, the proceeds of which are to be paid into the Treasury, sixty per cent. would be sold during the ten years of the construction of the road, and this percentage of the whole is believed to be available for sale and for settlement. On this supposition the Government will not come under advances at all."

Mr. DELANO. It will be observed, Mr. Speaker, that these gentlemen estimate the twenty sections in the States as being worth actually and intrinsically as much as the forty sections in the Territories. They estimate the twenty sections in the States as worth $2 50 per acre. And then they show, by their own estimate, which is put before us to induce us to give further aid to this road, that the value of the grant already made by the Government to the company is $82,000 per mile. They have estimated this land with the view of getting us to give them something more on the faith of this estimate. But, sir, if the estimate be true, will any man tell me that the company is not now able to go on and build that road?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. The gentleman will allow me to suggest, in support of his argument, that they compute only the land on one side of the road in arriving at the estimate of $82,000 per mile. They state that the land on the south side of the road is worth $32,000 per mile.

Mr. DELANO. Then, according to their estimate, the land granted to them is worth $64,000 per mile.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Exactly.

Mr. DELANO. Yet, sir, with amazing assurance they now come here and tell us that with this munificent grant, this princely donation, they cannot go on and build that road. Why, sir, capital throughout the country is now waiting honest and secure investments. If this company have anything like the pecuniary strength which they profess to have under the grant already made they can get anywhere advances of money sufficient for the completion of the road, and to pretend that it is necessary for Congress to give the company more in order to secure the completion of a road from the Atlantic to the Pacific is a false pretense, and if money is obtained from the Treasury by such a pretense it is simply obtaining money by false pretenses, which in Ohio is an indictable offense.

Mr. GRINNELL. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DELANO. Yes, sir; as many as the gentleman desires. This is a school of catechism.

Mr. GRINNELL. I desire to inquire of the gentleman whether he believes that this estimate of the value of the land granted by Congress to this company is a correct estimate.

Mr. DELANO. Now, I want to make a Yankee contract with the gentleman. If I answer his question categorically, will he answer me a question?

Mr. GRINNELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. DELANO. Well, then, does the gentleman believe that these men are guilty of misrepresentations, either willfully or by negligence?

Mr. GRINNELL. I desire first to have an answer to my question.

Mr. DELANO. My opinion, then, is that this is an overestimate. Now, I ask the gentleman, if that is the case, why those gentlemen made that estimate?

Mr. GRINNELL. They are perhaps men of romantic ideas, and I think have set the value of the land too high.

Mr. DELANO. I think so, too.

Mr. GRINNELL. But the gentleman's admission as to the value of the land destroys his own argument. I now desire to ask the gentleman another question.

Mr. DELANO. Oh, no; I decline to answer any more. Our contract is closed.

Grant there is an over-estimate. It only shows how we are imposed upon by these men who come here to ask us for this grand and magnificent donation. It shows how we have always been imposed upon. But I will allude to this again in a few moments.

Let me say here, if this estimate exceeds the actual value of the grant to the extent of fifty per cent., still you have a grant worth $32,000 a mile. If this estimate is correct, you have already donated to this company lands of the value of $64,000 per mile; but if you have only given to this company $32,000 a mile in lands, how much more shall it have? Can its appetite for plunder ever be satiated? I say that, in my opinion, the grant already made is sufficient to build the road. I do not suppose the estimate is overdrawn to the extent of one half. I suppose it was overdrawn to some extent, because they wanted to delude this House again, because they wanted to get more, and therefore wanted to make as strong a showing as possible to induce us to give the road a larger bounty.

It has been suggested to me that more faith is due to this estimate, because it was made by members of Congress. I will say to my honorable friend, who sits near me, that I do not see exactly how that can be. [Laughter.]

When we made the grant to this road what did they agree to? I call attention to the conclusion of section three of the charter. Let us see what bargain they then made. I propose to hold them to the contract unless they made a contract so manifestly unjust to themselves that we ought to relieve them.

What is the contract? It is provided in section three "that no money shall be drawn from the Treasury of the United States in aid of the construction of the Northern Pacific railroad." They agreed, if we would give them this land, amounting in the gross to eighty-eight million acres, if we would open our hearts and confer upon them this munificent grant, that they would bind themselves not to come back and call for money. Yet, sir, here they are to-day—a fresh and thirsty swarm, for that is what they are; they are here to-day, in violation of this contract, asking this Government to pay them a large sum of money.

Mr. LOAN. I would like the gentleman from Ohio to tell this House who it was that made this transfer—who it was that sold out, and to whom they sold out. What evidence is there of any such transfer?

Mr. DELANO. I understand it is not denied. I have it from a friend of the bill and a member of this House; and I have it from an acquaintance of my own from Vermont, who is a credible man. I heard it stated by my honorable colleague [Mr. SHELLABARGER] to-day. It comes to me from a reliable source. It comes upon the wings of the atmosphere, that this transfer has been made. Does the gentleman deny it?

Mr. LOAN. I have no information of the fact.

Mr. DELANO. If we can ever get this project into the hands of the Committee on Public Lands, I hope to get a report that will probe this sore to the bottom, and draw out of it the feculent corruption which it seems to me lies there, so that it may be exposed to the public eye and receive the condemnation which it merits.

It is proper, I presume, as the world goes, if these men can get a further grant from the Government, for them to do so; but I say that it is a plunder of the nation which ought not to be endured. I am speaking for my country, at a time and period of its existence when it is necessary to speak boldly and plainly, hit whom it may, strike where it will. The nation demands it.

What do these gentlemen want more, these men who made a contract with the Government and who have got this munificent grant? What further do they demand of us? I will show the House in a few minutes. They demand of us to guaranty $57,000,000 of stock for a period of twenty years at the rate of six per cent. interest. It is stock to the average amount of $31,000 per mile the entire length of the road, some eighteen hundred miles. A portion of it is to be issued at the rate of $20,000 per mile, a portion at $25,000, a portion at $30,000 and a portion at the rate of $50,000; and the average on eighteen hundred miles of the road is $31,000 per mile, making in the aggregate $57,000,000. And we are asked to agree that we will pay six per cent. interest on that stock for twenty years, if necessary.

And what will it be, provided we have to pay it for the whole period of time? It will cost this nation $68,000,000 simply to pay the interest on this stock during that period of time. They want us to guaranty $31,000 a mile, and with that they will build the road and have the land with all its accretive value, made more valuable with our money.

Mr. PRICE. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. DELANO. Yes, sir.

Mr. PRICE. I wish to know whether the gentleman believes honestly, from the history of other railroads, in a dollar and cent point of view, that the Government will not get back all it pays in the shape of interest in this twenty-five per cent. of the receipts.

Mr. DELANO. I answer the gentleman, no; most emphatically and decidedly, no.

Mr. PRICE. Then, one more question. What are the data upon which you make that answer?

Mr. DELANO. I will give them. You say it will be paid by the proceeds of lands sold and the income of the road. When you obtained the grant for these lands you said you would never ask for an appropriation of money. In less than two years the company is here asking for $68,000,000. I know how Governments are plundered. The entering wedge is in, and then Congress is asked for more; the demand for more is persistently made, inside and outside of Congress, until it is granted. And my opinion is now, that if you violate the original contract and let the parties in upon the present application, you will never get any of the money back, but will lose it all. That is why I propose to keep my hand out of this trap, and why I desire this House to keep the nation's foot out of it also.

I sincerely believe that the result will be the complete loss of this money. These men will take this stock and go into the market with it, go to eastern capitalists, men whose vaults groan with idle capital, and sell the stock at a discount. If they do it at the rate of fifty per cent., what of it? It will pay an interest to the purchaser of twelve per cent. on the money paid for it, and they have land enough left to make the stock valuable independent of this, as I have shown you already, by the grant. And if they have any ingenuity by the issue of this stock, or upon the supposition that the Government will issue it, they can employ any quantity of lobbyists by offering to sell it at a moderate discount.

Sir, what right have we now in the present position of the country to lay hold on the Treasury and subject the people to the danger of this additional taxation? You tell me, however, that the road is necessary, and that if we do not build it Canada will. Sir, if your grant is worth anything in comparison to your estimate of it, or what it is estimated at, there are capitalists that are desirous to take and complete the road, and what you ask for now is only another needless donation to men who do not merit and do not deserve it, and to whom it is not necessary to offer it in order to secure the construction of the road.

I make the point here that if they have $32,000 per mile in land when the land is estimated at $1 25 an acre, they have money enough now to build the road; and if they cannot build it with that they are not the proper parties to go on, and there is no reason why this Government should be asked to make this additional donation.

Mr. Speaker, I know very well that there are reasons why these considerations should be expressed. Our nation now groans with the weight of public debt and necessary taxation, and our credit must be maintained. I know that there are now floating claims against this nation not less in amount than $1,000,000,000, according to my estimate; and these claims, if admitted at all, will never be settled with less than $2,000,000,000. I do not believe they will be settled for that. The great private losses of only loyal men sustained during this war for the nation's life will be pressed, and pressed, and pressed upon this nation; and, sir, by and by, in some form or other, when we have reconstructed the Government, when all the States shall move again in their accustomed spheres in harmony with each other, when we are again a united people, not only by law, but in heart, then the time will come when this country must decide what shall be done for such claimants, and we must, in order to act prudently, husband our resources as an upright man would who was resolved to be just before he was generous, and to pay his debts before he made a settlement upon his children, or an endowment upon his wife. You must husband your resources now for the financial trial that is before you. Do not let the world see you going into the gigantic schemes of plunder for the benefit of corporations, thereby shaking your credit before the nations of the world. Husband your resources and proceed with caution, deliberation, and frugality.

I know, sir, that we all by nature and education admire the grand, the beautiful, and the sublime. We look out upon the thunder storm and we behold the majesty and power of the Almighty with pleasure and interest. We stand before the great cataract of Niagara and behold the wondrous workings of the divine power in awe; and it seems to me that from this love of the great and sublime, when in this Hall of Representatives, as we look upon schemes of public plunder, the larger, the more magnificent, the more sublime they are, the more are we likely to fall into their support. It is time that we should fall back to a more sensible and rational view of things.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Will the gentleman let me ask him a question?

Mr. DELANO. Certainly, sir.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I would ask the gentleman whether, when he refers to this floating debt which cannot be liquidated without an expenditure of $2,000,000,000, he refers to claims that may be brought by persons in the eleven States lately in rebellion?

Mr. DELANO. I refer only to claims of loyal persons.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I would ask him whether he includes claims that may be brought by persons in the eleven States recently in rebellion?

Mr. DELANO. I refer to such claims as will be made by loyal people in all the States, and none others. When I say that it will take $2,000,000,000, I do it on the assumption that we shall compound these claims in some manner without settling up to the full amount.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Is that to be one of the effects of reconstruction?

Mr. DELANO. I did not say so; but the nation will ultimately have to meet this question, and settle it, in some form, either by compounding or refusing to pay. I do not know that it will necessarily follow reconstruction. I have not got that disease upon the brain.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Nor upon the heart either.

Mr. DELANO. What did the gentleman say—"nor upon the heart?"

Mr. BOUTWELL. I understood the gentleman to say that when the Government was reconstructed, and we were one people, not in law merely, but in sentiment, then this debt would be paid. I would as lief spend the money on the Niagara ship-canal.

Mr. DELANO. I have no doubt the gentleman would rather spend it upon the Niagara ship-canal, because that will perhaps open up a way to where he lives, or promote in some way the interests of his constituents.

Mr. BOUTWELL. It opens up a way from the great West to the Atlantic.

Mr. DELANO. I am from the great West, and although my friend thinks I have not reconstruction in my heart, I have in my heart the interests of the western country, and I profess to understand them. Certain it is that I am not afflicted with ossification of the heart if I have not reconstruction in that organ.

Mr. HENDERSON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DELANO. I will hear the question.

Mr. HENDERSON. I would ask the gentleman if he means that the Government is not to undertake any enterprise until the public debt is all paid off. Is that the doctrine of the gentleman?

Mr. DELANO. I have not said that, nor have I said anything that will lead to that inference. I have said that after the large grant already made to this company, there is no justice in our making the additional grant that is now proposed to be made to them.

But I alluded to the condition of the country and the state of the national finances for the purpose of showing that we should not now go into this enterprise. I do it in the conviction that the system now proposed will at once shock our credit at home and abroad; that it will have a bad influence upon the nation's credit, at the very moment when we are straining every nerve and making every exertion to bring this country back to a system of specie payments; when we should economize our resources and expenditures for the purpose of accomplishing that great work as one of the necessities before us.

Without discussing this subject further, I will yield the remainder of my time to my colleague, [Mr. SPALDING.]

Mr. SPALDING. I well recollect, Mr. Speaker, when the act was passed, which has been alluded to in this discussion, conferring upon an association of gentlemen, mainly from New England, I think some forty-seven million acres of land for the construction of a railroad called the Northern Pacific railroad; and I recollect as well that I then entered my protestation against that grant, as I do now against charging upon the Government liabilities for moneys in the shape of interest upon stocks to be issued by this organization. I considered it an association contrived for stock-jobbing purposes. But my words of admonition were not heeded; that bill became a law, and thereby the United States, in the language of my friend who has just taken his seat, [Mr. DELANO,] were virtually robbed of forty-seven million acres of land.

But it is said on the one side that this grant consisted of poor land; while on the other, when it suits the parties better, it is said that these lands were the most fertile of the West, and of a value almost incalculable.

Mr. Speaker, I hold in my hand a report made to the Boston Board of Trade last autumn, at the instance of these corporators, to show the extent and quality of the grant which the Thirty-Eighth Congress made to this corporation. And it consists of a certificate over the signature of a gentleman who for a long time administered the duties of the General Land Office, who was for a time one of the active managers of the Illinois Central Railroad Company, and who is now the efficient Third Auditor of the national Treasury. I send to the Clerk and ask him to read for the benefit of this House in his audible tones of voice the opinions of Hon. John Wilson in regard to the value of the land grant now held by this association.

The Clerk read as follows:

"I have not the figures, nor would I be able to work them up if I had; but comparing this with the Illinois Central railroad grant, I think it would be a small estimate to say, that if this grant is properly managed it will build the entire road, connecting with the present terminus of the Grand Trunk, through to Puget sound and head of navigation on the Columbia; fit out an entire fleet for the China, East India, and coasting trade, of sailing vessels and steamers; and leave a surplus that will roll up to millions."

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. That pamphlet is put out in the interest of the company.

Mr. SPALDING. Yes, sir; it was made for the purpose of obtaining stock in Boston at the hands of the capitalists of that city.

Mr. LYNCH. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SPALDING. Not now.

Mr. LATHAM. That was made for another purpose.

Mr. SPALDING. It was made for another purpose; the gentleman is correct in that. It was made for the purpose of inducing confidence by capitalists in the stock of this company, and induce them to invest their money in it.

Now, I do not design to impute any improper motives to the Third Auditor of the Treasury; far from it. I believe he was expending his best judgment upon the question then submitted to him for his opinion, for he proceeds in a portion of his letter to describe these lands, their quality, their location, and everything about them. And he thus concludes by giving his estimate of the value of the grant made by the Thirty-Eighth Congress assuring the capitalists that if these lands are judiciously managed, they will provide the means to construct this road from the Grand Trunk in Canada to Puget sound and the navigable waters of the Columbia, and in addition to that, fit out a fleet of merchant vessels and steamers for China and East Indies, with a margin left of "millions of dollars."

Upon this munificent grant a company springs up—reorganized, they tell us—and asks us to do, what? Why, in the face of a present ascertained indebtedness on the part of our Government of nearly four thousand million dollars; in the face of the taxation now imposed upon our people to pay current national expenses and the interest upon the public debt, we are asked to pay interest upon the bonds of this company. To what extent, sir? The sum total of the amount upon which the Government is to bind itself to pay interest at six per cent. per annum is $57,420,000. One year's interest upon this amount is $3,445,200.

But, say the advocates of this measure, the Government never will be called upon to pay the whole sum. When the first twenty-five miles of the road shall be completed, then the amount will be estimated at an average rate, as stated here, of $31,900 per mile, making for the twenty-five miles $797,500, on which the Government is expected to pay interest. When the first twenty-five miles are completed the bonds are to be issued and the indemnity by the Government is to go into effect. At that time the interest upon this sum for the first twenty-five miles will amount to $47,850, which is to be paid out of the Treasury; and so on from the first twenty-five miles to another twenty-five miles, and another, and another, until the road is completed.

But it is claimed by the advocates of this bill that the Government is here offered complete security for assuming this liability. Security in what way? The company will give us, they say, as security one half of their lands—all their lands lying on one side of the road. The other half they reserve for their own purposes, speculative or otherwise. One half of our liberal gift to this company they give us back as security for the further advancement in the shape of a loan of the national credit, upon which we are to pay interest, as upon bonds, for twenty years. Now, I am willing to take the chairman of the Pacific Railroad Company at his word. For the sake of argument, I will admit all the great practical benefits which it is claimed are to result from the construction of this road. I will admit that a portion of these benefits will flow in upon my own people, for it is claimed that all along the route from Minnesota through Lake Superior and all the great chain of lakes, even to New England, the benefits resulting from this great national work must flow in most copiously. I admit it all. I will go further and admit, if you please, that so soon as the first twenty-five miles of road shall have been completed, and it shall be ascertained that the company can stand upon its own feet, they will not call upon the Treasury for a dollar. I say that, even admitting that not one single dollar may ever be taken from the national Treasury by reason of this undertaking, still I say the weight of the argument is against any such proposition as that contained in this bill.

Sir, we cannot assume at this moment, in behalf of the Government, a liability of $57,000,000 without shaking faith in its responsibility and integrity. Why, sir, one of the first lessons which we learn in our school-boy days is that "money is credit" and "credit is money." So long as our nation preserves its credit it can command money. But, sir, if you heap upon the Government, the organ of the nation, liability upon liability, even though ultimately the payment of those liabilities may never be exacted, still the bare fact that the nation is liable for such immense sums shakes the faith of capitalists, not only here, but in Europe, in our capacity to meet our liabilities and pay punctually the principal and interest of our public debt.

No man should doubt this. It is common sense. It is predicated upon ordinary business experience. No individual who has any regard for his credit will suffer his liabilities to exceed greatly his ability to pay; and although a man may not be called upon to pay, yet, if he in a reckless manner assumes liabilities, men of prudence and sagacity will distrust him. As this principle applies to individuals, so does it also to Governments; and it is a principle which we should never disregard in our legislation.

I say, then, Mr. Speaker, I would object to passing this bill into a law on the simple proposition that it is not sound policy to make this Government liable for this large sum of money even though it may never be called upon to pay a dollar of it. When I say this, I do not admit that such will be the result. I rather agree with my honorable friend and colleague who has made so able an argument on this subject, that the prospect would be the other way, that the Government would have to pay all rather than none of the liabilities it is thus called upon to assume.

Mr. Speaker, I have made my sentiments known in regard to this measure, and I trust they will justify my vote. I know very well how these telegraphic communications to members are brought about. The same agency that has been at work around this Hall for months, has worked over the telegraph wires and brought a motion to me as well as to the gentleman from Chicago, and no doubt to other members upon this floor, in order to induce them to sustain this bill. Sir, I can never be reached in this manner. I must, whenever I vote on an important measure in this House, be permitted to vote according to the honest convictions of my own judgment or I will not vote at all; I will abandon my position at once, and ask my constituents to send some one in my place who will be more subservient to extraneous influences.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE next addressed the House. [His remarks will be published in the Appendix.]

Mr. FARNSWORTH obtained the floor.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Will the gentleman yield for a motion to adjourn?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. PRICE. Allow me to say, before the motion to adjourn is put, that I propose to-morrow to call the previous question at half past three o'clock.

Several MEMBERS. Fix an earlier hour.

Mr. PRICE. Well, I will say two o'clock.

Mr. WENTWORTH. The understanding was that we would have a fair chance to be heard on this bill.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. There can be no agreement as to the time when the previous question shall be called.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not understand that any agreement is proposed, but simply that the chairman of the committee gives notice that he will call the previous question on the bill at two o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. We do not agree to any arrangement of that sort.

The SPEAKER. After the notice which has been given by the chairman of the committee, the Chair will feel compelled to recognize him at the time he has indicated.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

On motion of Mr. DAWES, leave of absence was granted to Mr. HOOPER for one week.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at twenty-five minutes past four o'clock p.m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, April 26, 1866.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. H. GRAY. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PROPOSED EXPULSION OF MR. DAVIS

Mr. SUMNER. I offer a memorial from citizens of New York, in which they set forth that Mr. DAVIS, a Senator from Kentucky, declared in his speech of the 6th instant, in relation to the passage of the bill to protect citizens in the enjoyment of their civil rights, that if the bill should become a law he should feel compelled to regard himself as an enemy of the Government and to work for its overthrow; and these memorialists then proceed to say that as the bill alluded to has been declared to be the law of the land by the action of the two Houses of Congress, and as they feel bound to regard Mr. DAVIS as standing in the attitude of an avowed enemy to the Government, as set forth in his declaration, they ask that he be expelled from the Senate. I offer this petition and ask its reference to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That reference will be ordered, if there be no objection.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask the Senate to permit the Clerk to read that petition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read, if there be no objection.

The Secretary read as follows:

To the Senate of the United States:

The undersigned, citizens of the United States, earnestly pray your honorable body: as Mr. DAVIS, Senator from Kentucky, declared in his speech of the 6th instant, in relation to the passage of the bill to protect citizens in the enjoyment of their civil rights, that "if the bill should become a law he should feel compelled to regard himself as an enemy of the Government, and to work for its overthrow," and as the bill alluded to has been declared to be a law of the land, by the action of the two Houses of Congress; and as we feel bound to regard Mr. DAVIS as standing in the attitude of an avowed enemy to the Government, as set forth in his declaration, that he be expelled from the Senate, and, with other traitors, held to answer to the law for his crime.

Mr. DAVIS. With the permission of the Senate I will make a single remark upon that petition. It is true that I used, in substance, the words that are imputed to me in that petition; but, as a part of their context, I used a great many more. As an example of garbling, the petition reminds me of a specimen that I heard when I was a young man. It was to this effect: "The Bible teaches 'that there is no God.'" When those words were read in connection with the context, the passage read in about these terms: "The fool hath said in his heart that there is no God." That specimen of the Bible was about as fair as this garbled statement is of what I said upon the matter to which it refers. This is all I have to say.

The memorial was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. EDMUNDS presented a memorial of Joseph E. Oates and Aaron H. Bradley, in behalf of the colored people of Florida and Georgia, expressing their views on the subject of reconstruction, and praying Congress to adopt them as conditions precedent to the admission of the late rebellious States; which was referred to the joint committee on reconstruction.

Mr. HOWE presented a memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin, in favor of so equalizing the bounties awarded by the Government to soldiers during the late war as to make them as nearly as possible in proportion to the time of actual service; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

He also presented a memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin, in favor of the establishment of a mail route from Dodgeville to Avoca, via James Mills, William S. Bean's, and Booth Hollow, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin, in favor of an appropriation for widening and straightening the channel of the harbor at Superior, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin, praying the establishment of a mail route from Trempealeau Village, by way of Arcadia, Burnside, and Hale, to Sumner, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin, in favor of the appointment of engineers to examine the present water channels through that State, with a view of enlarging the same so as to admit of a uniform steamship navigation from the Mississippi river to Lake Michigan; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HOWE. I have also a long preamble and a series of resolutions passed by the Legislature of Wisconsin in reference to the votes given by my colleague in this body. The resolutions are in these words:

Resolved by the Senate, (the Assembly concurring.) That the course of Senator DOOLITTLE, in Congress, in voting to sustain the President's veto of the Freedmen's Bureau bill, in persistently urging upon Congress the immediate right of the inhabitants of the southern portion of the United States, who were lately in rebellion against the Government, to be represented in both Houses of Congress as inhabitants of States, and so advocating the principle that the enemies of the Government are as fit to administer its affairs as loyal men are, and finally, in voting to sustain the President's veto of the civil rights bill, in the face of instructions from the Legislature to vote for it, fills us with pain and indignation.

Resolved, That the course of Senator JAMES R. DOOLITTLE upon the great question of the reorganization of government among the late rebels, upon the Freedmen's Bureau bill, and the civil rights bill, was a desertion of the cause of human rights and republican government, and shows him totally unworthy to occupy any position representing a free people, much less so high a one as the people of Wisconsin in other times have elevated him to; and while it is not contended that we can deprive him of his office of Senator, yet we declare it to be his duty to resign his Senatorship, in order that the loyal people of Wisconsin may no longer be misrepresented upon the grave questions which are now being decided by the American people.

Resolved, That the Governor be requested to forward to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress a copy of the foregoing preamble and resolutions.

I move that these resolutions be laid upon the table and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 206) to quiet land titles in California, have directed me to report an amendment in the nature of a substitute, and recommend its passage. It is proper that I should say, sir, that this substitute has been prepared upon consultation with the Commissioner of the General Land Office, the chief clerk of that office, the surveyor general of California, and myself. It is prepared with a good deal of care, as it relates to a very important subject.

Mr. ANTHONY, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of T. S. Briscoe, praying for payment for his services in recruiting the twenty-sixth regiment of Iowa infantry, and the sixth Iowa cavalry, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. POMEROY, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred a resolution of the Senate of the 3d instant, directing them to inquire into the expediency of establishing an additional land district in the Territory of Nebraska, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, deeming that it is unnecessary to have another land district in that Territory; and the report was agreed to.

WILLIAM SAWYER, AND OTHERS.

Mr. HARRIS. The Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred a joint resolution (H. R. No. 67) providing for the reappraisal of the lands described in an act for the relief of William Sawyer and others, of Ohio, have instructed me to report it without amendment and recommend its passage. It will take but a moment, and I ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to appoint a commissioner to reappraise the lands described in the act entitled "An act for the relief of William Sawyer and others, of Ohio," approved July 2, 1864; but the occupants of the lands are to pay all the expenses of the reappraisal.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COLLECTION OF PLANTS.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am directed by the Committee on Agriculture, to whom was referred the memorial of Frederick Pech, donating to the United States a valuable collection of plants, to report a joint resolution, providing for their acceptance.

The joint resolution (S. R. No. 74) providing for the acceptance of a collection of plants tendered to the United States by Frederick Pech, was read a first time by its title, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. HENDERSON. I ask the Senate to consider that resolution at the present time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It requires the unanimous consent of the Senate to consider the joint resolution on the day it is reported.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to accept the collection of plants tendered by Frederick Pech, by his memorial of March 2, 1866, and that it be deposited in the Department of Agriculture, and appropriates the sum of $300 to enable the Commissioner of Agriculture to procure suitable cases for the protection of such plants.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COLLECTION OF THE CUSTOMS.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am directed by the Committee on Finance to report a joint resolution, and after a short explanation I desire to have it put upon its passage now.

The Secretary read the joint resolution (S. R. No. 75) making appropriations for the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs. It proposes to appropriate $2,100,000 for the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs for each half year, from and after the last day of December, 1865, and in addition thereto, such sums as may be received during the half year from fines, penalties, and forfeitures connected with the customs, and from storage, cartage, drayage, and labor; and it also proposes to repeal the first section of an act making appropriations for the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs, approved June 14, 1858.

Mr. SHERMAN. In order to explain the matter more fully, I send to the Chair and ask to have read a letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, which has called the subject to our attention.

The Secretary read the following letter:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, March 24, 1866.

SIR: The standing appropriation of $1,800,000 for each half year, to defray the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs, made by the first section of the act of June 14, 1858, (31 Statutes, 337,) will be inadequate to meet the expenses of the current or of succeeding years.

It is estimated that there will be required an additional sum of $300,000 each half year; that is, a total semi-annual expenditure of $2,100,000.

I have the honor, in accordance with this view, to inclose a draft of a section designed to be appended to the regular appropriation bill, amendatory of the aforesaid first section of the act of June 14, 1858, to which I would request your favorable attention.

Very respectfully,

H. McCULLOCH,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. W. P. FESSENDEN,
Chairman Committee on Finance, Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. The matter was first called to our attention by that letter; and the Committee on Finance agreed upon an amendment to the legislative appropriation bill some time ago providing for the increase. The present permanent appropriation for the collection of the revenue from customs is contained in the first section of an act "making appropriations for the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs" under date of June 14, 1858. I will read that section:

That there be, and hereby is, appropriated for the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs, for each half year, the sum of $1,800,000, payable out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, together with such sums as may be received from storage, cartage, drayage, and labor for said half year.

The amount of the revenue from customs has been so enormously increased that the expenses have increased, not in the same proportion but to some extent, and the estimates now require $300,000 more for the half year, $600,000 additional for the year.

Mr. JOHNSON. What is the relative increase in the revenue?

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Maryland asks me the increase in the revenue. I can tell him generally that since the date of the law the revenue from customs has doubled. I think in 1858 the receipts from customs were about sixty million dollars. The necessity for the immediate passage of this resolution, as the legislative appropriation bill will probably not pass Congress for a month or two, is stated in a recent letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, which I send to the desk to be read.

The Secretary read the following letter:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, April 24, 1866.

SIR: On the 24th of March I had the honor to submit to your committee a section, designed to be appended to the regular appropriation bill, increasing the standing semi-annual appropriation for the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs from $1,800,000 to $2,100,000, and to explain the grounds of the suggestion.

It is found that the appropriation now on the books of the Treasury will be insufficient to meet the necessary expenses even for the month of April current, and I therefore transmit herewith the same proposition, slightly amended, in the form of a joint resolution, upon which I would most earnestly request an early action, it not being probable that the regular appropriation bill will be acted upon in time to meet the emergency.

I am, sir, very respectfully,

H. McCULLOCH,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. W. P. FESSENDEN,
Chairman Committee on Finance, Senate.

The joint resolution was read three times and passed.

PRINTING OF A BILL.

On motion of Mr. NORTON, it was Ordered, That the bill (S. No. 263) to authorize the Winona and St. Peter Railroad Company to construct a bridge across the Mississippi river and to establish a post route, be printed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CONNESS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 286) to provide for the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Central Pacific railroad, in California, to Portland, on the navigable waters of the Columbia river, in Oregon; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 287) to provide for the construction of a wagon road from Boise City, in the Territory of Idaho, to Susanville, in California; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLARK. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill which has been prepared by some person other than myself.

There being no objection, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 288) to provide for the payment of certain claims against the United States; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. CLARK. A bill of similar import went to the Committee on the Judiciary; I move that this take the same direction.

It was so referred.

Mr. CLARK also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 289) to provide for the probate of and for the recording of wills of real estate situated in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

DEATH OF SENATOR FOOT.

Mr. POLAND submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That one thousand extra copies of the addresses and funeral sermon delivered in the Senate on the death of Hon. Solomon Foot, a Senator from the State of Vermont, heretofore ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate, be printed for the use of the widow and family of the deceased.

APPROVAL OF BILLS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. COOPER, his Secretary, announced that the President of the United States had approved and signed, on the 25th instant, the following acts and joint resolution:

An act (S. No. 89) to issue American registers to the steam vessels Michigan, Despatch, and William K. Muir, and for other purposes;

An act (S. No. 146) for the relief of Thomas F. Wilson, late United States consul at Bahia, Brazil;

An act (S. No. 150) for the relief of Theodor G. Eiswald; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 29) for the transfer of funds appropriated for the payment of salaries in the Post Office Department to the general salary account of that Department.

WILLIAM COOK.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move to take up Senate bill No. 277.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 277) for the relief of William Cook was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to William Cook $200 for the use and occupation of his land in Washington city by order of the War Department.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NEW YORK AND MONTANA IRON COMPANY.

Mr. WADE. I move that the Senate take up Senate bill No. 203 for consideration.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 203) to enable the New York and Montana Iron Mining and Manufacturing Company to purchase a certain amount of public lands now in market.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Committee on Public Lands have reported the bill with an amendment to strike out all of the original bill after the enacting clause and to insert a substitute. The substitute only will be read unless some Senator asks for the reading of the original bill.

Mr. WADE. I suppose it will not be necessary to read anything but the amendment of the committee.

The Secretary read the amendment, which was to strike out all after the enacting clause of the original bill and to insert the following in lieu thereof:

That the New York and Montana Iron Mining and Manufacturing Company be, and they are hereby, authorized, at any time within one year after the approval of this act by the President of the United States, to preëempt two tracts of land in the Territory of Montana which, in the aggregate, shall not exceed twenty sections, not included in any Indian reservation or in any Government reservation for military or other purposes, three of which sections may be selected of lands containing iron ore and coal, and the remaining sections of timber lands near the said selections containing iron ore and coal, which selections shall be subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the said company may acquire immediate possession thereof on the selection of the said lands by permanently marking their boundaries and publishing a description thereof in any two newspapers of general circulation in the said Territory.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to cause patents to issue to the said company for the said lands on the conditions mentioned in this section, all of which must be complied with within two years from the approval of this act by the President of the United States, or the said lands shall revert to the United States:

1. That the said company shall have the said lands carefully surveyed at their own expense, and shall file a plot of the same in the General Land Office of the United States, which surveys shall be by lines running north and south, and east and west, and each of said tracts of land shall be as nearly in a square form as may be practicable.

2. That the said company shall have furnished the Secretary of the Interior evidence satisfactory to him that they have erected, and have in operation, in one or more places on the said lands, iron-works with a capacity for manufacturing at least fifteen hundred tons of iron per annum.

3. That the said company shall have paid the United States for the said lands the minimum price of $1 25 per acre.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the said patents shall convey no title to any mineral lands except iron and coal, or to any lands held by right of possession, or by any other title, except Indian title, valid at the time of the selection of the said lands.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the said company shall have the same privileges in every particular, with reference to the said lands which are now by law granted to ordinary preëemptors, with reference to the wood and timber on the said lands, with the exception of so much as may be necessarily used by the said company in the erection of buildings and in their legitimate business of manufacturing iron.

Mr. HENDRICKS. It is right that I should say that the committee was greatly influenced in consenting to the passage of this bill by the peculiar condition of the mining interests in Montana. That interior Territory is so far removed from any of the ordinary means of transporting the machinery which is necessary for carrying on mining business that the development of the mining interests of the Territory is likely to be very greatly delayed. It was represented to the committee that this company would establish iron-works and soon produce iron in the Territory itself. It is known that there are very valuable iron mines in that Territory; at least it was so represented to the committee in such a manner that the committee had confidence in that representation; and with great reluctance I consented to the reporting of the bill upon the peculiar state of the case. I desire to say that the committee understand that this shall not be a precedent to any special privileges in the purchase of the public lands. This is not to form a precedent, so far as the committee is concerned, in any other case.

Mr. GRIMES. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Indiana, under what law this New York and Montana Iron Mining and Manufacturing Company was incorporated, and whether or not he has seen the charter.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The bill was not under my charge in the committee. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. KIRKWOOD] had charge of the bill, and made the investigation. I understand that it is a company incorporated under the laws of the State of New York.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I will give my colleague the information that he desires on that point. This company was chartered under a law of the State of New York, and I hold in my hand a copy of the articles of incorporation. They were submitted to the Senator from New York, [Mr. HARRIS,] who is a member of that committee, and I believe they are in accordance with the laws of New York.

While I am up I will say a word with regard to the bill itself, and in explanation of its provisions. The public lands of Montana Territory have not been surveyed, and therefore can only be located under the existing preëemption law, limiting the amount, I think, to one hundred and sixty acres. Mining is being carried on there to a very considerable extent, and in mining operations and in other operations there iron is necessarily used to a large extent. We know that now the iron used in that Territory has to be furnished from the iron manufactories of Pennsylvania and elsewhere, and carried to St. Louis, and up the Missouri river to some point from which it is started on wheels out to Montana, or else brought by rail to Iowa, wheeled across Iowa, and then by wheels carried to Montana. The result is that the freight upon the iron used in that Territory must be from thirty to thirty-five cents per pound. This state of affairs must necessarily be a great drawback upon the prosperity of that Territory, and if we can in any legitimate way reduce to them the expense of iron used there, it seemed to the committee proper so to do. We are expending a great deal of money that does not bring back money again to the public Treasury or increase the wealth of the country; and if we can legitimately legislate so as to increase the wealth of the country and the prosperity of these western Territories, it seemed to the committee well to do so.

What the committee therefore propose to do is, not to give to this company any lands whatever; not to give them an acre of land, but to allow them, in advance of the survey which we will not make, or do not make, at all events, to take up the quantity of land named in this bill, with the same privileges and subject to all the liabilities of preëemptors, save and except so far as they may use the timber on the land for building and running their iron-works. We require them to make the surveys at their own expense. We require them, before they shall receive a title to the land, to satisfy the Secretary of the Interior that they have built on these lands iron-works capable of turning out, and turning out, fifteen hundred tons of iron per annum. If they fail in any one of these conditions they forfeit their entire right, and they are compelled to pay for the land the price of $1 25 per acre.

The whole departure from what I understand to be the ordinary policy of the Government is in allowing this company to take up more land than it can take up under the existing law. One hundred and sixty acres of land would not justify an iron company in establishing iron-works. They must have timber for coal-ing. They cannot get it under the existing law. If they go upon the unsurveyed lands without a law of this kind, they are trespassers and liable to be sued and mulcted in damages for every offense. Without the timber, they cannot do the work. The question then is, shall they, or shall they not, be allowed to take up this land upon paying into the public Treasury the ordinary price of the public land, and establishing works there before they can receive title to their land? It struck the committee that it was necessary for the development of that Territory, and it would tend to do what they thought was required to be done at this time, especially when we have such heavy drains upon our people in the way of taxation, to increase the productive wealth of the country, to some extent, without at all injuring the public.

Mr. POMEROY. I have not had my attention called to this bill, until this moment, since it was reported. I think there is an oversight in it. The Senator who drafted the amendment has neglected to exclude preëemption claims or homestead settlements, and under the bill as it now stands this company may locate over a settler.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. The Senator is mistaken, I think. If it is so it is a mistake in the bill undoubtedly.

Mr. POMEROY. To settle that question I will move that the proviso contained in the original bill be added to this amendment. That proviso is in these words:

Provided, That no title shall be conveyed to any mineral lands except iron and coal, or to any lands held by virtue of any title of possession or other kind, valid at the time of the selection and location of the said tracts.

Mr. CONNESS. I should like to inquire how the Senator would construe or has construed the term "valid" in that proviso. Does he mean by that the possession of one of the inhabitants?

Mr. POMEROY. Yes; I mean a squatter, a settler.

Mr. CONNESS. Then you had better leave out the word "valid" and have it "any location in possession;" otherwise these sections of land may cover all the acquired rights and property of the entire community there. This company are authorized to go there and select the timber lands as well as the iron mines.

Mr. POMEROY. My intention is to prevent them from going on any settlement.

Mr. CONNESS. That is all right if the Senator will so draw his amendment as to fully carry out that idea.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. The proviso to the first section of the original bill was intended to be attached to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. POMEROY. It is an oversight, I see. I move, then, that the proviso contained in the last section of the original bill be added to the first section of the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved to amend the amendment by adding at the end of the first section the following:

Provided, That no title shall be conveyed to any mineral lands except iron and coal, or to any lands held by virtue of any title of possession or other kind, valid at the time of the selection and location of the said tracts.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. The committee intended to have that proviso in the substitute reported by them, and how it came to be omitted I do not know.

Mr. CONNESS. I do not know whether that proviso would cover the case fully. The word "title" in that proviso means that no title in fee-simple, such as is proposed to be conveyed by this bill, shall be conveyed to the possessions of other settlers; but it is a question whether under that proviso and by the bill this company would not get an equal right with those possessors to go upon the land; whether they would not get some right that would enable them to disturb those possessors. If the Congress of the United States shall see fit to give to any company, for the purpose of encouraging the production of iron or any other industry in our Territories, a certain amount of the public lands which will be deemed not extravagant, I have no objection. I think the purpose is a good one and would promote the welfare of those communities. But this proviso, it appears to me, is not sufficiently clear and precise to protect the possessors of land among this population against the provision contained in the bill. I would prefer, if the friends of this measure would not object to it, to have the bill laid over at present so as to have an opportunity to look it over.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. If gentlemen look at section four, they will see, I think, that this matter is provided for:

That the said patents shall convey no title to any mineral lands except iron and coal, or to any lands held by right of possession, or by any other title, except Indian title.

Mr. GRIMES. I would call the attention of my colleague and the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs especially to that clause. It reads as follows:

And be it further enacted, That the said patents shall convey no title to any mineral lands except iron and coal, or to any lands held by right of possession, or by any other title, except Indian title, valid at the time of the selection of the said lands.

Is it intended here that this company shall take the Indian title out from under them?

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Not reservations.

Mr. GRIMES. But any Indian title? Is it designed to confer on this corporation existing in the State of New York, not authorized by the Territorial Assembly of the Territory of Montana, to go out into Montana and take nearly half a section of land right out of the Indian Territory—land of Indians with whom we have treaty stipulations to preserve them in the possession of?

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Only such as can be entered, such as I would have the right to go upon or my colleague would have the right to go upon.

Mr. GRIMES. Where is that limitation?

Mr. KIRKWOOD. That I apprehend is the limitation of the bill as it stands.

Mr. GRIMES. I do not understand it so. I do not find any limitation here. I find that according to the legitimate construction of this clause this company can take any lands except such as may be held by some adverse possession or right, other than that held by an Indian title. That they can take.

Mr. CONNESS. I will say to the Senator that this fourth section gives no protection to the possessors at all, as I understand it. The language is:

That the said patents shall convey no title to any mineral lands except iron and coal, or to any lands held by right of possession, or by any other title, except Indian title, valid at the time of the selection of the said lands.

The possessors have no "valid title."

Mr. KIRKWOOD. A title that no one else can interfere with.

Mr. CONNESS. It is not a "valid" title.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. It is valid against everybody else.

Mr. CONNESS. If you will make it valid against the parties whom this bill is intended to serve, I shall be satisfied.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. That was the intention of the committee. If they have not done so, any amendment which will secure that object, of course, will be coincided in.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope the bill will be laid over at present.

Mr. WADE. I think this bill is very well guarded so as to prevent this company from taking lands to which any other person whatever can make claim. When a person can acquire no title whatever, I do not really see what title he can get. If a man is on there by a preëemptive title, by any possessory title, such a title is a title by which he can defend himself at law, of course, against any other person not having a better title. It is true that the title is not perfect; it is not a fee-simple; he has not acquired that yet; but if he is in possession he has a right against everybody else but the owner or one who can show a better title.

I introduced this bill, and I have no kind of objection to its being made as strong and secure in that particular as it possibly can be. The only object of the bill is to anticipate the surveys in that Territory. If this land had been surveyed and offered for sale it would be subject to entry like the other lands we have. All this company want is to anticipate that, because the country has not been surveyed; otherwise they might enter there and take possession of as much land as they could pay for at the Government price; but the survey is not made, the land is not in market in this remote region. People are going in there in great numbers, and there is no commodity more valuable to them than iron. There is none more difficult to obtain on account of the distance they have to transport it to get there; and this company believe that if they could get the right to go in there and to make iron it would be profitable to them and greatly beneficial to the people of the Territory. I think it would. I know some of these parties, and I know that the company were about to commence operations there without any particular title, only such as they would acquire by possessory right; but the principal man, Mr. Ward, of Michigan, who is one of the greatest iron manufacturers, I believe, in the country, said at once he would take no interest in such an enterprise unless they could be assured of timber, as they would have to work their iron by coal. When they found a location where iron could be easily got, men around them would at once take possession of the timber in the neighborhood, and would have it in their power to defeat them, in a great measure, or put them to such inconvenience and expense to get the timber for coal as to defeat the object. Therefore they had no other way to do but to ask Congress, in anticipation of the surveys, to give them the right to purchase lands sufficient for that purpose; and that is all that they want; it is all that the company desire to have.

The Committee on Public Lands have had this bill under consideration and they have amended it and put it under every restriction that they could think of, and they have put them under no restriction, I believe, that they considered disadvantageous to them, their honest purpose being not to acquire title to land except in order to carry on this iron business; and when that is preserved I do not care what restrictions you put upon them to hold them to that purpose, as I think the bill does in every particular. If, however, Senators believe there is any chance for them to get possession in this way of lands to which others have a right or title, if that is not sufficiently secured, I shall not object to any amendment on that point that may be suggested.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the special order, which is House bill No. 11, to facilitate commercial, postal, and military communication among the several States.

Mr. WADE. I would ask the Senate, if they are willing to go on with this bill, to do so, for I know it is a bill of the utmost importance; if this right is to be granted, it should be done at once.

Mr. POMEROY. If the special order is laid aside informally for five minutes, I think we can complete this.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The special order is House bill No. 11. It is suggested that that bill be laid aside. It can only be done by common consent, except on motion.

Mr. NYE. I move that that be laid aside for the purpose of taking up the business assigned for this hour, the iron-clad question. ["Oh, no."]

Mr. CONNESS. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Ohio, who introduced this bill, that another objection occurs to my mind which, if I had time to state it, would, I think, make it necessary to lay it aside for further consideration. I do not wish to occupy the time of the Senate by stating it now, and I hope he will let it go over.

Mr. WADE. Very well, let it go over; but I give notice that I shall attempt to take it up to-morrow morning, if I can, and try to put it through.

INTER-STATE INTERCOURSE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The special order is House bill No. 11, to facilitate commercial, postal, and military communication among the several States, which is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and will be read.

The Secretary read the bill. Its preamble recites that the Constitution of the United States confers upon Congress, in express terms, the power to regulate commerce among the several States, to establish post roads, and to raise and support armies; and it is therefore proposed to authorize every railroad company in the United States, whose road is operated by steam, its successors and assigns, to carry upon and over its road, connections, boats, bridges, and ferries, all passengers, troops, Government supplies, mails, freight, and property on their way from any State to another State, and to receive compensation therefor, and to connect with roads of other States so as to form continuous lines for the transportation of the same to the place of destination. The act is not, however, to affect any stipulation between the Government of the United States and any railroad company for transportation or fares without compensation, nor impair or change the conditions imposed by the terms of any act granting lands to any such company to aid in the construction of its road.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, I was not aware that this bill had been reported from the Committee on Commerce to the Senate. I believe there is another bill of a similar character which has been before the committee, and which originated in the Senate. At this moment I am not sure that I quite understand the distinction between the two bills. I think they are nearly similar, but I am not quite certain. It was my purpose on a former occasion to address the Senate upon this subject; but I find myself here at the present moment without any expectation of this bill being presented to the Senate to-day, and I am not in a condition to make any extended remarks. The bill is of a character which I think should challenge the attention of the Senate. It was passed in the other House, if I am permitted to allude to so much of the proceedings of that House as I gather from the debates, without much consideration, either at this or at the former session of Congress; and if I could bring myself to the conviction that it was not a bill fraught with the most dangerous consequences, I should be content to give a silent vote upon it. But, sir, it is a bill of most marked impression. It is a bill which strikes down deep to the very foundations of the Government. It is a bill that will be remarkable for all time in the legislation of this country if it pass. It is a bill that at once arrests the attention of whoever reads it as one which runs the line between the powers of this Government which are known, delegated, and expressed, and those which are doubtful, latitudinarian, and never to be entered upon except with caution.

It proposes, sir, in a word, to take by the power of the General Government the direction of the internal railway system of the United States. This is the proposition. I know it may be said that it only proposes to regulate it. To regulate is to control; to control is to direct; and under whatever branch you seek to exercise this authority, whether by the commercial power or by the power to regulate the postal service, or by that to raise and support armies and navies, it is the same thing; it is substantially to assert the power by the General Government to reach out its hand and lay its strong arm on the great American railway system. That is what it is, and I stand here to invite the attention of the Senate to so extraordinary a proposition as that. I ask Senators what is the exigency which justifies or demands it, and I ask Senators to point me to that provision of the Constitution which justifies it and authorizes it in clear, explicit, and intelligible phrase, not by doubtful interpretation.

First, sir, as to the exigency which justifies it or demands it; has anybody told you of any? What is the American railway system? Is it the creation of the Government of the United States in any respect whatever? Not a bit of it. It has grown up spontaneously out of the energy and the industry of the people exercising their functions in their primary and in their municipal capacities, the Government of the United States all the while standing afar off, doing nothing and proposing nothing.

I heard it said on a former occasion that the exigency grew out of the fact that one of the States of this Union had usurped authority, usurped power, and created an unjust monopoly, and that this measure was necessary to remedy that. Why, sir, is the Senate of the United States the place for the correction of such grievances? Are not the courts of the United States open? If the State of New Jersey, to which reference is made, and whose legislation is here arraigned, has been guilty of granting an unconstitutional monopoly, is this the place, is this the forum, to correct it? By no means. The courts are open, and any party aggrieved, any interest offended, has a remedy in the courts; and that should be a sufficient answer to that part of the argument.

It is said, moreover, that it exists as a grievance, it is a monopoly, and that the action of New Jersey is in restraint of the commerce of the country, of the free intercourse of the people of the country. Now, Mr. President, a little brief history, a little reference to events, puts to flight all argument of that kind at once. What is the fact? Go back to 1830, and you find the whole intercourse between the cities of New York and Philadelphia, by travel, carried on in ordinary stage-coaches. Perhaps as often as once a day it was practicable to pass between those cities in that way. The transportation of the country was carried on in ordinary lumber or baggage wagons. That was so only as far back as 1832; nay, later, in 1838 you find that state of things existing. To-day you may pass and re-pass between those two cities twenty times each day, and trains for transportation of all kinds pass nearly as often. Now, remember the charge is that the legislation, the action of New Jersey is in restraint of trade, travel, intercourse, transportation. Well, sir, New Jersey, by her own policy, and by the efforts of her own citizens, has done all to which I have alluded. They have given this increased facility; they have done it all alone; the General Government nothing, as it was not proper that she should do anything. A single fact of this kind is sufficient, I submit, to put to flight this argument that the legislation of New Jersey is in restraint of travel, trade, intercourse, is a restriction upon the commerce of the country.

But, Mr. President, I care to do no more than to advert to these facts, because they touch but very little upon the case any way. I object to this bill on the ground of its comprehension and scope. What it may do for New Jersey, or what it may not do, is of very little concern with me. I know but few of the people of New Jersey; I know nothing of the circumstances of this case other than I have heard them detailed upon this floor. My objection lies to the bill because it is so broad and comprehensive, because while it is said that it is aimed at a monopoly in New Jersey, it is broad enough to cover the whole American railway system. In the last thirty years this American system has grown from the smallest beginnings to be the grandest system of intercommunication the world has ever seen. To-day not less than thirty thousand miles of railway communication exist in the several States, the product of the energy, the industry, and the capital of these States.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had passed the following bills of the Senate without amendment:

A bill (S. No. 158) to facilitate the settlement of accounts of the Treasurer of the United States, and to secure certain moneys to the United States, or to the persons to whom they are due, and who are entitled to receive the same; and

A bill (S. No. 255) to remit and refund certain duties.

INTERNATIONAL OCEAN TELEGRAPH.

The message also announced that the House of Representatives had passed the bill (S. No. 26) to encourage telegraphic communication between the United States and the island of Cuba and other West India islands and the Bahamas, with amendments, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

Mr. CHANDLER. With the permission of the Senator from Maine, I desire to ask the Senate to concur at once in the amendments made by the House of Representatives to Senate bill No. 26.

Several SENATORS. What are they?

Mr. CHANDLER. One fixes the rate of telegraphic messages.

No objection being made, the Senate proceeded to consider the amendments, and they were read. The first amendment was in section two, line three, to strike out the words "during a state of war;" so as to make the section read:

That the said International Ocean Telegraph Company shall at all times give the United States the free use of said cable or cables, through a telegraphic operator of its own selection, to transmit any messages to and from its military, naval, and diplomatic or consular agents.

The next amendment was after the word "agents," in the same section, to insert these words:

And the said company shall keep all its lines open to the public for the transmission, for daily publication, of market and commercial reports and intelligence; and all messages, dispatches, and communications shall be forwarded in the order in which they shall be received; and the said company shall not be permitted to charge and collect for messages transmitted through any of its submarine cables more than the rate of $3 50 for messages of ten words.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is a very important bill, and the amendments present a question which I should like to look into. We had it under discussion for some time in the Senate, and now one of these amendments fixes the rate for telegraphic messages at $3 50 for ten words.

Mr. CHANDLER. Not to exceed that.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is to be the rate for messages between Florida and Cuba, one hundred miles. The whole system of telegraphing in the United States will undoubtedly, within the next two or three years, undergo an entire revision and revolution. I suggest whether this bill had better not be laid over until the Senator from Maine, [Mr. FESSENDEN,] who took a great deal of interest in it at the time of the former discussion, and with whom I conversed about it after the passage of the bill by the Senate, can be present. I move, therefore, that the bill and amendments lie on the table for the present.

Mr. GRIMES. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion of the Senator from Ohio is not a debatable motion.

Mr. SHERMAN. I withdraw it for the present.

Mr. GRIMES. I was only going to suggest to the Senator from Ohio that it seems to me this is a very opportune time to consider this matter. We have now under consideration the bill pressed by the chairman of the Committee on Commerce to relieve the country from one monopoly; and this is to establish another still more odious.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will turn that question over to the Senator from Maine, [Mr. MORRILL.]

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Senator from Ohio desires that this question shall go over, I have nothing to say against that.

Mr. GRIMES. I should like to look into it and see what it means.

Mr. CHANDLER. Let it go over. I supposed there would be no objection to the amendments of the other House, and therefore I asked for the consideration of the bill at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill and amendments will be laid over by common consent.

INTER-STATE INTERCOURSE.

The consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 11) to facilitate commercial, postal, and military communication among the several States was resumed.

Mr. MORRILL. It is not my purpose, Mr. President to make a formal speech at this time upon this bill. When interrupted I was adverted to the fact that the system of railways in this country, upon which now the Government purposes to lay its hands, is the product of the industry and energies of the people of this country unaided by their Government, acting in their primary relations, and acting upon the exercise of those reserved rights which constituted the strength of this Government in the past and will continue to constitute that strength in the future if they are left unimpaired. It is because the Government undertakes to lay its hand upon this industry, peculiar to the people, and in which the Government has not participated, and it is because the Government steps far over, I think, the line which guards and which should be held to guard those rights which have been delegated and those which have been reserved to the people, that I feel any solicitude at all upon this question.

I was remarking, sir, as to the character of this system. The grandest system of intercommunication any country in any time ever saw, springing up out of the brain of the people thirty years back, now spans the continent, sends out great arteries from every Atlantic commercial city on your coast to the far interior, and these in turn branching in all direction over the States, have made the intercommunication of the people easy, cheap, familiar, and have brought to the door of almost every farmer in the land the best markets the country affords. This has all been done upon that voluntary principle which the American people know so well by their guidance and by their direction; and who stands here to complain of it? Who stands here to arraign this American system, to say that it has not on the whole served the grandest purposes that any instrumentality ever served any people? The most that can be said of it is that in the State of New Jersey it is suggested that a monopoly has been granted, which, I believe, to say the worst of it, expires in 1868 or 1869.

Now, sir, what have the American people invested in this enterprise? I have shown you its operation, its workings, beneficent beyond measure, stretching from Maine to New Orleans and the far West, and offering cheap, quick, expeditious, safe intercommunication with all the people; and it is in their hands. Let us consider for a moment what has been the expense of this. What have this people expended? Over three thousand million dollars have been invested out of the earnings and out of the pocket-ets of the people to the consummation of this grand system of railway and intercommunication, working all harmoniously, working admirably. And now, if I do not misinterpret this bill, you assert a principle which authorizes the General Government to reach out its hand and take the direction of every mile of the railway system in this country.

Would that be wise? Nobody will venture to say that; but that is the road on which you enter. I suppose the advocates of this measure would not pretend that it would be wise. I dare say they would deprecate it, that the General Government should enter into this competition and take the direction of these railways; but, sir, you assert a principle which authorizes it, and that is what I object to. If you have a right to say that roads may connect and shall connect; if you have a right to say that a railroad company in the interior of New Jersey—and that is precisely this case—may extend its road across that State and then across the Delaware river and connect with other roads, and that all roads, whether the States authorizing them will or not, shall have the right to connect one road with another, you have thereby asserted a principle which will justify the Government in establishing rules and regulations in regard to the commerce over these internal railways precisely as upon the navigable waters of the United States. And that is the doctrine maintained by those who advocate this bill; for it should be understood that the bill comes from the Committee on Commerce; it came, in the other House, from the Committee on Commerce of that body, and is reported back here from the Committee on Commerce of the Senate. It is based on the power to regulate commerce; and if you can regulate commerce in one particular over these railways, you can in all. Of course it follows that you may establish your custom-house officers in every depot and station-house in these States, and the rules and regulations which are applicable upon the navigable waters regulating the transit in vessels, however borne on the navigable waters, may be applied to these artificial highways. It is for this reason that I object to the bill. I object, to repeat, because I see no occasion for the interposition of such a power. The system works well enough as it is. I object because I believe it to be dangerous.

Now, sir, one word in regard to the authority, and then I shall content myself with recording my vote against the measure. I have already said that the authority is justified apparently in a threefold sense. First, the bill invokes the power of Congress, under the Constitution, to regulate commerce; secondly, the power to establish post roads; and third, the power to raise and support armies. What this nation can do in a state of war we have all of us witnessed in the last four or five years. Undoubtedly a state of war brings extraordinary powers. During the state of war we did not hesitate to put all the railways in the country for defense under the power of the General Government for the time being; but nobody supposed that that was a power to be exercised in time of peace. Nobody supposed that that power which we exercised for the time being, as the extreme war power of the nation, was to be the rule of action in time of peace, and that all of these railways were to be subjected in the future to the power of Congress and the control of the General Government under that law. That is the answer to that branch of the argument.

Then, as to the question of the exercise of the power for postal service, let me ask, is there any precedent in the history of this Government which authorizes the pushing of this principle to this extremity? If I recollect the authorities, none of them go any further than to assert the establishment of a post road over roads or ways already existing. The Government has never in a single instance claimed the right to make or construct, either in a State or Territory, or anywhere within its limits or jurisdiction, a road for the purpose of postal service. The uniform interpretation of the power of Congress under that provision of the Constitution has been to establish as post roads roads existing in the several States; and I am confident that not a single precedent, either executive, legislative, or otherwise, can be found in the whole history of the Government where it has been attempted to push the interpretation of that provision of the Constitution beyond establishing as post roads roads already in existence.

But, sir, this measure during this session of Congress, and particularly at the last session, was argued by its advocates principally on the power of the Government under the Constitution to regulate commerce. Never in the history of this country has the principle been pushed so far as is here contemplated. On this subject of the power of the Government to regulate commerce we certainly have a history by this time. How much power Congress had under that provision of the Constitution very early sprang up in the history of this Government. As I recollect the facts, as early as 1816 Mr. Madison called the attention of Congress to the general subject as involved in the question of internal improvements; but it was not contended then, and during the whole period of the history of legislation in this country from 1816, when the attention of Congress was first drawn to the subject, down to 1830, when the whole question was thoroughly discussed by the Executive at various periods and by Congress, it was never contended that Congress had the power to give facilities to commerce by the creation of artificial highways in the several States. And, Mr. President, I think it is no stretch of reason to suppose that if Congress could not create these artificial highways, if Congress stood afar off and refused to make these internal improvements, and the people undertook these improvements in their own right and upon their own account, I think the argument not far-fetched at all that if Congress had not the right to appropriate the people's money to make these highways, these artificial ways of intercommunication in the several States, they have not the right to appropriate them when the people have made them themselves.

There is nothing better settled in American law than that the right of eminent domain is in the States. The right to control the territory within the limits and jurisdiction of the several States belongs to the States and not to the General Government. It never did belong to the General Government; the General Government never claimed that it did. The General Government never undertakes in a State to erect a fort or an arsenal or exercise any rights whatever in regard to the title to real estate except by consent of the States. When it was thought advisable to construct a national highway between the waters of the Chesapeake and the Ohio, the Cumberland road so called, Congress declined to act at all upon the question until the consent of Maryland, Pennsylvania, and Virginia had first been obtained, and upon the ground that Congress could not authorize the construction of a highway, even for military purposes, for that was the great object of that road, so declared, without having first obtained the consent of the States over which the road was to pass. This illustrates fully, I think, what very many similar acts in the history of the country tend also to show, that the right of eminent domain is in the States. Congress never claimed to have the right to enter the limits and jurisdiction of any one of the States for the purpose of building ordinary highways or railways, and I contend—and it is connected very closely with the argument—that if the Government cannot create these highways it cannot control them when created.

But, Mr. President, all the authorities, judicial, executive, and legislative, recognize a broad distinction between that commerce which is external and that commerce which is among the States, and that which is internal and within the States. The distinction is broad, well understood, and has been recognized from the earliest period. All the authorities that were referred to by the Senators who have preceded me at this session and at the former session, recognize that distinction; it is obvious commerce internal and peculiar to the States, and commerce external and among the States. I would ask honorable Senators whose attention has been given to this subject, under which class does this system of internal communication fall? Is a railway constructed under a charter granted exclusively by a State, built entirely within its limits and jurisdiction, a way for commerce peculiar to a State and entirely within it, or does it fall within that principle recognized in the Constitution of commerce among the States?

In all the books—I have none of them at hand this morning—this distinction is taken and made very clear. I recollect a case in my own State—I think the honorable Senator from Maryland had occasion to refer to it in the speech upon this subject which he made at the last session—where a grant was made for the exclusive navigation of one of the navigable rivers of my State to a private company above a certain point held to be not navigable, and the court held that although that river was navigable to the sea and for some seventy or eighty miles from the sea inward, yet at the point where navigation terminated by reason of an obstruction, and above that point, although navigable for twice that distance, it was internal commerce and exclusively within the jurisdiction of the State; that the Congress of the United States, although supreme in its power to regulate commerce over external waters, here ceased to have any power at all; and simply because the way was wholly within the State and was not open to the sea.

If that principle is applicable to a railway, I submit whether a railway, which is to be regarded as a way for commerce, chartered by a State, created by a State, built entirely by a State, and entirely within its limits and jurisdiction, can possibly be interfered with by the Government of the United States in any way whatever; whether it is not entirely beyond the power of the United States; and whether it is to be said that the Government of the United States may reach out its hand and require it to connect with roads outside of the limits of the State. I maintain that all these internal railways, which are within the limits and jurisdiction of the States exclusively, belong to that class of internal commerce which is exclusively of the States, and over which the United States have no control and no jurisdiction whatever. I do not believe that it is for the interest of the country that this power should be exercised. To repeat what I have said before, I see no occasion for it, no exigency to call for the exercise of this power. That is a doubtful power, to say the best of it, I think no Senator on this floor will question.

Mr. President, I have accomplished all that I rose to accomplish this morning. I have called the attention of the Senate to the importance of this bill; and, with these brief remarks, I shall content myself with voting against it.

Mr. McDougall. Mr. President, it was my opportunity to use an instrument on the first road that ever carried an engine in the United States of North America, very close to where the two Senators from the State of New York inhabit. That very circumstance induced me to think very much about these questions. I rode over the New Jersey road when it was young. The Baltimore and Ohio road was projected in 1826 I think; I shall not be exact as to the date. These were great enterprises then. It was not public capital, it was individual capital as a rule that built those great railways that have made such great demonstrations in our country. It is true of the Baltimore and Ohio road, which when it was started was a greater enterprise than the Pacific railroad, that when it was projected by a merchant in that city, whose name is not at present in my memory, but who deserves renown, it was thought to be a wild and insane scheme—the attempt to climb the Alleghenies and deliver a line of rail on to the waters of the Ohio.

Mr. President, the observations which I have had the opportunity to make, the lessons I have had the opportunity to learn with regard to enterprise, have convinced me that enterprise should be made as individual as possible; and perhaps in single individuality there is more potentiality even than there is in combination. There is a false tendency in our country to combinations and over-combinations. I speak of this as a reduction, and with some careful observation.

I do not propose to discuss the question of constitutional power with regard to this proposition; I will only express an opinion. My opinion is that this power does not exist in the Federal Government. If exercised, my opinion is, it would be unwisely exercised. Why should we, when young enterprise has brought forth and has led to great results, by the power of a combination or the millions of our people, interfere with the enterprises that individuals have achieved and undertake to destroy them? No wise reason, no good reason, no sound reason can be affirmed in favor of it. There may be a reason why individuals may make a few hundred thousand dollars out of this great Republic. When they do so, they wrong the millions; they violate great public law; they violate great public policy; and in my judgment violate the Constitution of the United States.

I say this much in vindication of what I think we must be most careful about, the fundamental law essential to the maintenance of our republican system. We have somewhat departed from it. I think we have departed too far. It would be well that we should pause for a moment and retrieve some of our steps; that we should think not of ourselves or the immediate moment, but think that a nation was not born in a day. Our fathers thought our system was organized to last through time, and we must consider a little that lesson which is worth thinking about by those who can consider. It was once thought in a particular period of the past ages, before the Advent, that men were only immortal in their posterity. Let us not think so much about ourselves, but let us try to be immortal in our posterity by doing exact justice and maintaining true principles. I oppose this bill because it is not within the law of our present license, and I oppose it because it is against sound policy. These are the reasons that govern my conduct, and therefore I shall vote against it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, I suppose it is beyond question that if the State of New Jersey had never incorporated a railroad company in that State, Congress would have no power to do it. Now, what has New Jersey done? Has she interrupted commerce by creating a railroad across the State? All the old avenues of commerce are open still—transportation by land and transportation by water, for freight and passengers. New Jersey created, by this railroad, a new mode of commerce. She had a right to do it, as a State; she had a right to decline to do it, and it comes to that, as it seems to me. I only speak of this case of New Jersey as one case in point.

Without going into an argument on this question at length, I believe for one that our duty is not only to defend the rights of this Government against those who assail it, but it is equally our solemn duty to defend the rights of the States, those rights which are clearly reserved to them in the Constitution. It seems to me that the right of a State to build highways, to build railroads, or to refuse to build highways or to build railroads, is one of the rights which belong to a State. I do not believe that there is a Senator on this floor who will rise and say that if the State of New Jersey had refused to build a railroad across that State, Congress—unless it might be in a time of war—would have the power to charter a railroad and build a railroad across the State of New Jersey. That is exactly the power that is involved in this bill. While I am opposed to all monopolies in the States, all monopolies that are oppressive, I am not opposed to a State having the power to exercise the right to judge for itself when railroads shall be built through its limits and upon what terms they shall be built; for I deem it essential to the independence of a State in its action upon those rights which are reserved to it.

These are my views on the subject. I confess I have been brought up rather in the school of State rights. I am in favor of a pretty strict construction of the Constitution of the United States. In time of war I know the great powers of this Government are waked up, and we exercise powers that we do not exercise in peace; but, sir, in time of peace I would exercise no more power by this Government than is actually necessary. I would leave, as far as possible, the exercise of all governmental powers to the States, because, when left to the States, they come nearer home to the people. The great idea of republicanism, which is a government by the people, comes nearer home to them when it is exercised by the States than when exercised by the Federal Government. If we assume to take all this upon ourselves, the business is so vast, so immense, that this Government will break down under its operations.

I did not intend to go into an argument, but simply to state my general view on this question. The arguments of the honorable Senator from Maine and the honorable Senator from California weigh very heavy upon my mind and accord with my general views on this question.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not know that it is the purpose of any of the friends of the bill to discuss the question of authority which is involved. If there is any such purpose, I should like to hear them first before I submit to the Senate the views which I propose to submit. [A pause.] I presume from their silence that it is not the design of any of the friends of this bill to debate it. It would seem a little singular, if that be the fact, that a bill containing provisions never before even suggested in any Congress, and apparently so much in conflict with the Constitution of the United States, should not receive at least some support from those who think it does not violate that instrument. Upon a former occasion, when this measure, in a somewhat different shape, was before the Senate, I presented to the Senate the reasons which, in my judgment, demonstrated (to use a strong term) that it went beyond the constitutional authority of Congress; and plain as I thought that was in reference to that bill, if the Senate will turn to the particular bill upon their table, I think they will agree that this is still more obnoxious to objection.

The bill upon its face professes to be based upon the authority conferred upon Congress to regulate commerce between the States, and upon the authority conferred upon the same department to establish post roads. It does not profess, therefore, to be a measure called for by any military exigency; it does not intimate that we are not in a state of peace; nor does it state that what it proposes to have done under its provisions will become necessary hereafter if we should at any time hereafter be engaged in a war, civil or foreign. The power, therefore, which it assumes to exercise, is a power, if it exists at all, to be found under the authority to regulate commerce between the States, and to establish post offices and post roads. I had supposed until these modern days that the meaning of those two powers in the Constitution of the United States, with reference to such a proposition as this bill involves, had been so long and so uniformly established that it could not well be considered as open to further doubt.

A constitution is worth nothing practically if it is not to be considered as authoritatively settled after years of deliberation and frequent decisions by every department of the Government. If it is to be one thing to-day and another thing to-morrow, just as the members of Congress may be different to-morrow from what they are to-day, we might as well have no Constitution. If the individual judgment of each individual member is to be exercised without regard to what has been the construction of the instrument uniformly up to the time when he undertakes to exercise his individual judgment, we are without a Constitution. And it is essentially (as I think) mischievous if that individual judgment is to be exercised in relation to any of the supposed restrictions upon the powers of Congress, or upon any of what have been in the past supposed to be the clearly reserved rights of the States. In my judgment—and I speak it with all due deference—when we swear to support the Constitution of the United States, we are bound to construe it, in order to support it, as the framers of the instrument are known to have construed it, and the people by whom it was adopted are known to have construed it and to have adopted it because of that construction. Looking to what was said by the members of the Convention, contained in the debates preserved by Mr. Madison with great accuracy, as was admitted by all who participated with him in the deliberations of that great body of great men, and in the proceedings of Congress while this department of the Government was filled by some of the leading members of that Convention, it is perfectly obvious that such a proposition as the one upon the table never would have been suggested by any member, because, in his judgment, it would have been wholly without the constitutional authority of this department of the Government.

With these general remarks, permit me to call the attention of the Senate to what this bill seeks to accomplish and what powers it undertakes to confer. Nobody even now, as far as I am aware, denies that the States have authority to charter railroad companies; and having authority to charter them, it would seem to follow that they have the authority not to charter them; and having the authority to exercise the discretion of chartering, or of not chartering, they necessarily have the authority, if they decide upon chartering, to state the terms, the conditions, upon which they will charter them; and consequently, having the authority to prescribe the terms or conditions upon which they will charter, they have a right to prescribe what privileges they will confer upon the holders of the franchise and what they will withhold. Those are propositions that need no argument, as I think the Senate will all admit.

What have the States done in the exercise of this admitted authority? They have chartered such companies for the construction of railroads as they have thought proper to charter, and they have given to them certain limited powers and only limited powers. Having the authority to charter and to limit the franchise, another consequence necessarily results: that if the powers granted are abused, if powers not granted are sought to be exercised, the franchise is subject to forfeiture. That would seem to be clear; and if that is clear, then the question of forfeiture or not must depend upon the law of the State by which the franchise is granted. The right of the State to forfeit, if it be a right, is one with which the Congress of the United States cannot interfere, because that would be to interfere with the right of the State to charter and to fix the terms upon which she is willing to charter.

Now, what does this bill do? One company is sufficient to illustrate the argument, and it somewhat simplifies it. New Jersey chartered a company, the name of which, as well as I recollect, was the Raritan and Delaware Railroad Company. I am not sure that I recollect the name. The honorable chairman of the Committee on Commerce will oblige me by giving me the name, for I suppose it has been before him in the deliberations of the committee on this particular measure.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Raritan and Delaware Bay Railroad Company.

Mr. JOHNSON. I thought the honorable member would be familiar with the name, [laughter,] the Raritan and Delaware Bay Company. The powers conferred upon that company were limited.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to hear the name of the other company.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not know. One is sufficient for my purpose, and I have got the one I expected to get.

Mr. CHANDLER. Perhaps the Senator never heard of the Camden and Amboy. [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes, I have; but I do not think they have anything to do with this bill. [Laughter.] I do not think they have prompted it. I am not sure that the other did not.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Commerce if the Camden and Amboy Company are favorable to this bill.

Mr. CHANDLER. They are supposed not to be. [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSON. Then the Raritan and Delaware Bay Company is chartered with limited powers. If this bill passes and it is operative, that company will be authorized to do what it cannot do under its charter. I think that may be considered as perfectly plain as a legal proposition, and as a proposition clear in the judgment of the committee, who, I suppose, intended to give to the Raritan and Delaware Bay Company, among others, some powers which its charter did not confer.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the honorable Senator allow me to inquire what are the termini of the Raritan and Delaware Bay railroad?

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not know.

Mr. HOWARD. It strikes me that is a very essential question.

Mr. JOHNSON. If my friend belongs to the Committee on Commerce, I have no doubt he knows both the termini; and if not, his friend who sits next to him [Mr. CHANDLER] can set him right in that particular.

But it will be authorized, if this bill can be legitimately passed, to do what it is not authorized to do by its New Jersey charter. If that be so, then the question broadly presents itself, can Congress, under any authority which it possesses of regulating commerce between the States, or of establishing post offices and post roads, exempt one of these companies from the limitations contained in its charter? If it can, then the whole country has been under a delusion upon the subject of this power; every State in the Union has shared in that delusion; every court in every State in the Union and the Supreme Court of the United States have partaken of the same delusion; for it never has been questioned (and I think I speak with certain knowledge upon the subject) by any State Legislature, by any State judicial tribunal, or by the Supreme Court of the United States, that a company chartered by a State to make a railroad may have its franchise forfeited if it undertakes to exercise powers not included within its charter. And of the powers which have heretofore been supposed exclusively vested in the State governments, that of regulating the tolls which they may charge, that of regulating the service for which the tolls may be charged, that of regulating the manner in which the business of the company shall be conducted, are powers supposed to be exclusively intrusted to the State governments, or rather, to speak in the spirit and in the letter of the Constitution of the United States, they are powers not delegated to the General Government, and therefore reserved to the States.

Now, what will this bill do? The charter of the particular company, the name of which was given to me by the honorable chairman, does not authorize the company to carry passengers and freight as it will be authorized to carry passengers and freight if this bill passes. Have we the power to do that? In the first place, what the bill does is to enlarge a charter granted by a State; it is amendatory to a State charter. It assumes, as vested in Congress, therefore, the power to take into its own hands the charters granted by the several States, and to modify them just as they think proper, not only by extending the authority which the charter may grant, but if, in the judgment of Congress, at any time hereafter, or now, any of the restrictions in those charters are calculated to interfere with commerce between the States or to impede the transportation of the mails, they have the authority to repeal, practically, any of the limitations in the charter or any of the powers conferred upon the company by the charter.

What do those two powers prove if they exist? That the charter of every railroad company of every State in the Union may be modified by Congress whenever Congress thinks proper to exert the power of modification either by enlarging the franchise or by restricting the franchise. If Congress should, therefore, come to the conclusion that the tolls which one of these companies is empowered to charge by its franchise are too high they can reduce them; if they think they are too low they can increase them. What power is that? It is the power, not of establishing a road for the first time by any inherent authority existing in Congress, or any delegated authority existing in Congress to make roads and canals, but it is an authority to interfere with the chartered rights of companies established under charters granted by a State; and that is just what this bill does.

If the gentlemen whose minds are not made up upon the question will turn to the bill they will find, I think, that the criticism to which I am about to subject it is well founded. It is sweeping in its terms. Every railroad company in the United States is liable to its provisions. It recites the authority conferred upon Congress—I do not give the words now—to regulate commerce, to establish post roads, to raise and support armies; and therefore this bill is to be enacted under all or any one of the authorities which Congress by this recital is correctly said to have. The power to regulate commerce among the States, to establish post roads, to raise and support armies, either by itself or all collectively, are relied upon as showing that what is proposed to be done by the bill is within the power of Congress.

Therefore be enacted, &c. That every railroad company whose road is operated by steam, its successors and assigns be, and is hereby, authorized to carry upon and over its road, connections, boats, bridges, and ferries, all passengers, troops, Government supplies, mails, freight, and property on their way from any State to another State, and to receive compensation therefor.

It assumes, then, stopping there, that there are railroad companies now operated by steam that have not the authority to carry over their roads, &c., property and passengers on the way from one State to another State, and to receive compensation therefor. Stopping, therefore, at that part of the bill as it is now before the Senate, we are undertaking to give to these several railroad companies a power which they have not under their charters—a power which the bill upon its face assumes that they have not. Let us see how that will work practically. In every State in the Union there are to be found railroads whose termini begin necessarily in the State granting the franchise, and which often terminate at some point short of its own territorial line—a railroad from town to town within a State. We all know that. Do you mean to take from the States the authority to charter roads of that description? I suppose not. But what is the benefit to the State of chartering roads of that description if the very moment they are chartered Congress can say that, in spite of State legislation and State policy, a road, both of whose termini are to be within the State, may disregard its limits and go anywhere with any passenger or freight that may be on board of their cars, provided they be destined eventually to some other State?

But that is not all. You not only give them the authority to carry freight beyond the terminus of their own road, but you give them the authority to receive compensation. What sort of compensation? How is it to be regulated? Is it to be regulated upon the ground of a quantum meruit? Can they charge any passenger just what they please, or just what the jury of a State, if it becomes the subject of contest, may decide to be the value of the service? Can they charge for freight just what they please, subject to a like contingency? Under this bill they can do it, for the bill does not undertake itself to regulate the charges which the companies may make for performing the service which they are authorized by this bill to perform, but not authorized by their charters to perform. Why, sir, that is at war with the policy of every State in the Union. It is at war with an obviously sound policy. Do you mean to subject the travel of passengers or the transportation of freight to the unlimited demand which a company may make for either service? Every State limits the compensation which the company is authorized to receive; but this bill leaves it without limit.

But that is not all. The honorable committee, of which my friend from Michigan is the chairman, did not think it was sufficient to accomplish the purpose they had in view, that the bill should pass in the form in which it came from the House of Representatives. They have, therefore, amended it, and what is the amendment? The bill, without the amendment, merely gives the power to pass with passengers or supplies that may be destined from any State to another State, and to charge for the transportation; but this question occurred to the committee evidently, and to the friends of the measure outside of Congress, how is a company, limited to some point short of the territorial line of a State, to carry passengers or freight destined from its own to some other State? How can it do it? It can only do it in one of two ways: by connecting at its own terminus with any road which may start from that terminus to the State line, or, if there is no such road, then by making a road; and that is what the committee, if I understand it, have advised the Senate to provide. They say, substantially, there are railroads to be found in some of the States which, under the limitations of their old charters, will not be able to transport passengers or freight or supplies on board their own roads, for transportation to the extent of their own limits, destined for other States, unless they are also authorized—the same company—to form a connection with some road which will take the passengers or the freight into another State. And you propose to give to the company whose power is limited by its own charter the authority, if there is no existing road with which it can connect, to make a connection by making a road. How is it to be made? It can only be made by the exercise of the right of eminent domain, unless the parties through whose lands the road is to pass think proper to cede what may be necessary for the purposes of the new road.

What are to be the limitations imposed upon the company in the management of the road that they are thus authorized to make in order to form a connection between the existing road and a road in some other State, so as to enable them to carry passengers and freight destined for another State? The power that you confer is a power involved in the general authority which you give them to connect with roads of other States in any way and anyhow. You give them the authority, therefore, under this act of Congress, without restriction to take possession of the land of a State, to take it away from its owners, and establish a road of their own; and, as I said before, after having established it to charge for the use of it just what they may think proper.

Even assuming the authority to belong to Congress to charter a road, it would be bad enough if you were to charter a company for the purpose of making a railroad and giving it all the powers necessary to accomplish that purpose, that you should not regulate the manner in which the powers are to be exerted, but it is still worse when you leave them at large to exert the authority that you propose to confer upon them in any way that they may think proper.

But that is not all. The amendment goes further. It gives the power "to connect with roads of other States, so as to form continuous lines for the transportation of the same to the place of destination." Now mark, Mr. President, I have assumed that it will sometimes happen that there is no existing road with which they can make a connection, and that they are therefore to make a road. To give them the authority, if we have the power to authorize them to make a road, to charge for the use of the road would seem to be all right. But there are railroads with which a connection may be made. Then what do you say to them? The Raritan railroad—and I mention it only for the purpose of illustration—connects with some other road in New Jersey which runs through the State, and it can by means of that other road transport the passengers on board its own cars and the freight destined to some other State, to their places of destination. Now, what do you say? That if their passengers and their freight are placed in the cars of the road with which they form a connection and by which they are carried to the place of their destination in some other State, they may charge for the transportation upon that connecting road. Nothing is plainer than that. They are to connect with roads of other States so as to form continuous lines for the transportation of passengers and freight to their place of destination, and they are to receive compensation therefor.

What is the effect upon the passenger or the owner of the freight, if I am right? It is this—unless it be the purpose of the committee to accomplish what I suppose they will hardly pretend to say they have the authority to accomplish—to mulct the passenger or the owner of the freight with double charges. The passenger upon the Raritan railroad, or the owner of freight which is transported upon the connecting road of which the Raritan railroad constitutes no part except under the authority of this bill, is to be charged for that transportation by the Raritan company; and you do not propose to take from the connecting road that power. Leaving, therefore, to the connecting road the power to charge for transportation, you give to the Raritan road the power to charge also, and you give it without any limitation. They may charge what they please. Not being subject to the limitations contained in the charter of the connecting road, they are left to fix their compensation upon the ground of a quantum meruit. Why, Mr. President, with just as much authority, I think, could Congress say that the passenger should be carried without compensation. The authority to increase the tolls involves in it the authority to diminish the tolls, and the authority to diminish the tolls involves the power to do away with the tolls altogether and make the roads free.

I have not the books before me, Mr. President, nor if I had would I trouble the Senate with citations from them; but every lawyer in the Senate who is at all familiar with the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States knows that long before and subsequent to the case of Gibbons vs. Ogden, reported in 9 Wheaton, it was the received doctrine that the internal commerce of a State was exclusively in the power of a State. The great men who filled the judicial department of the State of New York at the time when that decision was pronounced in the State court—men whose superiors were never found upon any bench either before or since—were of opinion in that case that the exclusive patent granted for the navigation of the waters of the Hudson river by steam was authorized upon the ground that the Hudson river was entirely within the State of New York, and it was therefore to be considered as included within the admitted right of every State to regulate its own domestic commerce. The Supreme Court of the United States came to a different opinion as far as the exigency of that case was determined, and they came to that opinion upon the ground that that authority to regulate commerce among the States included navigation, and was an authority which did not terminate at the boundary line of any State, but went into any State as far as its navigable rivers would permit it to go, and that Congress, therefore, had the authority by license to authorize the vessels obtaining a license from the United States to pursue their trade from the State to which they belonged to the State for which the cargo was destined; but in that decision Chief Justice Marshall, speaking for the whole bench, admitted that roads exclusively within the limits of a State, commerce altogether internal, whether carried on upon the waters of a State or carried on upon the roads of a State, were entirely, exclusively, within the jurisdiction of the State.

Now, what does this bill say? That a road constructed for the local trade of a State, for the purpose of benefiting a commerce entirely internal as within a State, shall not be subject to any limitations contained in its own charter, provided it has on board its cars a passenger or a box of freight designed to go beyond the limits of which the road is authorized to carry it by its own charter. Once find the possession of one of these companies whose rights are limited, granted for the purpose of carrying on domestic trade as contradistinguished from commerce between the States—once put on board a road of that description a particle of freight or a single passenger, and it has a right to disregard its own charter, and the State has no authority to refuse that permission. It has no authority, therefore, to repeal the charter.

Let us look at that for a moment. The franchise is abused, clearly abused, or the State exercises a power reserved, as is done in most of these charters, of repealing or modifying the charter. You pass this act. A State insists upon her right to forfeit the charter of any particular company upon the ground that it is subject to forfeiture for an abuse of its franchise; or it undertakes to qualify the franchise; it undertakes to repeal the charter. Can the State do that if we have the authority to pass this bill? May not the company say, and say with success, if we possess the power this bill assumes to exert, "It is true we have abused the franchise; it is true that independent of congressional legislation the charter may be forfeited; it is true that by the terms of the charter you have a right to repeal it; but we stand upon the paramount authority of the Congress of the United States, and they have decided that we shall have the authority to make a road, unless we can form the connection in some other way, so as to connect our own road with the roads leading to some other State; you have no right to interfere to forfeit our charter or repeal our charter, because to do either renders useless the object which Congress has in view, and as every legal act of Congress upon any subject over which the jurisdiction of the body extends is by the very terms of the Constitution paramount to State legislation, we stand upon that paramount authority, and we defy the State to take away from us our franchise."

Now, Mr. President, as far as we can do it, we have admitted Colorado; and it was put upon the ground that a territorial condition was not suited to the genius of the American people; they wanted the protection that a State of this Union can claim under the Constitution. Pass this bill, and as far as the particular power is concerned, heretofore deemed to be exclusively in the States, we are in a condition neither more nor less than territorial. My friend from Oregon, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] who so well told us how important it was to the people of a Territory to be permitted to form themselves into a State government, to become a part of this great brotherhood of States, to be one of the States composing the Union, in order that they may have the powers reserved to the States and to the people of the States and escape the exclusive legislation of Congress, will find himself sadly mistaken in the practical result, provided the principle that is to be found in this bill is adopted. Oregon may fancy that she has a right to charter railroads and affix what terms she thinks proper; Colorado, if she comes in—and that may be one of her purposes in coming—may desire to charter railroads, and she may think that she will derive vast benefit from the right to have control over franchises of this description. But it is a delusion if the principle upon which this bill stands is a sound one. It will depend entirely upon the fancy of Congress.

Let a committee on commerce, as enlightened as the present committee of this body is, get it into their heads that the limitations contained in these several charters are dangerous and destructive to commerce between the States or to foreign commerce, and then they will claim not to usurp, because they do not consider it as usurpation, but they will claim the right to take the whole subject into the hands of Congress, thus throwing back in the instances to which I have alluded Oregon and Colorado into the chrysalis state of a Territory, and liable to the mischief so well depicted by my friend from Oregon. I tell him to take heed. Oregon is in danger. The people of Colorado, whom he is so anxious at once to bring into this Union of States, are in danger. It is not the old States only, but the new; one and all will be involved in the vortex of congressional power, until at last we shall become in relation to a subject of paramount importance, until lately considered to be exclusively vested in the States, a consolidated Government; and I stand upon the wisdom of our fathers—wisdom which fell from the lips of those men who were foremost in giving a liberal construction to the Constitution after it was adopted and were members of the Federal party, among whom was the enlightened and eloquent Ames, when I say to the Senate, I do not repeat his language, I give the substance of it—that consolidation in that sense will be destructive of American constitutional freedom. The Union consolidated is one thing; the Government of the Union consolidated so as to take within its own grasp powers heretofore supposed to be reserved to the States, is another thing. Under the first no imagination can depict the renown, the prosperity, and the happiness which will be the fate, if not of ourselves, of those who are to follow us; and no imagination, however fertile in conceiving mischiefs that may come in the future, can depict the horrors that will sooner or later be the result of such a consolidation as I have just stated; internal dissension, civil wars without number, until we are reduced to the condition in which the South American republics are now placed for the most part, when some military usurper coming from abroad or springing up within our own limits shall save us from the horrors of anarchy by ruling us with a despotic will.

I am done, Mr. President.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, I have not had as full an opportunity to examine the facts connected with this case and the legal decisions which may be applicable to it as I could have desired.

Mr. JOHNSON. If the Senator will permit me, I will move that the matter go over until to-morrow. It is a subject that ought not to be disposed of at once.

Mr. HOWARD. Very well.

Mr. WILSON. Let us have an executive session.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business so as to leave this bill as the unfinished business for to-morrow.

Mr. HOWARD. I yield the floor for that purpose.

The motion of Mr. CHANDLER was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session, the doors were reopened.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 434) for the relief of Isabella Strubing;

A bill (H. R. No. 473) to extend the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims; and

A bill (H. R. No. 475) to facilitate the settlement of the accounts of paymasters of the Army.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed an enrolled joint resolution (H. R. No. 67) providing for the reappraisal of the lands described in an act for the relief of William Sawyer and others, of Ohio.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, submitting, for the consideration of Congress, a communication from the Secretary of the Interior in relation to the failure to complete the eastern division of the Union Pacific railroad; which was referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

On motion of Mr. GRIMES, two weeks' leave of absence from Monday next was granted to Mr. HENDRICKS.

CONTRACTORS FOR VESSELS AND MACHINERY.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move to lay aside the pending special order and take up Senate bill No. 220.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 220) for the relief of certain contractors for the construction of vessels-of-war and steam machinery.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move that the further consideration of the bill be postponed to and made the special order of the day for to-morrow at one o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. POMEROY, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, April 26, 1866.

The House met at twelve o'clock m.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

REFUNDING CERTAIN DUTIES.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask leave to report back, without amendment, from the Committee of Ways and Means, Senate bill No. 255, to remit and refund certain duties.

I will explain the bill in a few words. After the expiration of the reciprocity treaty, some produce which it was intended to send from one port in the United States to another port in the United States was accidentally detained by ice, and in consequence became subject to duties. This bill has already passed the Senate unanimously. No one under these circumstances would be likely to exact duties from our own people. I think there can be no objection to it.

The bill was received and read. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to remit, or if paid to refund, any duties levied on produce shipped from a port in the United States to a port in the United States via Canada, if the said produce was actually in transitu and detained by ice when the recent reciprocity treaty with Canada expired.

Mr. MORRILL. This bill is well guarded, and is intended to apply to some grain, I suppose, going from the West to the East.

Mr. J. M. HUMPHREY. Does this bill include grain that was bought in Canada before the reciprocity treaty expired?

Mr. MORRILL. It applies to grain shipped from a port of the United States only.

Mr. J. M. HUMPHREY. Ought it not to cover both cases?

Mr. MORRILL. I think not.

Mr. J. M. HUMPHREY. The justice of the one is as great as the other.

Mr. MORRILL. I know of no such cases.

Mr. J. M. HUMPHREY. I have in my possession a petition to the Secretary of the Treasury, which I have not yet presented, asking just such relief as this.

Mr. MORRILL. I think we might find a great many cases of persons in the United States who have purchased produce in Canada under those circumstances. If we open the door in one case the number of persons to be relieved may be interminable. I should be very much opposed to making the provisions of any bill so wide as that.

The bill was then read the third time and passed.

Mr. MORRILL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ACCOUNTS OF THE UNITED STATES TREASURER.

Mr. MORRILL, by unanimous consent, reported back, without amendment, from the Committee of Ways and Means, Senate bill No. 158, to facilitate the settlement of the accounts of the Treasurer of the United States, and to secure certain moneys to the people of the United States, or to persons to whom they are due, and who are entitled to receive the same.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Let the bill be read.

The bill was read. The first section provides that all amounts of money that are represented by certificates, drafts, or checks issued by the Treasurer of the United States, or by any disbursing officer of any department of the Government of the United States upon the Treasurer, or any Assistant Treasurer, or designated depository of the United States, or upon any national bank designated as a depository of the United States, and which shall be represented on the books of either of such offices as standing to the credit of any disbursing officer, and bearing date prior to July 1, 1863, and which were issued to facilitate the payment of warrants or for any other purpose in liquidation of a debt due from the United States, which shall remain outstanding on the 1st of July, 1866, shall be deposited by the Treasurer of the United States, to be covered into the Treasury by warrants to be carried to the credit of the parties in whose favor such certificates, drafts, or checks were respectively issued, or to the persons which were entitled to receive pay thereof, and into the appropriation account to be denominated "outstanding liabilities."

The second section provides that the certificate of the Register of the Treasury, stating the amount of any draft issued by the Treasurer of the United States to facilitate the payment of a warrant directed to him for payment, and which shall have remained outstanding and unpaid for three years or more as aforesaid, and which shall have been thus deposited and covered into the Treasury, shall be, and the same is hereby authorized to be, when attached to any such warrant, a sufficient voucher in satisfaction of any such warrant or part of any warrant, the same as if the drafts correctly indorsed and fully satisfied were attached to such warrant or part of warrant; and all moneys mentioned in this and the preceding section shall remain as a permanent appropriation for the payment of all such outstanding and unpaid certificates, drafts, or checks.

The third section provides that the payee or the bona fide holder of any such draft or check, the amount of which has been so deposited and covered into the Treasury shall, on presenting the same to the proper officer of the Treasury, be entitled to have it paid by the settlement of an account and the issuing of a warrant in his favor, according to the practice in other cases of authorized and liquidated claims against the United States.

The fourth section provides that at the termination of every fiscal year after this act shall begin to operate, the provisions thereof shall apply to all similar certificates, drafts, and checks which shall then have remained for three years or more outstanding, unsatisfied, and unpaid, and to all disbursing officers' accounts that shall have so remained unchanged as in the next section provided for.

The fifth section provides that the amounts, except such as are provided for in the first section of this act, of the accounts of any kind of disbursing officer of the Government of the United States which shall have remained unchanged or which shall not have been increased by any new deposit thereto, nor decreased by drafts drawn thereon for the space of three years, shall, in like manner, be covered into the Treasury to the proper appropriation to which they may belong; and the amounts thereof shall, on the certificate of the Treasurer of the United States that such amount has been deposited in the Treasury, be credited by the proper accounting officer of the Treasury, on the books of the Treasury Department, to the officer in whose name it had stood on the books of any agency of the Treasury, if it shall be made to appear that he is entitled to such credit.

The sixth section enacts that for the purpose of giving force and effect to the full intent and meaning of this act, it shall be the duty of the Treasurer, and of all Assistant Treasurers, and of all designated depositaries of the United States, and of the cashiers of all national banks designated as such depositaries, to report to the Secretary of the Treasury at the close of business on the 30th day of June next, and in like manner at the close of business on every 30th day of June thereafter, the condition of every such account so standing, as specified in the preceding sections, on the books of their respective offices, stating the name of each depositor respectively with his official designation, the total amount so remaining on deposit to his credit, and the dates respectively of the last credit and the last debit made to each of such accounts respectively; and it shall be the duty of every and each disbursing officer in any and every department of the Government of the United States to make a like return of all checks issued by such officer, and which may then have been outstanding and unpaid for three years and more, stating fully in such report the name of the payee, for what purpose given, the office on which drawn, the number of the voucher received therefor, and the date, number, and amount for which it was drawn, and when known, the residence of the payee.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Speaker, this act becomes necessary in consequence of the fact, which is of course known to all the members of this House, that no money can be taken from the Treasury without an appropriation. In the dealings of the Department with disbursing officers and with various officers connected with the Treasury, there will constantly arise little errors in their accounts; and in order to facilitate the settlement of these accounts it has been necessary heretofore to pass an act of a similar kind. None has been passed since 1837, and that act was construed to apply only to transactions occurring previous to that date.

I have conversed with the Treasurer of the United States, General Spinner, upon this matter, and am quite satisfied that it is right. It will not take a dollar out of the Treasury; the money is all there; but it is necessary that we should give the power to make these transfers from general to special accounts, in order that these accounts with a large number of individuals, some of which are large, while many are very small, may be settled and closed. If no one wishes further explanation, I will ask for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. MORRILL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

AMERICAN STATE PAPERS.

Mr. HAYES asked unanimous consent to report, from the Committee on the Library, a joint resolution (H. R. No. 112) to authorize the distribution of a portion of the surplus copies of the American State Papers in the custody of the Secretary of the Interior.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution to authorize the distribution of a portion of the surplus copies of the American State Papers in the custody of the Secretary of the Interior.

Whereas it appears from a report of the Secretary of the Interior, dated January 25, 1864, that there remain undistributed at the Interior Department upward of eight hundred copies each of the American State Papers, second series, in seventeen volumes; Therefore,

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to distribute, by mail or otherwise, four hundred copies of each of the said volumes in the manner following, to wit: to each member of the Senate and House of Representatives of the present Congress, one copy; to such public and college libraries as may be designated by the Joint Committee on the Library, one copy each.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I object. Mr. HAYES. I am anxious the joint resolution should pass before leaving the city, and I think if the gentleman will listen to a statement he will withdraw his objection.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I am opposed to the resolution in any shape. We have no right to take the books of the Government without paying for them.

Mr. HAYES. I move to suspend the rules. The SPEAKER. That motion is not now in order.

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS.

Mr. HAYES. I ask unanimous consent to report the following joint resolution from the Joint Committee on the Library:

Joint resolution extending the privileges of the Library of Congress to certain officers of the United States.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the privilege of using the books in the Library of Congress shall be extended to the General-in-Chief of the Army of the United States; to the Assistant Secretaries and chiefs of bureaus of each of the Departments; to the Comptrollers of the United States; to the Treasurer of the United States; to the Superintendent of the Coast Survey, the Superintendent of the Naval Observatory, the Surgeon General of the Army, the Judge Advocate General of the Army, the Superintendent of the Government Printing Office, the Commissioner of Public Buildings, and the Postmaster, Sergeant-at-Arms, and Doorkeeper of the Senate and House of Representatives, on the same terms and conditions as prescribed by law for Senators and Representatives.

Resolved, That no books shall be taken by persons privileged to use said Library outside of the limits of the District of Columbia.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I object, unless it is amended so as to let in the whole world.

Mr. ROSS. I want the soldiers' orphans and widows included.

TELEGRAPH TO THE WEST INDIES.

Mr. ELIOT, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back Senate bill No. 26, granting to the International Ocean Telegraph Company the right and privilege to establish telegraphic communication between the city of New York and the West India islands, with amendments.

First amendment:

Strike out after the words "at all times" the words "during a state of war," so it will read:

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the said International Ocean Telegraph Company shall at all times give the United States the free use of said cable or cables, to a telegraphic operator of its own selection, to transmit any messages to and from its military, naval, and diplomatic agents.

The amendment was agreed to.

Second amendment:

Insert after the word "agents" the following:

And the said company shall keep all its lines open to the public for the transmission, for daily publication, of market and commercial reports and intelligence; and all messages, dispatches, and communications shall be forwarded in the order in which they shall be received; and the said company shall not be permitted to charge and collect for messages transmitted through any of its submarine cables more than the rate of $3 50 for messages of ten words.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ELIOT demanded the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. ELIOT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RELIEF OF ARMY PAYMASTERS.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask unanimous consent to report back, from the Committee on Military Affairs, House bill No. 475, for the relief of paymasters of the Army, with a substitute.

Mr. WARD. I object to its consideration at this time.

The substitute was ordered to be printed; and the bill and substitute were then recommitted.

KANSAS WAR CLAIMS.

On motion of Mr. SCHENCK, the Committee on Military Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of Senate bill No. 259, to authorize the Secretary of War to settle the claims of the State of Kansas for the services of the militia called out by the Governor of that State on the requisition of Major General Curtis, commander of the United States forces in that State; and the same was referred to the select committee on the war debts of the loyal States.

SALE OF LAND AUTHORIZED.

Mr. INGERSOLL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill authorizing the sale of a piece of land in the city of Washington; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

SANITARY CONDITION OF WASHINGTON.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I should like to call the attention of the House to a subject that was referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia some time since, respecting the sanitary condition of this city. The committee examined that question and reported a resolution for the adoption of the House, but its consideration being objected to it was withdrawn, and has never received the action of the House. In view of the cholera having reached our shores, and that this city presents a condition inviting that epidemic, the committee have thought it proper to ask a small appropriation, which I hope will be considered this morning. I ask that the resolution be read.

The joint resolution was read. It proposes to appropriate $25,000, and places the same under the control of the Commissioner of Public Buildings to be expended by him, or so much thereof as may be necessary, in such work as may be required to put in proper condition the avenues and public reservations under his control so as to prevent if possible the appearance of the cholera or other epidemic in the city of Washington.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I have no objection to its being introduced and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, where we can consider it.

Mr. INGERSOLL. The object is now to take steps with as little delay as possible.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. I suggest that it be extended to the object of keeping the Hall of the House healthy and comfortable. I, myself, have been near perishing here for want of a breath of fresh air ever since I have been here. Daily I am reminded of the "black hole" of Calcutta. I am absolutely afraid of perishing for want of air.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Let it go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and I will examine it, and if there is no reasonable objection we may take it up and pass it.

Mr. INGERSOLL. When can it come up again if it goes to the Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can ask unanimous consent on any day to discharge the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I cannot press it now without a suspension of the rules. Will not my colleague, [Mr. WASHBURN,] examine it himself?

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. INGERSOLL,] allow it to go to the Committee of the Whole or withdraw it?

Mr. INGERSOLL. Let it be referred.

The joint resolution was accordingly read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts, from the Committee of Claims, by unanimous consent, reported adversely on the following cases; which were laid on the table:

Petition of Henry Willard, wagon-master, for compensation for services rendered.

Claim of L. D. Clemens.

Petition of William D. Wesson for pay, &c.

INDIAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. WINDOM, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, by unanimous consent reported Senate bill No. 204, to provide for an annual inspection in Indian affairs, and for other purposes; which was ordered to be printed, and recommitted to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

ISABELLA STRUBING.

Mr. TAYLOR, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, by unanimous consent reported back a bill granting a pension to Mrs. Isabella Strubing, widow of private Edmund Strubing, deceased, of the forty-sixth regiment Pennsylvania volunteers, with an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The substitute grants a pension of eight dollars per month from the 30th of May, 1864, during her widowhood, and provides that upon her death or marriage it shall go to her children until they shall attain the age of sixteen years.

The substitute was agreed to.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed; and being engrossed, it was read the third time and passed.

Mr. TAYLOR moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

COURT OF CLAIMS.

Mr. ANCONA. I ask unanimous consent to call up the motion to reconsider the vote by which House bill No. 473, extending the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims, was recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs.

No objection was made.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Let the bill be reported.

The bill was read.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. For what purpose is this bill before the House?

The SPEAKER. On a motion to reconsider the vote by which it was referred.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. To what committee was it sent?

The SPEAKER. The bill was reported by the Committee on Military Affairs at the time that committee was reporting, and recommitted; and a motion to reconsider was made with the understanding that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ANCONA] should call it up afterwards. No objection being made, the gentleman has called up the motion to reconsider, and it is now before the House.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope that motion will not be pressed this morning.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania proposes, in case of reconsid-eration, to move to strike out the first section of the bill, and to insert in lieu thereof the following substitute:

That the Court of Claims shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine the claim of any paymaster, quartermaster, commissary of subsistence, or other disbursing officer of the United States, or of his administrators or executors, for relief from responsibility on account of losses, by capture or otherwise, while in the line of his duty, of Government funds, vouchers, records, and papers in his charge for which he was and is held responsible.

Mr. ANCONA. I will only state that this substitute is proposed with the concurrence of the Committee on Military Affairs, and is merely a change of phraseology, making the bill general.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I would inquire whether this bill has been printed.

Mr. ANCONA. It has been on the files of members for two or three weeks.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Has the substitute been printed?

Mr. ANCONA. It has not, but it is a change merely of phraseology, and makes the act general instead of confining it to particular cases. There can be no possible objection to it. It will relieve the Department from a great deal of trouble on account of these claims.

I demand the previous question on the motion to reconsider.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The question was put, and there were—ayes 28, noes 36; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. ANCONA, and WASHBURN, of Illinois, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 24, noes 70.

So the House refused to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The question recurred on the demand for the previous question on the motion to reconsider.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania will not press the consideration of this bill this morning. It is certainly one which ought not to be passed without full and free discussion. It takes away jurisdiction from the House in all matters of claims of this particular kind, leaving it to the Court of Claims. Now, I think that is very unsafe. I think the House ought not to part with its jurisdiction over these matters. I hope the gentleman will postpone this motion.

Mr. ANCONA. I see no reason for postponing it any longer. The bill was reported unanimously by the Committee on Military Affairs and has been on the files of members for two or three weeks.

Mr. BINGHAM. Will the gentleman let me say a word?

Mr. ANCONA. I will withdraw the previous question for that purpose.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say, in answer to the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois, that the substitute is but verbal; that it does not change in any particular the substance of the bill as originally reported by the committee and printed. This bill does not put it in the power of the Court of Claims to take one dollar out of the Treasury of the United States. It simply provides that in all cases of alleged losses by paymasters, quartermasters, or commissaries of subsistence, which are usually passed upon in this House upon ex parte evidence, the claimants shall make their claims under the sanctions of law, under the solemnity of oaths administered in judicial proceedings, and in the presence of a law officer of the United States; that they shall not be allowed this relief unless the court, upon a full hearing of the whole case, upon testimony other than ex parte testimony; shall come to the conclusion that it is equitable to relieve the officer from his liability; in which event the bill provides that he shall simply have the credit upon his accounts in settlement, but not to draw any money from the Treasury.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. That is the same in effect as drawing money from the Treasury.

Mr. BINGHAM. No, sir.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. It relieves them from a liability to the Treasury.

Mr. BINGHAM. I do not want the House to be misled by any such remarks. The same thing is done in this House upon ex parte testimony; not testimony taken before a committee authorized to examine witnesses in the premises, but testimony taken out of doors before a notary public or a justice of the peace. I have seen this thing; I have had some experience in it, and I undertake to say that the effect of this bill is to protect your Treasury against depletion to the extent of hundreds of thousands of dollars annually.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. How is it to protect the Treasury when it affords the means to these gentlemen of getting rid of paying what is standing against them into the Treasury?

Mr. BINGHAM. The House is not to be deluded by any such suggestion. I answer the gentleman by saying that time and time again we have had bills passed through this House relieving persons from liabilities which they are under to the extent of thousands of dollars, and that, too, when there was not a syllable of legal evidence in the case. Now, this bill provides that all this shall be done upon proper evidence, before competent law officers.

Mr. GRIDER. It submits the justice of the case to the court?

Mr. BINGHAM. Certainly it does; and the court is to pass upon the case upon proper evidence, and after being fully satisfied that the party asking relief is not in fault, that he has done his whole duty, then the court decide that in equity he is entitled to be relieved from liability.

Mr. GRIDER. And depositions in the case can be read in the court?

Mr. BINGHAM. Only upon notice, and in the presence of the officer of the Government charged with looking after the interests of the Government.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am a great deal astonished that opposition should be made to the passage of a bill of this kind. It is not necessary that I should add anything to what has been said by my colleagues upon the committee, [Messrs. ANCONA and BINGHAM,] except this: I wish to advise the House that there have been referred to the Military Committee a great number of cases which would have occupied pretty much all the time of the committee if we were to give to each case that investigation which ought to be given to it before arriving at something like a judicial decision upon its merits. They are cases where quartermasters, commissaries, and other disbursing officers have lost their vouchers by capture by the enemy, or otherwise, and they are therefore unable to have their accounts presented, except upon other and secondary evidence.

Now, all that this bill provides is, that instead of each case being adjusted and settled in the hurry of congressional business, by a committee of either House or Senate, and a special enactment passed for the purpose, there shall be a general law referring to the Court of Claims all cases of this character, authorizing that court to report what are the facts in each case, and whether credit should or should not be allowed to the disbursing officer. That is the whole effect of this bill. We prefer a general law because we believe that neither a committee of this House, nor the House itself, could give a thorough investigation to each of these cases so well as the court could do.

Mr. GRIDER. What is the lowest sum which the court is to consider?

Mr. SCHENCK. There is no amount stated in the bill.

Mr. DELANO. I was not in here when the bill was read. I would ask if it is proposed to make the proceeding of the court final.

Mr. SCHENCK. There is an appeal allowed to the Supreme Court.

Mr. DELANO. I would suggest the propriety of providing that the decision of the court shall not be reviewed.

Mr. SCHENCK. I think perhaps this matter would be better understood by having the bill and the proposed substitute for the first section again read.

The bill and substitute were again read.
Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. In order to remove any difficulty I would suggest to the gentleman in charge of this bill, [Mr. ANCONA,] to put in a proviso that an appeal shall be allowed in all cases.

Mr. BINGHAM. In order to satisfy the gentleman, although I think it is the law now, I would suggest to my colleague on the committee [Mr. ANCONA] to modify his substitute by adding the following proviso:

Provided, An appeal may be taken to the Supreme Court as in other cases.

Mr. ANCONA. I will modify the proposed substitute in accordance with the suggestion of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM.]

Mr. STEVENS. I would inquire if this is confined to certain documents, such as bonds, or does it embrace all the funds which may have been lost?

Mr. BINGHAM. All that is lost without fault.

Mr. STEVENS. Does it embrace money which may have been lost?

Mr. BINGHAM. Certainly it does.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If the bill is as broad as that, then I think the House certainly should never pass it.

Mr. ANCONA. I now demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the vote recommitting the bill to the Committee on Military Affairs was reconsidered.

The question recurred upon the motion to recommit the bill.

Mr. ANCONA. I call the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The previous question was seconded and the main question was ordered.

The question was taken; and the motion to recommit was not agreed to.

Mr. ANCONA. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs to move the following as a substitute for the first section of this bill:

That the Court of Claims shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine the claim of any paymaster, quartermaster, commissary of subsistence, or other disbursing officer of the United States, or of his administrators or executors, for relief from responsibility on account of losses by capture, or otherwise, while in the line of his duty, of Government funds, vouchers, records, and papers in his charge, and for which he was and is held responsible: Provided, An appeal may be taken to the Supreme Court as in other cases.

The question was upon agreeing to the substitute for the first section.

Mr. ANCONA. I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the substitute was agreed to.

The bill as amended was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The question was upon the passage of the bill as amended; and being taken, there were, upon a division—ayes sixty-six, noes not counted.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. ANCONA moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PAYMASTERS OF THE ARMY—AGAIN.

Mr. SCHENCK. This morning I reported back to this House, by instruction of the Committee on Military Affairs, House bill No. 475, for the relief of paymasters of the Army, with a substitute, and asked for its consideration at that time. The gentleman from New York [Mr. WARD] objected to its consideration then, and it was recommitted. Having examined the bill, he now withdraws his objection, I understand.

Mr. WARD. I have had an opportunity to examine the bill, and I have no objection to it.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill and substitute were recommended.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The question recurred upon the motion to recommit.

Mr. SCHENCK. I withdraw the motion to recommit, and call the previous question on the bill and substitute.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the substitute was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to amend the title so that it shall read, "A bill to facilitate the settlement of the accounts of paymasters of the Army."

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, notifying the House that that body had passed joint resolution H. R. No. 67, providing for the reappraisal of the lands described in an act for the relief of William Sawyer and others, of Ohio.

Also, that it had passed bills and joint resolution of the following titles, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House:

An act (S. No. 74) for the admission of Colorado into the Union;

An act (S. No. 277) for the relief of William Cook; and Joint resolution (S. R. No. 74) providing for the acceptance of a collection of plants tendered to the United States by Frederick Pech.

ADMISSION OF COLORADO.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I ask unanimous consent that Senate bill No. 74, for the admission of Colorado into the Union be taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I object.

DABOLL'S FOG TRUMPET.

Mr. DARLING, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into and report on the expediency of establishing Daboll's fog trumpet at Sandy Hook, port of New York.

TAXATION OF BANK CURRENCY.

Mr. DELANO, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill declaring certain obligations of the United States and national bank currency subject to taxation under State authority; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I call for the regular order of business.

The House accordingly proceeded, as the regular order of business, to the consideration of the unfinished business of last evening, being House bill No. 414, to secure the speedy construction of the Northern Pacific railroad and telegraph line, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes.

The pending question was Mr. WENTWORTH'S motion to refer to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to discuss the details of the bill before the House; nor is it my object to answer the various objections which were raised to it yesterday; nor shall I, as did the gentleman from Chicago, speak under the apprehension of the effect my remarks or my vote on the bill may have upon uninformed constituents on the eve of an election. My constituents, I apprehend, know my opinions on this subject pretty well. It was in 1850 that having met with Asa Whitney's pamphlet, and sought a conference with him on the subject of a Pacific railroad along a northern route, I gathered as many as I could of the people of Philadelphia in a meeting presided over by the mayor, and urged them to unite with me in applying to the American Congress to grant to Mr. Whitney and his associates just what is proposed to be granted to other men by the bill now under consideration. From that day to this I have never doubted the wisdom of the proposition; nor have I felt less interest in the subject since a dear sister, and a graceful girl of rare intelligence, over whose childhood I had watched with a father's solicitude, have been laid in that valley which Bryant, who is yet in the enjoyment of lusty life, after he had passed life's meridian described by saying—

"Where rolls the Oregon,
And hears no sound save his own dashings."

I still have living kindred in that valley; and for the last ten years have been in frequent and constant correspondence with those who dwell near Puget sound, and have thus learned something of the mighty and varied resources of the north Pacific slope, the region through which the only river that penetrates the heart of the country pours itself into the beautiful but sleeping ocean.

I shall discuss the bill in its broad and general relations. The question is, as the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HENDERSON] well said yesterday, one of the gravest importance that has been presented to this Congress. He said truly it was of national importance. He did not, however, bound its importance by that suggestion. It is a question for the world. From Lake Superior to Puget sound! A railroad stretching from Lake Superior to Puget sound, a distance of eighteen hundred miles! To open to civilization and enterprise an empire longer and broader than western Europe from the southern vinelands of sunny Spain and Portugal on the one hand, the hyperborean forests of Norway on the other. Yes, sir, an empire equal to England, Ireland, Scotland, France, the German States, Belgium, Holland, Switzerland, Denmark, Sweden, Spain, and Portugal.

We fail, Mr. Speaker, to understand our relations to the age in which we live, and our duties to mankind, because we fail to appreciate the grand dimensions and unimagined resources of our country. We would regard ourselves giants did we estimate ourselves in proportion to possessions so grand in a country so abounding in multiform resources, so undeveloped, and so sparsely settled.

The region through which it is proposed to construct this road, exceeding in extent the territory of all the nations I have named, also embodies more mineral wealth than they all combined ever possessed. But what is its condition? It is a wilderness. Almost every acre of it is still innocent of the tread of a tax collector. It yields our country no revenue. Along the Pacific slope a few thriving villages dot it. Some of them will one day be great cities, but they are now on the borders of a vast wilderness.

Sir, I appeal from the constituents of the gentleman from Chicago [Mr. WENTWORTH] on the eve of an election to posterity and ask gentlemen to view the proposed enterprise in the light in which future generations will behold it. They will look beyond the vast empire I have indicated. There lies the sleeping but broad Pacific, capable of bearing a commerce a thousand times heavier than has ever chafed the waters of the Atlantic; an ocean on which our flag is seen floating only from the masts of coasting craft or whalers wending their slow way to the northern seas in quest of hard-earned wealth; an ocean which should bear a commerce estimated by values in dollars and cents infinitely transcending any the Atlantic has known or may ever know.

Sir, so slight is our power upon that ocean that the recently pardoned rebel Semmes with a single vessel destroyed nearly a hundred of our peaceable whalers, giving their cargoes, gathered by years of dangerous toil, to the flames or the waves. It bounds our country for more than a thousand miles, and our maritime power, which could not now protect a mile of it, should be seen and felt upon it, and our flag and white sails or the curling smoke of our steamers should shadow its every wave.

That ocean belongs to us, and we should confirm our title by the right of occupancy; for when we cast our eyes beyond its placid surface we behold what is to be our next conquest. The Old World is to be awakened by American ideas. Its unnumbered people are to be quickened, instructed, and redeemed by American enterprise. Some statisticians tell us that there are 750,000,000 people in the ancient theocratic countries of the East, which is the West to which the star of our commercial empire will next take its way. Others put the population at 1,000,000,000; and others at 1,300,000,000. There, where civilization dawned and the drowsy past yet lingers, the first impulses of a new cycle begin to be felt. Japan is yielding to the impulses of our age. The Chinese wall is crumbling away. It was but yesterday that I had a letter informing me that our countryman, Dr. Martin, interpreter of the American legation at Peking, under the employment of the Chinese Government had rendered into that language our Wheaton's Law of Nations. Thus that vast and long isolated Power is preparing to enter into commercial connection with the world. The ancient civilization of Asia is giving way. At the end of thousands of centuries the doctrine of sacred castes is about to yield to the sublimer creed of man's freedom and equality. Muscular labor will soon be done there by the potent agents we now employ—coal and iron—and the genius of the buried dead, embodied in mechanism, will soon relieve their toiling millions as it now does ours. Their whole life is to be quickened by modern enterprise, and they will swell the numbers of the people on our Pacific slope.

But the inviting field of the ocean and the vast field of enterprise and reward open to us in Asia are not the only considerations that induce me to support this bill. The laboring people of every eastern city have an intense interest in this question. The safety of our country depends upon the intelligence, the virtue, the stability of our laboring people. He legislates not wisely for a democratic republic who does not make it the aim of all his acts to improve the material condition of the great laboring masses of the country. If we would perpetuate our institutions we must see that the wages of labor are so maintained that the children of the laboring man shall grow up amid the endearments of home and with the expectation that their children shall find more elegance and refinement in their homes than their parents were familiar with in childhood.

The construction of a road through our northern gold region will open a field that will be a constant refuge for the surplus labor of our eastern States. There will be a refuge for those masses of ingenious workmen who are jostled each year by lack of adjustment of their numbers to the demand for their branch of labor, or are deprived of the advantage of the skill they acquired in youth by the invention of labor-saving machinery; and instead of finding themselves as age gathers on their brow without the means of livelihood rich fields of enterprise easily reached will cheer their declining years.

But again, the depression of our laboring people springs not alone or chiefly from local causes. Beyond the Atlantic ocean there are three hundred and fifty million people in every community of which laboring men are held as raw material; and under the grasping influences of capital and the oppression of despotic Governments are held in such bondage that they are made to subsist, even when they toil most assiduously, upon a modicum of the elements of life, upon a minimum of the amount that will keep the soul in a tolerably sound body. Escaping from this subjection they are borne to our shores by tens and hundreds of thousands each year. They are strangers in a strange land, many of them unacquainted with our language and our habits, and are unconsciously and unwillingly the means of depressing wages. But if we give to the company the means to inaugurate work on this road we will not only relieve the laboring masses of our crowded eastern cities, but furnish employment for more than the annual influx of those whom we gladly welcome, because they strengthen and enrich us by their toil. Could we drain Europe of its surplus laborers we would raise her wages as she now too often depresses ours.

What will be the true policy of the builders of this road? Will it not be to employ as laborers the heads of families, and to pay them with land and money, and settle the families along the line of the road, so that the laborer of one year will in the next farm his land and supply fresh laborers with bread? Thus will he who enters into an engagement with the company a pauper, or little better, find himself at the end of a year or two an independent farmer upon the world's great commercial highway. The managers of the road must pursue this policy, and will thus create business for and guard their road; thus, too, they will quicken the mineral and agricultural resources of the country, and give to the tax collector, whether at a port of entry or in the service of the internal revenue department, more money each year than this bill is likely to cause to be taken from the Treasury.

I ask gentlemen, in considering this subject, to rise to its dignity and grandeur. Sir, I am a devotee to freedom, but would make every country in the world tributary to my own. I delight in every manifestation of my country's power. I swell with pride as I contemplate its gigantic proportions and see how rapidly its people subdue the wilderness, and would, as I have said, make every nation tributary to its power and grandeur; but I would do it, not by oppressing any people, not by war with any Government, but by improving the condition of the masses of my countrymen and those who may become such, and showing the rulers and the people of the world how speedily free institutions exalt the poor and the oppressed of all nations into free, self-sustaining, and self-governing citizens. It is in our power to do this, and by no other means can we do it so well or quickly as by passing this supplement and vivifying the charter granted to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company. And, sir, it was not without some indignation that I heard the words "swindle" and "public plunder" echoed and reechoed through this Hall yesterday from the lips of honorable gentlemen, no one of whom had any knowledge of facts which justified the use of such language.

Sir, one of Shakspeare's characters says, on a certain occasion:

"My lady doth protest too much."

And I was a little struck yesterday with the constant protestations of honesty and virtuous indignation that accompanied those denunciations.

Sir, I do not know the gentlemen who are named in or hold the charter. I believe I have been introduced in the street cars to some of them, but I know this: that gentlemen whose word I would take, from Vermont and Massachusetts and Maine, and from other States, rise and tell me that they know them, and that they are among the honored men in the communities which they represent. And I have looked in vain through the provisions of this bill to find that which should induce members to denounce such gentlemen as swindlers and public plunderers, and men who are desirous "of getting their arms into the Treasury up to the elbow." I find no provision that justifies any such remarks; and it was in this connection that I asked yesterday whether it was possible to exclude the lobby of the Central and Union Pacific railroad from the floor of the House. I did not know that it had been here, but I knew that there was not that in the provisions of the bill which could animate gentlemen to make such assaults upon men whose characters were indorsed as were those of the gentlemen who were so spoken of yesterday.

Now, sir, what does this bill propose to do? The land was granted by the original act. What is the value of that land—not its prospective value, but its present market value? There was a dispute yesterday between a gentleman from Iowa and a gentleman from Ohio as to whether the representations of its value made in one of the company's pamphlets were accurate. Sir, its value to-day as a marketable commodity is zero. It is not regarded as marketable by the Government. It has no market value. What will be its value five years hence? Who can say? I submit to gentlemen that this depends upon whether there be made into and through it an avenue or avenues by which commerce may be conducted and settlement made possible. Make two or three sections of railroad; settle the families of the laborers along its route, with the school-house, the newspaper office, and the church in their midst, and the sections of land will be among those that will yield the heaviest taxation; their gold and silver—for the country abounds in gold and silver—will flow into and replenish your exhausted Treasury. But let it remain a wilderness, as it is now, and when we shall have ceased to live it will still be untaxed—an unproductive wilderness without an appreciable market value. Therefore there might well be an honest misunderstanding or misapprehension as to its value, to be settled by the time and circumstances of the valuation.

Mr. Speaker, I again assert that I have been unable to detect any provision in this bill which looks like swindling. What are we asked to do? Why, when the stockholders shall have built twenty-five miles of road, we are to guaranty for not more than twenty years six per cent. interest upon a fixed amount of stock per mile. And what is the offset to that liability? Why, sir, all the money received by the company from the sale of lands on the southern side of the road is to be paid into the Treasury of the United States, to meet or partially meet that liability; and when fifty miles or more of the road shall have been completed, this process is to be repeated; and so, by sections of twenty-five miles, till the road shall be completed. This is the whole story.

Yet it has been said that we are asked to guaranty the interest of $57,000,000 for twenty years. This cannot be possible. Some of the land will be sold before the road will be completed. But, sir, less than twenty years, perhaps in half that time, there is to be another relief for the Government. From the completion of the road twenty-five per cent. of its gross earnings are to be paid into the Treasury of the United States, together with all the proceeds of the sale of the land along the south side of the road for eighteen hundred miles. It is impossible that we can ever be called upon to pay for a single year the interest on $57,000,000 or anything like that amount. The probabilities are that we may continue to pay something each year until the road shall reach the waters of the Missouri. I doubt whether we will ever be called on for a dollar of interest after that time; but if we shall, it will only be till the road shall have connected the commerce of the waters of the Missouri with that of those of the Columbia, pouring their way down to the Pacific. After that, if the laws of population hold with us as they have done, the Government cannot possibly be called on for a dollar.

Had any other civilized nation such an empire, opening to its people such resources, maritime, mineral, agricultural, and bucolic, would it hesitate to embark a few million dollars to develop and populate it? Would it shrink from so strengthening its commerce by an annual contribution that would not be felt in the payments of the country or observed in announcing the total of its receipts and payments? No, sir; there is no Government that would hesitate in such a case; and I do not believe that the American Congress will fall so far short of its duty, will hold the copper cent so close to its eye, as to be unable to see the golden placer beyond, or will sanction the absurd policy of refusing to make a small annual outlay, for a brief term of years, for the development of resources the future value of which cannot be calculated.

Sir, great railroads have never been built by the capital of the stockholders. They are always built by borrowing, or if built by capital paid in, special laws permit dividends to be paid from the capital and charged to the construction account. Mortgages are often issued upon the franchise and survey; and the first grading is often done by means of a loan. In this connection I ask the Clerk to read a few paragraphs from the admirable letter of Quartermaster General Meigs. They are full of sound sense and the lessons of experience in the railroad development of this and other countries.

The Clerk read as follows:

"But the great reservoir from which man and all his necessary supplies are drawn is yet, and for years to come must be, the Mississippi valley and the Atlantic coast. The Territories of the Pacific coast are to be filled by emigration; they have, as yet, no great manufactories and no redundant population. The route needed for the opening and improvement of the country is the route from the East.

"The grants of land made by Congress for this object are liberal and are sufficient in time, probably, to construct the road. But men die; nations live; men cannot take their capital, the accumulated fruit of years of industry, and devote it to the construction of a great public improvement, and wait for years for the returns. They prefer enjoying the present use of their fortunes to investing their means in enterprises which will make large returns only after their death.

"The nation is lasting. The opening of every new route, the inclosure and cultivation of every acre of wild land, contribute immediately to the revenue and resources of the nation; and no means of improving the great national domain, of increasing by its products the national revenue and prosperity, can compare in cheapness and efficacy with the opening of rapid communication by railway with these distant, healthful, and productive regions.

"The country is one fitted to be the home of a hardy race, one in which the principles of liberty and the spirit of enterprise and industry will live and bear their natural fruits."

"A guarantee of a fixed rate of interest upon the cost of construction, to be repaid in a term of years, is a mode of assistance to their great enterprises, now common in the highly developed and heavily taxed countries of Europe. If those Governments, burdened with the immense annual expenditure of standing armies, almost as large in time of peace as we have been compelled to support in time of war, find it in the interest of their revenues thus to aid free travel and transport through countries already provided with navigable rivers and excellent wagon roads, we may confidently assume that our country will find ample reward for any such expenditure in opening up a highway for fraternal intercourse between our older communities in the Atlantic and the rising settlements on the Pacific—a highway, too, to which the inevitable laws of commerce will attract the trade of the East—the trade of China, Japan, and India—a trade along whose slow and painful track, when it was conducted by beasts of burden, and by oars and sails, instead of by the iron horse and the ocean steamship, great cities sprung up in the desert sands of Asia and on the coasts of the Mediterranean. Babylon, Nineveh, Palmyra, Bagdad, Damascus, Constantinople, Alexandria, Rome, Venice, Genoa, and London, are the outgrowths of this trade in former centuries."

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Speaker, what all other nations have done, and what they are doing, we are asked to do, except that they sometimes assume a positive and enduring liability, while there will be no ultimate liability here. The immense grant of land, with high market values imparted to it by the completion of the railroad, will indemnify us against loss by our guaranty; for is there any gentleman here who doubts that this magnificent grant of land, made available to emigrants from the East and Europe, will be adequate security for the loan of an annual amount of interest, limited as it is in this bill? To doubt that it will be ample is to deny value to the richest portion of our country, or that increased wealth will follow enterprise and industry bestowed on raw material.

Sir, it is said that this measure will, if not bankrupt the country, at least impair its credit.

Do you bankrupt a country by increasing its productive industry? Do you bankrupt a country by expanding its habitable territory and carrying civilization to a broad empire teeming with resources, but now a wilderness? No, sir, it will not bankrupt the country. It will enrich it; it will expand and strengthen its credit. In the darkest hours of the war I stood here and advocated the grant of land to the Central Pacific railroad, and I then said in substance to those who listened to me, "Let us proclaim to the nations of Europe that now, in the very agony of our country, we project and launch for completion an enterprise for which none of them have the territory. Let us show them that, while our country is torn and almost rent asunder by civil war, such is the confidence in its power and endurance that we engage in enterprises which may not bless us, but of which our posterity shall reap the rich reward, and the very commencement of which will bring to us millions of dollars with which to pay for their construction."

The war is over, and I now appeal to gentlemen to increase the resources of the country by developing a region greater in length and breadth and natural wealth than western Europe, and making it populous, thrifty, productive, and a market for the consumption of the products of other regions, and above all by making it the great highway of the world. Let the capitalists of England, of France, of Frankfort-on-the-Main, and elsewhere, understand that their bills of exchange, representing and moving the commercial wealth of the world, traverse the continent of a democratic republic that can convert its wilderness into teeming farms and thriving cities by taking their paupers and the most abject of their people and elevating them into sovereign citizens of a free republic, and you will not impair the credit of the country.

I can conceive no enterprise which would more surely guaranty the speedy and easy payment of our national debt than the development of that empire which is drained by the Missouri and the Columbia, by the application of the rule invariably practiced in building railroads, to wit, the use of credit while capital is being made productive by the construction of the road. I apprehend that the money could be obtained without this legislation. I apprehend that an application to Sir Morton Peto and other British capitalists, with a stipulation to make this road a link in a grand international road, would bring the requisite capital. But I want no international railroad binding us still more closely to the Provinces of our proudest and most powerful enemy. I do not want the British line practically brought down from the forty-eighth to the forty-second degree of latitude. This should be an American road, and should be under the guardianship of the American Congress. It should be in the hands of American men, so that if the colonists make lateral roads, those roads shall feed our main line, and if discriminations are to be made as to rights or rates over the road, they shall be made against those who are not our fellow-citizens, and not against the interests of our country or countrymen.

I implore gentlemen to rise above the petty and local considerations that have animated this debate so far. I ask them to contemplate this as a great national scheme.

Especially do I ask them to guard the country against a monopoly whose footfalls were, in my judgment, heard here yesterday. It is said New Jersey is but a province of the Camden and Amboy Railroad Company. Men say that the Pennsylvania Central road governs that State. I have heard similar suggestions in regard to some of the States of New England and the West. I hear it stated sometimes that the Illinois Central railroad domineers the State of Illinois. We have granted a charter and a liberal donation to one Pacific railroad, and we must relieve ourselves from its power as a monopoly by adequately aiding other roads. I am in favor of a northern route, and should I stand here when the country is restored and the loyal men of the South are represented in this Hall, if they ask a grant like this for a southern Pacific railroad, my voice shall be raised to give them subsidies greater than are asked here. With the Atlantic and the Pacific connected upon our northern boundary, upon the central line embracing Illinois, Missouri, and my own great State, and on a southern route, there will be no monopoly coming here to impel gentlemen to insinuate slanders against those who may present great undertakings to the consideration of Congress and the nation.

My arguments, Mr. Speaker, have been of a general character. They may all be familiar to gentlemen. But they have been uttered in the interest of my country and mankind; and in aid of those interests I hope this bill will be passed.

Mr. FARNSWORTH obtained the floor, but yielded to

Mr. STEVENS, who said: I only want a single moment. I ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WESTWORTH] to withdraw his motion to refer to the Committee on Public Lands, so that I may move a substitute for the bill. He can then renew the motion. I only want the substitute before the House.

Mr. WESTWORTH. I wish to say that my sole object in moving to refer this bill to the Committee on Public Lands was to provoke inquiry. I am sincerely desirous that every member upon this floor shall discharge his duty, if he thinks proper, by referring to the Committee on Public Lands any amendment he has to propose. All I have desired, and all that I now desire, and all the gentlemen who are considered as the opponents of this bill desire, is that it shall be discussed. The whole trouble between us and those who are trying to force this bill through, is that they do not mean that the people shall understand anything about this bill. I am determined that they shall. I withdraw my motion.

Mr. STEVENS. I now submit a substitute for the bill.

Mr. WESTWORTH. I renew my motion. If any gentleman has an amendment to offer I am willing to yield for it to come in.

Mr. SPALDING. I give notice I shall move to lay the bill upon the table.

Mr. HIGBY. I rise to a question of order. Was not the Committee on the Pacific Railroad created for the very purpose of considering this subject?

The SPEAKER. The committee was raised for that purpose, but the House has the right to refer any bill to any committee it pleases. The gentleman from Illinois has a right to move to refer this bill to the Committee on Public Lands or to the Committee on Appropriations or any other committee.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I desire the House as well as the country to understand I am in favor of a Pacific railroad. I am not only in favor of one Pacific railroad, but of several, whenever the commerce of the country demands it. Two years ago, when the original bill was passed chartering this Pacific Railroad Company, I voted for it. I have not examined the Congressional Globe with reference to the debate that took place at that time, but I have a distinct recollection when the bill was reported by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] chairman of the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, some member, perhaps myself, asked whether it provided money should be drawn out of the Treasury for the construction of this road. Finally a provision, which I will read, was introduced. It is in the third section:

"And provided further, That no money shall be drawn from the Treasury of the United States to aid in the construction of the said Northern Pacific railroad."

Upon that provision being inserted in the act, myself, and I have no doubt many other gentlemen, voted for the bill who would not have done so without some such provision. But it seems that provisions of this kind inserted in the organic acts creating corporations of this sort are no protection to the Government. They come again and again, and, like Oliver Twist, they ask for more, more.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if we pass this bill, if we give this subsidy which they now demand in money, we still have no security, but they come again next session, or at the next Congress, and ask for more—more soup.

We have all kinds of agencies made use of here to put these bills through Congress. I was a little startled, and my nerves somewhat disturbed, in common with my colleagues, as I suppose, yesterday morning, after the debate had commenced upon this bill, when a messenger came around quietly to our seats, and laid before us a formidable-looking document from the Board of Trade of the city of Chicago, containing a series of resolutions adopted by that board in favor of this particular bill. Upon the envelope I noticed the stamp of the Board of Trade of that city; but they were without post-mark. They had not come through the ordinary channel of the post office, but were sent here by express to the lobby agent of this railroad company here, to be delivered to members from the West upon the eve of action upon it, for the purpose of influencing their votes.

Since that time one of my colleagues has received a letter from a gentleman in Chicago, which explains how it was manipulated and how these resolutions were procured to be passed by the Board of Trade. I will read a portion of the letter:

"CHICAGO, April 22, 1866.

"COLONEL WESTWORTH: You will see by the action taken by the Board of Trade yesterday that attention has been called to the Northern Pacific railroad. Colonel Rowland sent me a letter and some papers from Washington, asking me to present them to the directors of the board; and as I went in to do so I found a Mr. Hill, from Boston, explaining the wishes of the company. After he got through I read the letter and submitted the documents, consisting of the charter, an appeal to Congress from the northwestern members, a map of the route, and an act which has been reported to the House of Representatives by the Railroad Committee to assist the construction of the Northern Pacific railroad."

It then goes on to state that the resolution was adopted, and adds:

"You understand the object of all this. It is to influence the vote of yourself and other members from the State in its favor."

Mr. WINDOM. Is not that a common thing?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. The gentleman asks me if it is not a common thing. I believe it is; and it is common for any lobbyists who want to pass a particular bill to affect the commerce of the country to manipulate Boards of Trade and get these resolutions indorsing their projects.

Mr. WINDOM. The gentleman evidently does not understand that letter. This mare's nest is a great deal like some others that have been discussed about this bill. He says these papers were sent here by express from Chicago to some lobby agent to be scattered through the House. The fact is that these papers came here to Mr. Hersey, of the Post Office Department. I suppose they came by express. He is in no sense a lobby agent in this House; he is employed in the post office in the House of Representatives. In that way they are placed on the desks of members of this House.

So far as Mr. Hill is concerned, who is represented as coming from Boston to represent this railroad company, he is no other person than the secretary of the Board of Trade of that city. The city of Boston being interested in this road and desirous of receiving the benefits to be derived from it, sends its secretary of the Board of Trade to Chicago and calls the attention of the board to the subject, just as the city of Chicago sent the secretary of its Board of Trade to the city of Boston a short time ago to influence that Board of Trade in favor of the Illinois ship-canal. That is all there is in this mare's nest.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I do not see that the explanation takes away from the force of my statement at all. A lobby man was sent from Boston to Chicago, an agent of this incorporation, for the purpose of manipulating the Board of Trade there, and there he met another lobbyist, one "Colonel" Rowland, an adventurer, who obtained the title of colonel, God only knows how—an adventurer, as I happen to know, who has been manipulating this thing through the country for the last six months as the agent of this incorporation. A gentleman now in Chicago who had happened to meet him once in the city of Washington, got him to present the question to the Board of Trade of Chicago. He met this Mr. Hill there, accidentally, of course, who had been sent from Boston on this errand at precisely the same point of time. Between them they presented the case to the Board of Trade, an ex parte presentation, of course, and the resolutions were adopted. You all know how these Boards of Trade act upon matters of this kind. They aid and assist sister Boards of Trade of other cities in every matter that appears to be in the aid of commerce. They do not investigate with particular scrutiny the bill presented, but take it on trust as it is presented to them by the agent of the bill and adopt the resolutions offered for the purpose of influencing members of Congress. Now, I desire to say that a measure which is just in itself, and which commends itself because of its justice to the good sense and reason and patriotism of the people of the country, requires no such adjuncts; it requires no such lobbying; it does not require that these missives should be placed upon the desks of members of Congress upon the eve of voting upon the measure in order to interest them in it.

And, sir, when I find these galleries filled with lobbyists; when I find these papers coming to my desk day after day, sent in, as they are, by men who are lobbying for the bill, that is in itself enough to throw distrust upon the measure. A just measure does not require these outside influences in order to aid it or to commend it to the judgment, the good sense, and the patriotism of the Representatives of the people.

I have made a computation of the amount of money for which the United States will become liable under this bill, and I find that that amount, to be precise, is $69,015,000. That is the amount for which the Government will become liable if you pass this bill.

I propose now, sir, to examine the question and see if there is any propriety, if there is any justice, if there is any reason whatever, why the Government should assume this great responsibility.

The original charter provides that this railroad company shall have twenty miles of land—a strip of land twenty miles wide wherever the road passes through a State and forty miles wide where it passes through the Territories—to aid in the construction of this road. This grant was made absolute; it was an absolute grant of the land to this railroad company. What value does the company itself place on these lands? I hold in my hand the report of the first board of directors that was organized under that charter, and I will send it up to the Clerk's desk to have an extract read.

A MEMBER. It has been read.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Well, it will not hurt anybody to read it again, but I doubt if it has been read. This is the report of the first board of directors, the report of Mr. Perham, the president of the road, in reference to the value of the lands and the cost of construction. I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read what I have marked showing the value of the land and the cost of the road.

The Clerk read as follows:

"To construct this road, Congress, by an act of the last session, made a most munificent grant of twenty square miles of land, or twelve thousand eight hundred acres for each mile of the road through Wisconsin, Minnesota, and Oregon, and forty square miles, or twenty-five thousand six hundred acres, for each mile of the road through Dakota, Montana, Idaho, and Washington Territories, making an aggregate of forty-seven million three hundred and sixty thousand acres for the whole grant.

"These lands, when the road shall be built and the business fairly started, including town and station sites, would certainly average ten dollars per acre, making the sum of $473,600,000.

"Supposing the construction of the road should cost $60,000 per mile, the entire cost at this rate would be $120,000,000, leaving to the shareholders an excess of clear profit from the lands alone of $353,600,000.

"This estimate of $60,000 per mile as the cost of the road was liberal, in view of the vast quantities of material for its construction found along the route, including exhaustless mines of iron of the best quality, which could be turned into rails.

"And the estimate at ten dollars per acre as the value of the land is reasonable, when those lands are compared with the grant made for the construction of the Illinois Central railroad.

"The lands granted to this company have not been culled and selected, but are emphatically new lands, while the Illinois grant was of lands which had been many years in the market, much of them having been graded down to twelve and a half cents per acre; yet no sooner was the road completed than those shilling lands at once rose in value to twenty dollars, thirty dollars, fifty dollars, and even $100 per acre, and from them that road was now in successful operation.

"With perseverance and energy, backed by the means at their command, this road could easily be completed and in full operation, with a telegraph accompanying it, within seven years; and at this rate, costing, as already estimated, $120,000,000, the proceeds of the lands would yield to the shareholders, after reimbursing the whole of the original outlay, more than one hundred per cent. upon the capital, leaving out of view the earnings of the road."

Mr. FARNSWORTH. The House will notice from this report of the railroad company that they estimate the cost of constructing this road at $60,000 per mile. And they further say, that after the road is built and equipped, there will be left a clear profit to the railroad of $353,600,000, without any subsidy from the Government in the shape of money.

Gentlemen say that this report was got up when they wanted to sell out. I presume it was. And so the other report was got up when they wanted to get some money from the United States Treasury. And if you cannot rely upon the reports of the railroad company itself, as to the value of the franchises of this road, I would like some gentleman to tell me upon what we can rely.

I also hold in my hand the report of the Committee on the Pacific Railroad of this House, made in 1860. The report was made by Hon. Cyrus Aldrich, of Minnesota, a man well acquainted with the value of these lands, and of this route, and who, I think, is one of the corporators of this road. In that report the committee say:

"The undersigned, the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, do not doubt that much of this distance can be built for $25,000 per mile, including a full equipment."

Now, if you can build a good portion of this road at $25,000 per mile, instead of $60,000, as the railroad company estimates, and if the rate of $60,000 a mile would leave a net product of over $350,000,000, what would the net product be at the rate of $25,000 per mile?

Mr. GRINNELL. I do not believe that estimate.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I believe it just as much as I believe anything presented to this House upon this subject, for it is official in some respect. We have not had much else that was official. I do not know why we should not believe this as well as any of these other papers.

Mr. STEVENS. If the statement the gentleman has had read is true, would it not be an excellent security for the guarantee asked?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Well, if it is not true that the land is worth anything like the estimate, then I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] what security you would then have. The lands are certainly worth something or they are not.

Now, let us turn over the pages of another pamphlet. Gentlemen say this was got up for the purpose of selling out; but let us take up a pamphlet which was got up for the purpose of securing votes in this House and see what it says. It was read yesterday at the request of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. DELANO;] but I will call the attention of the House to it again.

The bill under consideration provides that the Government, for guarantying this interest, shall be secured by a lien upon the lands on the south side of the road; or rather a lien upon the proceeds of the sales of those lands. Now, in the pamphlet in which this company appeals to Congress for further aid this land is estimated at a value of $32,000 per mile. And mark you, that estimate includes only one half the land that we have granted to this company; they estimate the land upon one side of the road only at $32,000 per mile; and that is the amount of stock upon which they ask the Government to guaranty the interest. Well, sir, if the land upon the south side of the road is worth at the rate of $32,000 per mile, I suppose the land on the north side of the road is worth that also. I suppose no gentleman will claim that there is any difference in the value of these lands, between those on the south side of the road and those on the north side of the road. Then the lands already granted to this company are worth at the rate of $64,000 a mile.

Well, sir, if they have a grant of lands worth $64,000 per mile, why, in the name of common sense, are they asking Congress for aid in the shape of money? Sir, I am not going to contradict the statement of this railroad company. I shall not take issue with them as to the value of this land. I am inclined to think that the lands are worth the amount named, or very near it. Then the question recurs, why do they want this subsidy or guarantee? Why, sir, they want it for the same reason that the other company wanted land. They want it for the purpose of speculation. They want it that they in turn, like the other company, may sell out.

The gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. WOODBRIDGE,] in giving yesterday a history of the transfer of this charter from the one company to the other, stated that the present company were induced to make this purchase because efforts to buy this charter were being made by capitalists and others in Canada, who were promised the aid of capital from England to construct this road. Well, sir, if their charter, without any such assistance as this bill will give them, was so valuable as to induce capitalists in Canada to attempt its purchase, it will of course become more valuable when this company get this further aid from the Government of the United States. Capitalists in Canada, England, or anywhere else do not seek to buy a railroad charter unless they think there is money in it. They do not engage in such undertakings for the good of the country. Men do not build railroads out of regard for the welfare of the country. Capital does not seek investment upon the principle of benevolence. You cannot find any benevolence in a man's pocket. The pocket nerve is not a benevolent nerve. It does not vibrate to the touch of charity. The pocket nerve is a sensitive nerve. It is, too, a selfish nerve. Capital can only be tempted to make investment where it will be a benefit to the holder. These men who are lobbying here are not lobbying for the good of the country. I never knew a man to come to Washington and lobby for a bill of this kind on account of the interest which he took in the welfare of the great West, although he may have made that a pretense. We find men from New England exhibiting suddenly a marked interest in the welfare of the poor West, showing a great anxiety that the West should be benefited.

Mr. DAWES. Let me suggest to the gentleman that ever since I can remember New England men have been helping to build railroads in the West.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. But the gentleman will not tell me that New England men who have helped to build railroads in Illinois have done so for the sake of Illinois. Massachusetts capital has gone to Illinois and sought investment there for the sake of Massachusetts capital. I know that the people of New England are a great and benevolent people. I know that they are distinguished for their works of charity, which are numerous and frequent. I have great regard and great veneration for New England. I love it, not only because it is the home of my ancestors, but because its virtues entitle it to respect and reverence. But, sir, the moneyed men of New England are like moneyed men everywhere else; and when they invest money in a railroad project they do it because they think it will pay. They do not do it from benevolent motives. So, too, when the people of Canada, or any other place, offer their money for the purchase of a railroad charter, they do it because they think there is money in it. They do not in such matters act from motives of benevolence.

Sir, if the people of New England are so full of regard for the interests of the people of the West, I advise them to invest their capital rather in the construction of a canal which shall furnish transportation for some of our grain, relieving our plethoric and overburdened granaries. By such a work as that, millions of people would be benefited where only thousands would receive advantage from this Northern Pacific railroad.

Mr. DAWES. We propose to do both.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Well, sir, the Treasury is not just now in a condition to warrant us in trying to do everything; and as there is sometimes a choice of evils, so there is a choice of benefits. When we cannot do all at once the various works which commend themselves to our judgment by the good results expected from them, we must select that which will accomplish the greatest good, and do that first.

Why, Mr. Speaker, many people seem to suppose it is practicable and feasible for the Government to undertake to build three separate railroads to the Pacific ocean. The argument is made here, inasmuch as we have granted subsidies to the Central Pacific railroad, that therefore we should treat all others in like manner. I do not see the force of that argument. Whether it was right and proper or not to make the grant to the Central Pacific railroad does not affect the propriety of making this grant. If it were wrong to make the grant to the Central Pacific railroad that does not make it right to make a grant to the Northern Pacific railroad. If it were right to make the grant to the Central Pacific railroad it does not follow that therefore we should make a grant to any other.

In my judgment the country does not demand it, nor is it feasible or practicable at the present time to undertake the building of more than one road to the Pacific. I do not believe it is practicable or feasible to build a railroad four or five hundred miles through a country not inhabited. I do not believe you can ever build or run a road over a country for that distance where there are no inhabitants. As fast as the country becomes inhabited, as fast as it is peopled, then they may want a railroad. As fast as it is peopled the lands will come into market and become valuable. But to undertake at the present time to put roads through, to force them through in the short space of time contemplated by this act, is impracticable.

Nor do I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the commerce of the country at the present time demands more than one road. I think the Government had better with the $17,000,000 called for by this act dig a ship-canal across the Isthmus to connect the waters of the Atlantic with the Pacific. It certainly would be better to do that than to build a second road. Heavy freights will not go by land to the Pacific. Heavy freights will seek water communication. They will always be transported by water.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I understand that in the summer season there is to be water communication by this line across Lake Superior, and that in the winter season it is to be north of Lake Superior.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. There is to be water communication in the summer season only. It will be very much better to build a ship-canal across the Isthmus, for then you will have water communication all the year round for ships to sail from ocean to ocean.

Another reason why I think it is not necessary nor practicable to undertake the construction of another Pacific railroad at this time is this: it requires only three hundred miles of rail to make a complete line of water and rail communication from Salt Lake City to Portland in the State of Oregon. All you require is the construction of three hundred miles of railroad from Salt Lake to the head of navigation on the Columbia river. If it is necessary, therefore, that we shall have a railroad to Oregon and the waters of the Columbia river, it is much more feasible to build a branch road from Salt Lake City to Salt Lake, and then from the other end of Salt Lake extending through to connect with the head of navigation on the Columbia river. There you have a good country. Such a route passes through the Territory of Idaho, a rich, growing, and flourishing Territory. You get then from the main stem or the main trunk of the Central Pacific railroad two arms to the Pacific ocean, one to San Francisco and the other to Portland, Oregon.

But at the same time I think it is not practicable or feasible to undertake at this time to build more than one road to the Pacific. I repeat what I said before, I am in favor at the earliest practicable moment when the country demands it of building two, four, or ten railroads to the Pacific. I am willing to make a liberal grant of land to aid in the construction of those roads. But I am not willing to give my vote to render the Government liable to the extent of $69,000,000 in the present deranged financial condition of the country. I am not willing to put the Government under a liability of $69,000,000 for what I consider at the present time unnecessary.

This is aside from my objection to this bill, which is that it is a speculative measure. We were told by the chairman when he reported this bill two years ago that land and land alone would build this road; that this company only wanted land; that they would not call upon the Government for money.

We find that that company was organized; and we are told now, not by authority, but by what I suppose may be regarded as the authorized mouth-piece of the company here, by the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. WOODBRIDGE,] that that company has sold out their charter for what little money they had expended. But I have seen no official report of any moneys expended by this company. I have seen no report of any survey made by the company. I suppose it does take money to raise the wind, as it is called. I suppose money is expended in getting up companies, in getting their charters, in lobbying, in traveling over the country to procure the indorsement of Boards of Trade. If these are the expenditures to which the gentleman referred, to reimburse which they sold out this charter, I wish he would say so; but as for any other expenditure in the way of survey or the locating of the road or the commencement of work upon the road, we have certainly no knowledge of it.

They have not commenced the work. That is shown by the provision which they have inserted in this bill that the commencement of a survey in good faith shall be taken to be the commencement of the work within the meaning of the bill. The original bill provided that the charter should become void and that they should forfeit all right under it if they did not commence the work within two years. "Work"—it is generally understood what that means. To commence making the railroad—that is commencing the work. They come now to Congress and ask that we shall insert in their charter a provision that when they send out a surveyor in good faith to commence the survey that shall be considered a commencement of the work, although they may not break ground for years afterward.

Now, sir, I would like to know, I wish some gentleman would tell me, who is to be the judge as to when they commence this survey in good faith; who is to be the judge of the bona fides of this survey? Is it the President of the United States or the president of the company, or is it Congress? And if Congress is to judge of this, upon what evidence are we to base our judgment? The commencement of the survey in good faith? Why, I suppose, then, if they hire a surveyor and send him out to survey a mile of land on the supposed route, it is such a commencement of the survey of the road as is sufficient to save the charter.

Mr. HENDERSON. That would not be in good faith.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. My friend says that would not be in good faith. Sir, who is to judge whether it is or not? The surveyor goes on, and the company says it is in good faith. The surveyor produces his instruments and chains; you see they are surveying. Who is to judge of the good faith? Is my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] to judge of the survey?

Mr. DAWES. The American people are to judge.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. The great American people are to judge, says the gentleman from Massachusetts. Upon what evidence are they to pass their judgment? Here is a question of forfeiture. They shall forfeit their charter if they do not commence the work in good faith. They commence a survey, and whether it is in good faith or not nobody can tell but themselves.

Mr. DRIGGS. If the survey is never made and the work never commenced, of course there will be no obligation on the part of the Government to issue the bonds. I cannot see how that affects the question.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I see how it affects the question before us distinctly. I have not the slightest idea that this company propose to build this road. I suppose they come here to get this provision put into this bill in order to sell out their obligation in turn to some other company perhaps more greedy still than themselves. The question might have been asked two years ago, who will buy this? We find it is bought for $160,000, although no ground has been broken. Now, if this charter was worth $160,000 before a spade was put into the ground, before a mile of the road was located, what would it be worth after the Government assumes $70,000,000 of indebtedness to aid in its construction, and after we all know these other provisions are in the bill which will give them a still longer time to operate? Why, sir, it will be worth, as they say themselves, millions upon millions. I would rather have this franchise after this bill has passed for speculation than to have the property of William B. Astor or the gentleman from New York, [Mr. DODGE.] [Laughter.]

It is for this reason I do not believe there is any good faith in this company. At the same time I am not attacking the officers here, nor do I propose to do so. I believe many of them are good men, but they have been manipulated like these Boards of Trade and these men who have been going through the country.

Mr. HENDERSON. I would ask the gentleman if he did not in times past have a personal difficulty with Colonel Rowland.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I am not aware that if there were anything of that sort it would have anything to do with this bill; but I assure the gentleman that there is nothing of that kind. I simply know from personal observation that this man Rowland is a mere adventurer, and I state it upon my responsibility as a member of this House, and can prove it, either "here or elsewhere." [Laughter.] I use the words either in a "technical" or an untechnical sense. [Laughter.] I have only spoken of him because he has been the agent of this enterprise, and when they come to me through such unclean channels I am not going to vote for schemes of this kind. It makes me distrust the whole thing.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. I think I understood that there was security for the money advanced by the Government in the lands granted upon the southern side of the road. Now, I dispute that. I have examined the bill, and according to my understanding there is no security for the Government contained in it. The bill contains no limit upon the terms of sale of those lands, nor as to the character of the persons who may buy them, nor as to the rates at which they are to be sold. If they should be sold to individuals connected with the corporation, it would be a substantial compliance with the grant. But no man in business would accept such security.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I am glad my colleague has interrupted me for the purpose of making the observations which he has and calling my attention to the fact he has stated. Sir, it does strike me that this is the coolest and most impudent proposition that has ever been made to Congress. We granted this railroad company a strip of land forty miles wide in order to build the road, and now they come back and say, "If you will give us money instead of land with which to build it we will give you the security of one half of the land which you gave us," or rather, one half of the proceeds of the sale.

Well, now, it strikes me, as I think it must strike every member of the House, that it is a very cool and impudent proposition to make to the Government of the United States, that we shall take one half of the gift we made them as security for money necessary to build the road; for it amounts to the same thing. If we pay the interest on the stock, we build the road; we pay the stock itself, for money can always be procured upon interest; and if the Government will assume to pay six per cent. interest for twenty years on the money used in building the road, it might as well build the road at once, and much better. If the road is to be built in this way, is it not better that the Government itself, through its own agents, shall build, own, and control the road, rather than leave its benefits to an irresponsible company?

Mr. Speaker, I have occupied more time in discussing this question than I intended when I rose. Sir, I am a western man. I represent a large western constituency, engaged in agriculture and manufacturing pursuits. They are certainly as much interested in all the great lines of western communication as are the constituents of the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. WOODBRIDGE.] We are not here as western men to oppose the opening of communication to the Pacific coast by railroad; by no means. But we are here to defend the Treasury of the United States from these reckless assaults that are made upon it. I yield the residue of my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL.]

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. The time allotted to me is so short that it will be impossible for me to enter into any argument in reference to this bill. I shall therefore content myself with calling the attention of the House to one or two matters which, it seems to me, should command their consideration.

We have here a project of immense importance; and I wish to know of those gentlemen who mean to vote for this bill, where in the Constitution of the United States, from one end of it to the other, they find the power to spend money or to make appropriation of the money raised by taxation for such purposes as are here proposed.

Sir, the greatest latitudinarian constructionist of the Constitution can find no warrant in it for the expenditure of this $57,000,000 of the people's money. I am sure that any man who was educated in the school of strict construction will not for a moment entertain the thought of voting for this project. Sir, this is not within the terms of the powers granted to Congress by the Constitution, nor is it within the spirit of that grant.

Now, let me call the attention of the House to the question of the necessity and propriety of this measure, of this expenditure of money. This bill comes here at a most unfortunate time; at a time when our Treasury, as was so beautifully described by my colleague, [Mr. KELLEY,] is in a depleted and almost exhausted condition. He tells us that by adopting this measure we shall pour into the Treasury untold sums of money. Why, sir, he killed his argument with his own words. He admits that our Treasury is exhausted; and yet he is willing to allow these people to put their arms still deeper into the Treasury.

Now, I would not object so much to this measure if we were not so overwhelmingly in debt. But, as was so ably and so eloquently said on yesterday by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. DELANO,] our debt to-day will approach $4,000,000,000.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DONNELLY obtained the floor.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] will have five minutes more time given to him.

Mr. DONNELLY. I will yield five minutes of my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I am obliged to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DONNELLY] for his courtesy.

Now, I ask the majority of this House, I ask you gentlemen on the other side, who will be responsible for the passage of this bill, where you mean to stop in this expenditure of the money of the people. Where do you mean to halt in this system of expending the money taken from a people already overburdened by taxation?

This expenditure is not for any legitimate purpose. I have failed to hear any argument which would warrant such an expenditure at this time. We are told that we are to get something back. They coolly propose to mortgage to us one half of our own lands which we have heretofore given to this company to secure the payment of what we are called upon to guaranty. How flimsy a security! How bold an argument!

Moreover, we are told that twenty-five per cent. of the receipts of the road, during the twenty years for which we are asked to guaranty this money, is to be paid into the Treasury of the Government. Does not every business man, who has ever had any connection with railroad matters, know that no such profits will be realized? And when you come to ask plainly and pointedly this question of the friends of this project, whether they believe that any such profits will ever come from this road, they tell you that they hope they may. Sir, there is no such probability.

Now, sir, I am not a little surprised that my distinguished colleague, [Mr. KELLEY,] a gentleman from the very same city which I represent in part, should come here and deliver a beautiful essay upon this great subject. It reminded me very much of some sermons I have heard. They were beautiful in language; they were filled with flights of fancy; they contained many castles in the air, but when I went home and began to consider upon them, I found that I could not remember anything that was in them. Now, I have listened to the argument of my colleague; I have heard about his castles in the air, his railroads in fairy land with golden tracks, yet in his whole argument he did not present us with a single fact, nor did he advance any reason whatever in behalf of this work. Does he not know that he is trying to force upon the people of his district, as their share of this expenditure, the sum of about three hundred thousand dollars? Have his constituents asked him in any public manner to vote for this expenditure? So far as I know they have not. Surely no such instruction has been given to me.

I say again to the majority on this floor, where do you mean to stop in these nefarious schemes of public plunder? How soon will you realize that the people of this country are overburdened with taxation; that our debt is immense, reaching an amount which in no other country of the world would be so cheerfully paid? Recollect that we must not heap too much on an already overloaded people. We should go back to the strict economy of former days. Why, sir, in the earlier days of this Republic, such projects as this were never heard of, or, if proposed, were promptly frowned down. Let any man read the veto messages of Mr. Monroe and General Jackson, and he will see how those great men viewed such schemes as this.

I hope, sir, that the House will not pass this measure. I hope that, if it should not be laid upon the table, it will at least be referred to the Committee on Public Lands, so that we can have a report which will explain fully the effect of this bill, which will show us to what extent we are involving the Government in an expenditure of money. I hope that the Committee on Public Lands, if the bill should be referred to that committee, will give us a full and satisfactory report, which the Committee on the Pacific Railroad has failed to do.

The SPEAKER. The time allowed to the gentleman from Pennsylvania by the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. DONNELLY resumed the floor.

Mr. SMITH. Will the gentleman from Minnesota yield to me that I may offer an amendment?

Mr. DONNELLY. I prefer not to yield any further at this time.

Mr. Speaker, the bill now before the House is of so much consequence to the people of the entire nation, and more particularly to the States known as the northwestern States, and especially to the State which I have the honor in part to represent here, that I should consider myself false to my duty toward my constituents if I did not occupy a brief period of time in its advocacy.

The proposition contained in this bill is a very plain and very simple one. It is in effect that the United States shall indorse, for a limited period of time, a limited portion of the stock of this company. It is that the United States shall guaranty the stock of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company upon the gross amount of $57,000,000, or an average amount of about thirty-two thousand dollars per mile, for the period of twenty years. I hope it is distinctly understood in the House that this guarantee does not in any case extend beyond the period of twenty years, nor does it in any way extend to the principal of any part of the bonds of the company.

The whole question, then, for this House to determine is whether the United States Government will be safe in making such a guarantee, because it must be apparent to all that if the United States can build this great road, reaching from the head of Lake Superior to Puget sound, through a distance of eighteen hundred miles, and do it without incurring any loss to itself, it should by all means give the aid which is asked. This matter, then, resolves itself into the simple question, is the United States safe in taking such a step?

Now, we have had presented here by the opponents of this bill quotation after quotation from pamphlets and from speeches to show that the land grant already made to the company is of such enormous value that it alone ought to enable the company to build the road; that in any event it is of such great value that when the road shall have been constructed the land adjacent to it and already granted to the company will be equal in value to the total cost of the road itself.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if all these statements are true then this Government runs no risk whatever in giving the guarantee which is asked for, because the property of the company, when the road shall have been built, will be worth all that will have been expended upon it, and will therefore most assuredly be ample security for the interest upon a limited portion of the stock.

We were told yesterday by the gentleman from Ohio upon my left [Mr. SPALDING] that the land grant already made to this company is abundantly sufficient to build the road, and to prove it he read to us an extract from a letter of Hon. John Wilson, Third Auditor of the Treasury. I ask the Clerk to again read that extract.

The Clerk read as follows:

"I have not the figures, nor would I now be able to work them up if I had, but comparing this with the Illinois Central railroad grant, I think it a small estimate to say that if this grant is properly managed it will build the entire road, connecting with the present terminus of the Grand Trunk, through to Puget sound and head of navigation on the Columbia; fit out an entire fleet for the China, East India, and coasting trade of sailing vessels and steamers, and leave a surplus that will roll up to millions."

Mr. DONNELLY. From this testimony, quoted by those who are opposed to the bill, it appears that the land grant is not only sufficient to pay for this road but to equip a line of steamers besides for the China and East India trade, and leave a surplus of millions of dollars. In the presence of these facts, can these gentlemen say this country would not be safe in giving the guarantee asked for?

The bill further proposes to give twenty-five per cent. of the gross receipts of the road as security for the payment of the guaranteed interest. Now, as has already been stated, twenty-five per cent. is equal to that portion of the receipts out of which interest upon the capital stock of the company is paid.

Can it be doubted that the receipts of such a road would be enormous? With a vast and rapidly increasing population at both its extremities, great communities growing up along its whole line, and the trade of the Indies and China passing over it, who can doubt that its receipts would be enormous?

If you doubt this you doubt the future of the country and forget all the teachings of its past.

But it will be said, in answer, if all this is true, why not go and build the road with the land grant alone? I propose to address myself a few moments to that portion of the question.

The value of the land grant, Mr. Speaker, depends on the building of the road. That amount of land with the road built through it is worth every dollar of the estimate put upon it by Mr. Wilson. That land, without the road, is not worth to-day in New York city five cents per acre. You can go all through the western country, in the State of Michigan, in the State of Wisconsin, in the State of Missouri, and in other States of the West, and find millions of acres of land that have been offered time and time again for a shilling an acre without meeting with purchasers. Why is it? Because they are remote from those great works of internal improvement, the railroads, which are only second to nature's great rivers to the development of population. Take the experience of the West. Go back to the year 1856, and you will find land grants given about that time to the State of Michigan, to the State of Wisconsin, and to the State of Minnesota to build lines of railroad within a period of ten years; and yet in the last Congress we were called upon and besought to extend the time yet ten years further in which these roads should be completed. So that in these States, near to the great centers of population, twenty years have been considered essential to the construction of comparatively short lines of railroad by a land grant alone.

Mr. Speaker, if this were a trifling enterprise, if this was a road of fifty or one hundred miles through a comparatively settled country, we might with propriety be told that a land grant alone would build it. But recollect, sir, it is over eighteen hundred miles in length, reaching from the western terminus of the great water chain of lakes to the Pacific ocean, a road through a country unsafe, unsettled, unsurveyed, and almost undiscovered—in many parts a veritable terra incognita.

And yet we are told that this land grant which you could not to-day sell for five cents an acre in the eastern markets will build the road. It is impossible. The proposition is absurd.

Something has been said on this floor of the lobby influence of the Central Pacific railroad being exercised among members of this House adversely to this bill. I know not how that may be. I have no knowledge of the subject myself. I know when that road has asked at the hands of the country for additional aid the Northwest has been almost unanimous in its favor; and if there is to-day any party in the lobbies of this House representing that road, and trying to strike down a road running one thousand miles distant from it, then I say, sir, it cannot ask, and should not receive, a single additional favor at the hands of the American people.

Mr. HIGBY. Will the gentleman allow me to say a word?

Mr. DONNELLY. Certainly.

Mr. HIGBY. I have heard from two or three members that the Central Pacific railroad has been trying to get up an influence against this road. If there is anything of the kind the delegation particularly in interest in the Central Pacific railroad is not aware of it. I know that no member of that company has been near me since this bill has been under discussion, and I leave it to the other members of the delegation from California whether they have seen any member of that company in reference to this subject. I think they would first go to the members living in the vicinity and most interested, and not to other members of the House.

Mr. SPALDING. I ask the gentleman to yield to me.

Mr. DONNELLY. With pleasure.

Mr. SPALDING. Mr. Speaker, I have taken somewhat of an active part in opposition to this bill, and I repel the insinuation that any railroad agent has had influence with me or approached me at any time. I challenge proof that any agent of any company has come here to engender opposition to this bill.

Mr. DONNELLY. I do not state it as a fact. I alluded to the statement made yesterday on this floor that such an influence was at work here.

It was very far from my intention to insinuate that the honorable member from California and the honorable member from Ohio, for both of whom I have the highest respect, have been influenced or had any such influence brought to bear upon them. But I do say, sir, that if the statements we have heard are true, and if any such influence has been brought to bear upon this House, it shows a most narrow, base, and illiberal spirit on the part of that Central Pacific road.

We complain, sir, of the monopoly of the Camden and Amboy Railroad Company which seeks to grasp the exclusive jurisdiction of the State of New Jersey. But, sir, this thing dwindles into insignificance compared with the monopoly which would absorb a continent, and which will not endure a brother within a thousand miles of its throne.

For what have we done for that road? Yes, what have we of the Northwest aided to give them? We have virtually donated them $90,000,000 of bonds of the United States. Not, sir, be it observed, a guarantee of interest alone for twenty years, but a liability incurred by the Government for both principal and interest upon that amount. Nay, more, we have released their road from one half the mortgage given to secure the United States; so that if the United States Government would protect itself, in the case of the Central Pacific railroad by foreclosing upon the mortgage which it holds, it must first pay off that other $90,000,000, making in all $180,000,000 of principal that the road has in effect received from us, besides all the accumulated interest on the bonds, not for twenty years, but until the maturity and payment of the same. Why, sir, in sixteen years the interest on those bonds will be equal to the principal; so that of principal and interest we shall have incurred in twenty years a liability in behalf of the Central Pacific railroad equal to $450,000,000; and yet gentlemen are appalled when we ask for $56,000,000, distributed during a period of twenty years, with which to accomplish all that which $450,000,000 is required to accomplish in another latitude.

Why, sir, if it is true that $56,000,000 of guaranteed interest will build this road, when $450,000,000 are required to build the Central Pacific railroad, which now drags its slow length along, then I say, sir, it is the plainest of all possible proofs that this is the true route for the construction of a Pacific railroad.

Another objection made to this bill is, that it should have been referred to the Committee on Public Lands. I have the honor to be a member of both the Committee on the Pacific Railroad and the Committee on Public Lands, and I can say, with no feeling of preference for either of those committees, that it would be grossly unjust to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad to send this bill to the Committee on Public Lands. If this bill is not such a one as should properly go before the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, then that committee has no functions and should be at once abolished; because it is, as its name implies, a Committee on the Pacific Railroad, and if this proposition for the construction of a Pacific railroad is not legitimate business for that committee then it has none. So much for that argument.

Now, Mr. Speaker, a few words as to the illiberal character of the arguments that have been urged here. I am sorry to see distinguished gentlemen for whose ability I have the highest respect protesting against this measure. I regret to see distinguished gentlemen from the great State of Ohio opposing this bill. It is but sixty-five years since emigration began to cross the western boundary line of Pennsylvania. Ohio was then a howling wilderness. The adventurous pioneers who then floated down the Ohio river upon rafts and boats, with their household goods around them, ran the gauntlet of the ambushed savages along its banks. Since that time what a magnificent prospect has been unfolded to the gaze of the world. Then a desolate wilderness, the State of Ohio and the States directly west of it now contain a population of ten million human beings, being one third of the entire population of the United States. Sir, with such wonders wrought in the space of a little more than half a century, I am surprised that gentlemen from the State of Ohio or from any of the western States can stand here and take such narrow and illiberal views.

We have just listened to a speech from the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] against this bill. Let me call his attention to some statistics in reference to his own State. About the year 1836—I think that was the precise year—the United States made an innovation upon its former customs as great as that we now seek to make, by granting a large body of public lands to assist in building the Illinois Central railroad through the heart of that State. Those who have read the history of Illinois, written by one of its former Governors, know very well the condition of things before that road was commenced, and from which it lifted her up: the poverty of the people, the depressed condition of agriculture, the small value of the products of the soil, the trifling reward for human labor, and the slow increase of population. Turn to the census of 1830, and you will find that the population of Illinois was but 157,000. In the year 1860, thirty years later, the population had risen to 1,711,950. Now, mark the contrast. In twenty years before the Illinois Central railroad was built the total growth of the State of Illinois was 145,000. In thirty years subsequent to that year, the growth was 1,554,000.

Why, sir, the taxable property of the State of Illinois is equal to $1,000,000,000, or one third the entire debt of the United States. The State of Illinois paid in direct tax in 1861 for the support of the Federal Government the sum of $1,146,000.

Sir, I am amazed that gentlemen who come from the very soil of those States, so blessed by these great works of internal improvement, and with all their marvelous results pressing themselves directly upon their sight, can raise their voices against this measure. It is against reason. Why, sir, if such an illiberal spirit had possessed the men of 1836, Illinois would to-day have scarcely passed the era of coonskin currency, and wheat at ten cents per bushel; and we should have lost that mighty Commonwealth, with nearly two million population, which has given us a Lincoln and a Grant.

Why, sir, we ask aid to build only eighteen hundred miles of railroad, while in the State of Illinois to-day there are three thousand miles of railroad, all springing from the impulse given to such works by that magnificent enterprise, the Illinois Central railroad.

Look, sir, at the effect this measure will have upon the future of the country through which the road is to pass. In 1860, the total population of that country, including the States and the Territories, was 240,127. In 1865, five years after, it had increased to 550,000. Why, sir, in my own State we have increased in population in spite of the war—war with the savages and war with the rebels—in the face of all obstacles, we have increased from about 170,000 to 300,000; and we, who in 1858 bought our breadstuffs from Illinois, produced last year between eight and ten million bushels wheat. And, sir, may we not look for similar effects along this great line of railroad? I have made a calculation in reference to one of its effects. There have been granted to this company, in the Territories through which the road will pass, forty sections of land per mile, being twenty sections on each side of the road. Be it remembered that the Government retains the alternate sections; so that there are open for settlement forty sections to the mile along the road. Now, does any one doubt that if the road is built that country will settle rapidly? There are four quarter sections, or four farms of one hundred and sixty acres each to each section, and taking the estimate, which holds good throughout the country, of six persons to every head of a family or voter, and we shall have one thousand persons to the mile, or for the whole length of eighteen hundred miles, 1,800,000 persons, and this irrespective of the population of towns and cities and rivers and branch roads tributary to the main road. But if in five years that country has doubled its population without this road, what will its population be when you infuse into it the life that will flow from such an enterprise as this?

Sir, it will quadruple, it will quintuple; it is within bounds to say that in twenty years there will be eight million people along the line of the road. And if they contribute as liberally, as gallantly, as heroically to the defense of this great nation with men and money and intellect as the noble State of Illinois has done, the country will have wisely invested the paltry amount asked for, even though it should lose every dollar of it.

Why, sir, look at the immigration from Europe, which is greater this spring than it has ever been before. This very company are already making contracts, in anticipation of the passage of this bill, with steamship lines to bring to our shores thousands of hardy laborers to help to build this road. Few, if any of them, will return to Europe. They will settle down along the line of this road, and become the nucleus of a new population, the foundation of new Commonwealths.

Why, sir, the London Times complained the other day that the skilled artisans of England, its most valuable workers, are leaving its shores in unparalleled numbers in search of plenty and liberty in the United States. The immigration which has already arrived this spring far exceeds that of any previous year, and we learn that the harbors of England and Ireland are crowded with hundreds of thousands waiting for vessels to carry them to our shores. Sir, war is imminent in Germany, and thousands upon thousands of the thrifty and intelligent people of that country will seek our shores. We do not want them to cluster in our cities. We want to be able to point out to them those great natural savannahs along the Missouri, the Yellowstone, the Columbia, and the Saskatchewan, where they may find all the conditions for prosperity and happiness. From northern Europe, too, a population hardy, industrious, and temperate, the Norwegians and Swedes, the identical stock which overran Europe and overwhelmed the Roman empire and gave shape and feature to the new civilization which was built upon its ruins; these races are seeking our shores in large and steadily increasing numbers.

And now, sir, I ask the Clerk to read the last speech ever made upon earth by our martyred President, Abraham Lincoln; a speech made, sir, upon the very day, ay, sir, upon the very night on which he fell before the bullet of the assassin; a speech made to you, Mr. Speaker, at your last parting with him as you were about to start upon your journey to the Pacific. I want it read by the Clerk and received by this House as the last utterance of that great and good man, and as an indication of the view his liberal intelligence would take to-day, were he alive, of this and all kindred measures.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Mr. COLFAX, I want you to take a message from me to the miners whom you visit. I have very large ideas of the mineral wealth of our nation. I believe it practically inexhaustible. It abounds all over the western country, from the Rocky mountains to the Pacific, and its development has scarcely commenced. During the war, when we were adding a couple of millions of dollars every day to our national debt, I did not care about encouraging the increase in the volume of our precious metals. We had the country to save first. But now that the rebellion is overthrown, and we know pretty nearly the amount of our national debt, the more gold and silver we mine we make the payment of that debt so much the easier. Now," said he, speaking with more emphasis, "I am going to encourage that in every possible way. We shall have hundreds of thousands of disbanded soldiers, and many have feared that their return home in such great numbers might paralyze industry by furnishing suddenly a greater supply of labor than there will be demand for. I am going to try to attract them to the hidden wealth of our mountain ranges, where there is room enough for all. Immigration, which even the war has not stopped, will land upon our shores hundreds of thousands more per year from overcrowded Europe. I intend to point them to the gold and silver that wait for them in the West. Tell the miners for me that I shall promote their interests to the utmost of my ability, because their prosperity is the prosperity of the nation; and," said he, his eye kindling with enthusiasm, "we shall prove in a very few years that we are indeed the treasury of the world."

AMENDMENT OF TERRITORIAL ACTS.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Will the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DONNELLY] yield to me for a moment, as I must soon leave the Hall on account of indisposition?

Mr. DONNELLY. Certainly; with pleasure.

Mr. ASHLEY. I am instructed by the Committee on Territories to report back House bill No. 508, to amend the organic acts of the Territories of Nebraska, Colorado, Montana, Washington, Idaho, Arizona, Utah, and New Mexico, and ask that the same be printed and recommitted.

No objection was made.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was re-committed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a House joint resolution of the following titles when the Speaker signed the same:

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 67) providing for the reappraisement of the lands described in an act for the relief of William Sawyer and others, of Ohio.

NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD—AGAIN.

Mr. DONNELLY. There is one other objection that has been urged with peculiar force and eloquence by the distinguished gentleman from Ohio on my right, [Mr. DELANO.] The objection was that we had no right to do this thing, because we would thereby impair the credit of the United States. Now, let me call the attention of the House to the fact that this payment of money is only to be stretched through a period of twenty years; that the liability ends at the expiration of twenty years; that none of it can be paid save only as the road is constructed; and that the whole of it is not to be paid until after the road is entirely completed. If there is any man who can prove to me that the building of this mighty road of eighteen hundred miles in length, the transportation over it of the commerce of China, Japan, and the Indies, the growth of popular States along its line, and the general prosperity it will infuse into the entire nation will impair the credit of our Government bonds, then indeed, sir, I have read the history of our country to little advantage.

Why, sir, the total product of the mines in the Territories along the line of this road was, during the last year, $35,000,000. Build this road and it will be $350,000,000. Why, sir, the discovery of gold in California and the production of $800,000,000 from its mines saved our people from bankruptcy and has affected the commerce and the prosperity of the whole world. Build this road, give facility of access, and you set to work hundreds of thousands of miners with abundance of machinery, and who can calculate the production of the precious metals that will follow?

I remember when, in the last Congress, we were in almost the darkest hour of our great struggle, when it seemed as if the bark of the nation would go down amid the storm, an honorable and gallant gentleman from the city of New York, sent here by the votes of the Opposition, (Mr. Stebbins,) arose in his place, and in an able speech demonstrated that the resources of the country were equal to the debt it was contracting; and I do not forget that his strongest argument was based upon the history of our growth in the past and the certainty of our continued growth in the future.

Our credit rests not alone upon what we are, but what we are certain to be. Why, sir, if we double the population of this country, we reduce our debt one half. Are we to sit here and, following the niggardly, miserly policy which some gentlemen seem to favor, permit a great wilderness to remain a wilderness for half a century longer, or shall we encourage that tide of emigration which is now breaking all bounds in the Old World and flowing to our shores with an unparalleled abundance?

Sir, I am sorry to see the course taken by the opponents of the bill. We have heard little of real argument. One gentleman has told you that there is no report here, and that we do not know who are the corporators. Sir, that is a matter of no moment. This money cannot be drawn until the road shall be built; and it is of no consequence whatever who builds it. The object is the road, not the corporators. Give us a road, and we care not who owns it, provided only that with a proper national foresight we so guard the enterprise that it shall not pass out of the hands of our own citizens; and for one, I shall cheerfully vote for an amendment to require that two thirds, three fourths, or, if you please, all of the corporators shall be American citizens. That is all that we need ask. We shall not be called upon to pay the money unless the road is built; and if we secure the construction of the road, no gentleman can deny that the money has been well invested.

Why, sir, the hand of nature itself points out the route of this road as the natural highway of the continent. Starting from the mouth of the St. Lawrence and proceeding westward in almost an air line, you pass over the surface of the great lakes, the mightiest system of freshwater navigation in the world. Passing across seven hundred miles from the head of Lake Superior, you strike the Missouri river; and from the head of navigation on that river the distance is but three hundred miles to the head of navigation on the Columbia river. So that, when this company shall have built three hundred miles of road, we shall have built three hundred miles of road we shall have secured the means of steam communication between the Atlantic and the Pacific by way of the Missouri; and for this the Government risks $750,000 annually. And, building seven hundred miles further to the head of Lake Superior, and we have, with a road of one thousand miles, a very large share of all the results to be derived from a Pacific railroad.

Why, sir, we were told by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. DELANO,] at the very moment that he was fighting this bill, that we must prepare our backs to assume the mighty load of $2,000,000,000—an amount two thirds as great as our total national debt—yet to be paid to the people of the reconstructed South for the sufferings and losses caused by a war created by themselves. And yet not a farthing is to be expended for the benefit of the great loyal Northwest, which has put forth every exertion to save the Government. Sir, it is our right to demand this measure. It is for us not only a right, but a necessity. This road cannot be built without some such measure to assist it, and the people of the Northwest are entitled to it at the hands of the General Government. The road must be built. If gentlemen are so liberal in their expectations of paying thousands of millions hereafter to the people of the South, certainly they can risk $50,000,000 upon good security to unite the great lakes with the Pacific ocean.

Mr. Speaker, I now yield five minutes of my time to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Dodge.]

Mr. DODGE. Mr. Speaker, I propose to examine this question for a very few moments as a business man and with reference to its influence upon the business of the country and the interest which the Government has in the completion of this road.

I presume, sir, that when the Congress of 1864 granted the charter for the construction of this road it was in view of the fact that the completion of the road was calculated to advance the interests of the country. At that time a bargain was made, such as railroad men often make with sections of the country that need the completion of railroads. Those who have been familiar with the construction of railroads know how often, for the sake of securing the building of a single spur or branch through an unimproved and undeveloped portion of the country, those who own the land are ready to come forward and offer to the railroad company one half, or any fair proportion of the land which they own, and which is entirely unmarketable, if the company will build a railroad which will give value to the land.

In this case the Government not only had unproductive land which it was desirous of rendering productive, but it had other objects. It looked to the vast population settling on the Pacific coast. It looked to Oregon, a thousand miles north of San Francisco. It looked to the vast mineral resources of the country, which this road would open to development and settlement. Looking at all this, a bargain was made, which, for the Government, would have been a good bargain if those with whom the bargain was made had had the ability to carry it out.

They came for this charter under the full expectation, probably, that obtaining a charter with such liberal grants of land they would be able to find capitalists with the necessary money to build the road. The moment they presented the charter to men of capital, from whom they must have the money, they saw at once there was to be an expenditure of from twenty to thirty million dollars before this land could be made available. The consequence was, when they went to capitalists here and elsewhere, they failed to find those who were willing to take this immense grant of land, this wild and mountainous land—land, as the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DONNELLY] has truly said, entirely unavailable, and which could not be sold to any capitalists in the world for five cents an acre.

They failed to find the capital, but they did not fail to find those who, if they could control this charter, would be glad to make it accessory to great works through the British North American Provinces. They found British capital could be obtained to build this road.

I will say to the House that I have not been interested to the extent of one dollar in the Northern or Central Pacific railroad; but when I found, a few weeks ago, a gentleman with whom I have been acquainted for years, and whom I have looked upon as the best railroad man in the country; when I found that he and his associates, some of the best railroad men in New England; men whose management have made them what they are; men well known in the moneyed circles of New York and New England—when, I say, a few months ago there was danger that this franchise would fall into the hands of British capitalists, these men met in Boston and looked over the charter; and they decided that something should be done to prevent this charter falling into the hands of British capitalists. They decided they would take this charter from these parties and pay the honorable expenses which had been contracted in preliminary surveys and such other incidental expenses, which every one who has had anything to do with railroads is aware enter into every such arrangement.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's five minutes have expired.

Mr. DONNELLY. I have agreed to yield five minutes of my time to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut. I do not propose to detain the House with any extended remarks.

Mr. CONKLING. My colleague would like to continue his remarks, and I hope the gentleman from Connecticut will yield to him for that purpose.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut. The gentleman can continue his remarks after I have closed.

Mr. CONKLING. That will interrupt his remarks, and I hope he will be permitted to finish them at this time.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut. I yield for that purpose, with the understanding that I shall have the floor when he is through.

Mr. DODGE. I do not ask for more than five minutes.

Mr. Speaker, I will come directly to the point which I had in view when I rose. I believe the interests of the country demand not only the completion of the Central but the completion of the Northern Pacific railroad. I differ entirely with the remarks of some gentlemen here that the demand upon the Government on the part of the Northern Pacific railroad will shake the credit of the country. I have no hesitation in saying that the aid granted by the American Congress to the Central Pacific railroad has done as much as any other thing to give credit, substantial credit, to Government issues both in our own country and in Europe. Why? They know well there is in the center of this continent an immense deposit of the precious metals, and they know if we build this railroad that instead of producing as we have done in the last ten years $1,000,000,000, forty years to come we will produce $2,000,000,000, and will have the precious metals as the basis not only for the circulation of our own country but to pay the bonds not only in this country but in Europe. I believe if it were known today that by some magic the Central Pacific railroad and the Northern Pacific railroad could both be completed in a couple of years and the Government had to pay $100,000,000 for it, it would strengthen rather than diminish the credit of the country.

These gentlemen that have now taken hold of this thing expect to put their hands in their own pockets down to the elbow and bring out the money that will build this road. They will complete the first twenty-five miles before they ask for the guarantee of a dollar. And when that is done, $750,000 to $1,000,000 more. They do not expect simply to spend the money they receive here, and they cannot think of going forward to build the road, relying for their pay upon the proceeds of the sale of lands until the road itself shall be remunerative.

Sir, I believe that the country generally and I believe that members of this Congress honestly feel that this road ought to be built. I know the men in whose hands the enterprise is. They are some of the best railroad men of the country, and it is not for speculation that they have embarked in it. They are just the men that the United States Government can trust to commence it and carry it on to completion.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut. I desire to say a word or two on the question now before the House, and if I take a wrong view of it, I hope the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. PRICE,] who reported the bill, will be able to convince me of my error, as his arguments are always candid, clear, and strong.

I am in favor of the construction of the road, warmly in favor of it, and for all the reasons stated by my eloquent friend from Minnesota, [Mr. DONNELLY.] But for the present I am opposed to it. And that the grounds of my opposition may be clearly understood, I will state them.

I deny that Congress has the right or the power to bind the Government as an indorser of a private contract. That is my first objection. We have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, between the States, and with the Indian tribes, the power to establish post offices and post roads; but this is a private enterprise, as I understand it, and I cannot think that there are any lawyers in this House who have given attention to the subject who will venture to give an opinion that the power to regulate commerce and establish post offices and post roads confers upon Congress the authority to bring the Government in as a guarantor of a private enterprise.

This, then, is my first objection to the bill. I wish I could see my way clear to vote for it, for I am in favor, as I said before, of the construction of this road as warmly as any man can be.

Then I have another objection to the bill. It was not my good fortune to listen to the debate upon this subject yesterday. Perhaps if I had been here my doubts would have been swept away. But, sir, this bill involves an appropriation ultimately. It cannot be questioned that if the Government becomes a guarantor and loses by the failure of the company, then an appropriation must be made, and that, too, without its being considered in Committee of the Whole. It will be necessary for some future Congress to make an appropriation to save the credit and the honor of the nation. So that in this way we are forestalling the action of this House as in Committee of the Whole. I object to our taking action now which will compel some future Congress to make an appropriation to save the credit and the honor of the nation.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DONNELLY] has two minutes of his time left.

Mr. DONNELLY. I yield it to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. SMITH.]

Mr. SMITH. I offer the following amendment—

The SPEAKER. It can only be done by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WENTWORTH] withdrawing his motion to refer.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I do not propose to withdraw it, but I propose to offer the amendment myself, in order that the gentleman may get it in.

Mr. SMITH. How do you know you will approve it?

Mr. WENTWORTH. I do not care what it is; if gentlemen want to offer their amendments, I want to let them, so that they may all go to the Committee on Public Lands.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will have to withdraw the motion to commit and offer the amendment himself.

Mr. WENTWORTH. Can I offer it, and then renew the motion?

The SPEAKER. Yes, sir.

Mr. WENTWORTH. Then I will do it by unanimous consent. [Laughter.]

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

At the end of the second section insert the following proviso:

Provided, That the land on the south side of the said railroad, the proceeds of which are also to be pledged to the payment of the interest guaranteed by the Government, shall not be sold except on terms to be agreed to by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. SMITH. I now propose to say what I desire to say.

The SPEAKER. The time yielded to the gentleman has expired. [Laughter.]

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, obtained the floor.

Mr. SMITH. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will yield me ten minutes of his time.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I will yield the gentleman the residue of the evening if the House will agree to adjourn after he gets through.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I hope the previous question will not be seconded to-night. A great many members have gone home, not expecting a vote.

The SPEAKER. How much time does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I cannot yield to him at all unless it be the understanding that the House shall adjourn when he concludes. With that understanding I am willing to yield to him indefinitely.

Mr. SPALDING. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield me the floor to allow me to make a motion to lay this bill upon the table?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. No, sir; I cannot yield the floor for that purpose now. I will proceed with the few remarks I have to make.

I know, Mr. Speaker, the disadvantages under which I undertake to address the House at this late hour of the session, fatigued as it must be by the speeches which have already been made upon this question; but I would not dare to return to my home and face the incorruptible, honest, and patriotic constituency that have so long honored me with their support and confidence if I did not oppose, not only by my vote, but by my voice, feeble and unimportant though it is, this last, greatest, and most gigantic scheme which has ever been brought into the House of Representatives of the United States.

Sir, we had a night session the other night. We did not come here to inaugurate some legislation by which we might relieve our tax-ridden and overburdened constituents. We did not come here for the purpose of considering any bill to reduce their oppressive taxes. But we gathered here, with unwonted alacrity, to vote sixty-nine millions of the people's money out of the public Treasury to a private railroad corporation. And, sir, I consider it a species of good luck that this scheme, so well lobbied and so well planned, was not put through, as it was intended to have been put through, on that night under the screws of the previous question, without any chance being afforded to discuss and expose its enormities.

Sir, I have some little knowledge of the history of this legislation in regard to these railroad matters. I recollect how the supplemental Pacific railroad bill was put through the last Congress. And I desire gentlemen here, who were sent here by their constituents to protect their interests, and who intend to vote for this bill, to look for themselves and see what obligations have already been fastened upon the country in regard to these railroads.

In the first instance, the Pacific railroad bill contained an enormous grant of land from the Missouri river to the Pacific coast; and that grant was made upon the ground that the Central Pacific railroad could be built under it. And yet, at the last session of Congress we passed a supplemental bill doing what? Why, incurring an obligation of $95,000,000, granting more land in addition to all the land that had been voted theretofore; and further than that, as you will see if you look at the bill, subordinating all our securities to these securities of the railroad company. That bill was passed at a night session, too; and so great was its popularity that we could not even obtain a vote upon it by yeas and nays.

More than that, sir, that Central Pacific Railroad Company, in addition to these grants, has come here this session and demanded of us something like sixty thousand dollars more, I believe, to pay expenses which it is bound to pay itself. Look to the record to see who voted for or against that Pacific railroad bill, but you will find no vote by yeas and nays; and I can find but few gentlemen here who were members of the last Congress, in view of what is already seen and known in regard to the actions of that company, who are willing to concede that they were for the bill. I know I put myself on the record against it, and by that record I stand to-day. The ground upon which it was urged that we should pass that bill was this: that we must have a Pacific railroad; one Pacific railroad. I was willing to admit that. I was willing to do everything which it was proper for a Representative of the American people to do to secure such an object; but I was unwilling to vote for the extravagant bill proposed. But the cry for the road, without regard to the means, overbore every consideration, and the bill passed.

What then happened? So great a success had been achieved in the passage of that bill, that a short time afterward my distinguished friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] brought in another bill from the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, for the construction of the "Northern Pacific railroad." And I recollect well the discussion upon that bill. As it was stated it was an enormous bill; giving a breadth of twenty miles of the public lands on the line of the road in the States, and forty miles of the public lands in all the Territories through which it was proposed the road should pass; granting for the construction of the road a number of acres running up to untold millions; indeed, so great that you can scarcely state it.

And what were the arguments that were used when this bill was brought forward? It took the House by surprise, as I well recollect. But the gentleman from Pennsylvania, with that ability and ingenuity and influence which he so justly exercises, convinced the House that it would be proper to pass the bill for the reason that such a road might be built and that the grant of land that we made was sufficient to build it. And what did my friend from Pennsylvania tell the House in that respect? I beg leave to call his attention to an extract I will read from his speech on that occasion. He said:

"But I have looked a little into this matter, in the fulfillment of my duties as chairman of this committee, and I satisfied myself, first, that these men would build the road without a dollar of subsidy from the Government. I do not call the grant of this land giving away anything."

Notwithstanding all this, when we came to vote upon the bill, the House voted it down by a vote of 55 to 66; and the bill was lost. But afterward my distinguished friend brought in another bill, and under the pressure of the previous question—the proceedings occupying but little more than a column in the Congressional Globe, I think—the bill was finally passed. But that was not done without the House being satisfied, not only by what was said by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, but by what was put into the bill. In reply to the argument that this company, as the Central Pacific Railroad Company has done, would come here and demand some more aid from the Government, he incorporated into the very text of the bill that "no money shall be drawn from the Treasury of the United States to aid in the construction of the Northern Pacific railroad." That was considered a sweetener; that was a pledge to the country by Congress, and a pledge by the company to Congress, that this road would never come here to get anything more from the Government.

Now, how is the fact? By the nineteenth section of that bill there were certain things to be done in two years from the 2d of July, 1864, in order to save the charter; yet since the 2d of July, 1864, now nearly two years, these parties have never, so far as it appears, struck a spade into the ground along the whole line of this proposed road, have never done a day's work on the road, or made any preparation whatever—in fact, have done nothing at all toward commencing the work. Now, I call upon the American people to take notice of what is going on here. These parties come here under these circumstances and demand of us to guaranty the interest upon $57,000,000 for twenty years, amounting to the sum of $69,000,000, which the Government is to assume; and I want also to call the attention of members to the bill itself. I want them to examine its provisions and to discover for themselves its extraordinary provisions. I know something about the manner in which these things are got up, these bills for railroad companies, and for other companies and corporations. It is not what the Government shall exact from the companies, but what the companies will exact from the Government. They make their bills and present them to us and we are to pass them. Now, I ask my distinguished friend from Iowa [Mr. PRICE] to give me his attention while I consider the second section of this bill.

There is a portion of the second section to which I desire to call the attention of members of the House, and particularly my friend from Iowa, [Mr. PRICE.] A great deal has been said to prove that eventually the Government will not be called upon to meet any part of the liability which it is to assume; that ultimately everything will be paid by this company. Now, sir, there is one thing that we know. We know the extent of the obligation which we are to assume; that is certain. Everything else must, of course, be uncertain, so far as reimbursement is concerned. But I ask, where in this bill is there any binding provision upon the part of the company by which the Government shall be certain to receive anything? The obligations are not mutual and dependent; they are all on one side. When this company shall have built a certain amount of the road, then the obligation becomes complete that the Government shall guaranty this stock to a given amount. Then, what does the Government get—I ask the chairman of the committee—what is the absolute certainty that the Government will get anything in return for this?

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker—
Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Let the gentleman reply in his closing argument. I ask, where is the security that this company will ever pay one dollar into the Treasury of the United States?

Mr. PRICE. I would like to answer that question now.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. No, sir; the gentleman can answer me hereafter. He will have the privilege of closing this debate.

Now, sir, I want gentlemen to look at the nature of what is called the "security" which this company offers. What is the security, I again demand? Does the Government retain its title to the lands? No, because in the original charter it is stipulated that the company shall receive patents for the lands when they shall have finished a certain number of miles of the road. As soon as that is done, the company gets the absolute title to the lands, and the Government has no further control over it.

Now, sir, what does this bill propose that the company shall do? The second section contains the following provision:

And for the further security of the Government for the pledge of the payment of interest as aforesaid, over and above the deposit of twenty-five per cent. of the gross receipts, as above provided, the proceeds of the sales of all the lands granted by the charter of the said company, situated on the southerly side of the line of said railroad, shall, as often as the sales of the same shall be made, be held as security for the payment of the interest so paid by the Government as aforesaid, and shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States by the treasurer of said company on the 1st days of April and October in each and every year, to be applied by the Secretary of the Treasury to reimburse the Government for any moneys paid for interest as aforesaid, and also as security for the future payment by the Government of any interest accruing under said pledge, until the Government shall be fully reimbursed for the payment of the interest as aforesaid; and to secure the payment of said percentage of the gross receipts, and the deposit of the proceeds of the sales of the public land as before provided, the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, whenever in his judgment it shall be necessary for the safety of the Government to do so, is hereby empowered to appoint an inspector, who shall have authority to examine the books and accounts of the company, and to direct the application of the said percentage of the gross receipts and the deposit of the said proceeds of the sales of the public lands as aforesaid.

I ask gentlemen again and again, and in all earnestness and in entire good faith, where is the security which the Government gets? By the terms of the charter the company, as I have stated, when it shall have constructed twenty-five miles of road, receives a patent for the lands, and under this bill the company will have at the same time the interest paid on their stock. That is what the company receives, and the Government has no authority, no power to get a single dime from the company. I ask my friend from Iowa, who in his own private business as a banker is so vigilant in regard to his securities, where is the security which he, as a Representative of his constituents, has demanded from this corporation for the faithful performance of any obligation? The appointment of an "inspector" which is provided to examine the books and accounts of the company is simply a farce. If this bill be passed we are at the mercy of this corporation, and utterly powerless in their hands.

Mr. SMITH. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. For what purpose?

Mr. SMITH. That I may ask him a question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Very well.

Mr. SMITH. It is provided, as I understand, that this land shall not inure to the benefit of the company until after a certain number of miles of road are completed. The Secretary of the Treasury is directed to take control of this matter, and the treasurer of the company is required to pay the proceeds into the Treasury of the United States in April and October of each year. Now, I ask whether the road itself is not bound to the Government for that amount of money.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. No, sir; there is nothing in the existing law and nothing in this bill which furnishes this Government any security of the kind. Yet it was proposed that this section, monstrous as it is, should be put through in this bill.

Now, let gentlemen look a little further. I ask them to look at the third section of the bill.

Mr. SMITH. I call the gentleman's attention to the twenty-seventh line in the second section where there is a provision to reimburse the Government for any moneys paid for interest, and also security for the future payment by the Government of any interest accruing under this pledge until the Government shall be fully reimbursed for the payment of the interest.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. What security does the gentleman mean? There is no mortgage on the road. These parties get their title to the land after they have built twenty-five miles of the road. They get the guarantee of their stock. You have no power of interference and no power reserved to make them do anything.

Let us look a little further, at the third section, which I denounce in behalf of the people of the Territories through which this road is to pass. I will read it:

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the patents for or lists of lands granted to this company shall convey the fee-simple of said lands to said company in the most full and complete manner, and that none of the lands granted to said company shall be subject to any general or local tax, for any purpose whatever, till after two years from date of said conveyance.

Here, sir, we take a strip of land forty miles wide through these Territories and give every alternate section to this railroad company, we permit them to hold this land indefinitely, for that I undertake to say is the effect, if not the object of this section, free from taxation. Two years after conveyance! It is to prevent the lands being taxed in these new Territories in order to support their governments. I undertake to say that under this bill these lands could be held without being taxed for an indefinite time. If the conveyances are not made the lands could not be taxed, for it is provided that none of the lands granted to this company shall be subject to any general or local tax for any purpose whatever till after two years from the date of the conveyance.

Mr. STEVENS. Do they not become subject to taxation after the Government conveys them?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. No, sir. "On none of the lands granted to said company." What does that mean? "None of the land, granted to said company shall be subject to any general or local tax for any purpose whatever." I say there can be no doubt as to the meaning and intention of the act. For one I protest against it in the name of the people of these Territories, against this injustice. The people should have the right to tax all the lands to support their government, maintain their schools, build their public buildings, roads, &c.

Mr. STEVENS. When the gentleman undertakes to say that under this bill this company may hold these lands indefinitely free from taxation he is mistaken. That is not the reading of the bill.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. My friend from Pennsylvania says that it is not the reading of the bill. Let gentlemen read for themselves, and determine the question between him and myself. I say, in my judgment, nothing can be plainer than that.

Now, let us go a little further. I come next to the fifth section, because I am criticising the bill. It has already been alluded to by my colleague [Mr. WENTWORTH] and others, and it will be necessary for me only to say a word. These parties to whom this munificent grant was made, according to their own showing a grant of land of vast value, vastly more than enough to build the road, were to commence their work under the charter within three years, and yet, as I have already said, up to this time they have not struck a spade into the ground. They undertake, in this indirect way, to declare, what? That the commencement, not of the building of the railroad and telegraph line, but that the commencement of the survey of the railroad and telegraph line shall be considered the commencement of the work.

Mr. STEVENS. The substitute which I have offered provides for one year of extension.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. That shows what was the nature of this bill as introduced by the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, and which it was determined to put through under the gag of the previous question. Now, since the thing has been opened up for discussion, they propose to change these flagrant and glaring provisions of the bill, which would have become a law if it could have been put through under the previous question. I am speaking of the bill as it came from the committee, and which they undertook to force through the House.

It further provides—

That the said company may from time to time alter and change the location of its line whenever such changes will the better carry out the purposes set forth in the act of incorporation, by filing in the office of the Secretary of the Interior a description of the new line adopted.

Then this is to become a sort of migratory road, which the parties can locate here and there—here a little and there a little, just as they please—allowing us no control whatever, and leaving the country entirely uncertain where the line is to run, making it a foot-ball for all kinds of outrageous speculation along the line where they expect it to be located.

Those are the provisions of this bill which we are called upon to put through. Well, sir, I do not know but the bill will go through this House. But I wish to say a word to gentlemen on this side of the House in regard to this matter of the public expenditures of the country. We are held, and justly held, responsible for these expenditures. We are the majority. The country holds us responsible, and it is just to hold us responsible, and I tell my friends that when we go before the people at the coming election we will have to look at our records.

I tell you that the people will demand of us a strict account of our stewardship when they look at these stupendous appropriations of their money for objects of this character. It may be a matter of very little interest to my distinguished friend from New York, [Mr. DODGE,] or to his constituents, to the men who live in their gilded palaces, and roll in wealth in that magnificent city, how much they have to pay as taxes; but if he will go with me to the humble homes of my constituents, into the lowly cabins which dot the prairies, and see how this taxation is grinding them to the earth, how they groan under the oppression of railroad corporations and monopolies which are devouring their substance, how they have to pay a dollar a pound for their coffee, two dollars for their tea, and thirty to fifty cents a yard for coarse cotton fabrics—when he sees all this and reflects that these railroad monopolies have put such a tariff upon the products of the farmer that he cannot get his corn to market but burns it for fuel, he may think a little differently in regard to taxation.

Sir, all my sympathies are with the masses of the people, the "mudsills" if you may choose to call them such. Sir, they are the men who by their strong arms and patriotic hearts have upheld and sustained our country in our late struggle, and upon whom we must ever rely to support and uphold its honor and glory in all coming time.

Now, let me ask my friends to go home to their constituents on this question. I undertake to say that this proposition placed squarely before the voters of any congressional district of this country would not get a thousand votes. It is well for us to look a little to those constituents and see how they would probably act if this question was to be determined by them.

I saw recently a veto message of Governor Fenton, of New York, in which he used this argument: that the constituents of the members who had passed the measure would, if it were placed before them, refuse to give it their support. And permit me to say, I glory in the spirit which that honest and incorruptible Executive has shown in putting the knife of the veto into the very heart of the schemes of legislation of the State of New York. He deserves a monument, in my judgment, at the hands of the people of his State for resisting legislation oppressive to the great masses of the people. And let me say here that if our Executive would stop vetoing such measures as the Freedmen's Bureau and the civil rights bill, and would reserve his veto for some of these legislative schemes which are likely to pass Congress, he would to that extent receive the gratitude of the American people.

Mr. WENTWORTH. He is going to do it. [Laughter.]

Mr. HENDERSON. Will the gentleman allow me to say that nine tenths of my own congressional district would vote for the bill now under consideration?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Well, I think I ought to make an exception in behalf of the gentleman's constituents. It is not strange that they want this railroad, and I bear cheerful testimony to the zeal and ability with which my friend has supported this measure.

A MEMBER. So would the people of Montana.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Montana is not a State in the Union, and it never will be so far as my vote is concerned if it requires me to vote away this $60,000,000. I think the millions of people this side of the mountains have some claims upon Congress as well as the other side. As my colleague [Mr. FARNSWORTH] well said, it would be well for us to get some means of communication across the country between the Mississippi river and the Atlantic. Not only that, but we more directly upon the mighty Father of Waters want the obstructions to that great highway of commerce removed so that our products can go "unvexed to the sea."

You do not do that. You do not provide the means by which the people of Illinois and of the whole Northwest can send their products to market. We have struggled here year after year, and year after year, to get it done, but we cannot, and our constituents are suffering now as never before because they cannot get their products to market. And yet you have agreed to expend $95,000,000 to build the Central Pacific railroad in addition to all the land you gave for the purpose; and now you are proposing to give lands and to vote $69,000,000 to build another Pacific railroad.

Mr. DAWES. The Representatives of Massachusetts did not vote against the measure to which the gentleman referred just now.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Well, Massachusetts has all right, with one or two exceptions. [Laughter.]

Mr. STEVENS. I believe I voted against it, because my friend had taught me that taxation was so heavy that we ought to do nothing to increase it. [Laughter.]

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I wish my friend from Pennsylvania would follow my teachings a little oftener. [Laughter.] If he did he would be upon much safer ground than that upon which he is treading now. Sir, I say it is unsafe ground. We have not a moral right to incur this liability of $69,000,000 for the benefit of a private corporation. As I have said, it is shocking to think that such a measure as this can pass. Now, I think I have shown, in regard to the liability which it is proposed to assume in this bill, that that amount has got to be paid, and paid by the Government of the United States. It is so much added to our national debt. It is nearly three quarters of a hundred million "at one fell swoop," and the bill involving this was brought in here to be put through at an evening session, when the galleries were filled with spectators and lobby members looking down upon us, when our chandeliers were brilliantly lighted, and we were sitting here in our cushioned chairs voting away the people's money with magnificent indifference. There was no report accompanying the bill. My friend from Iowa [Mr. PRICE] did not condescend to put in a report to tell us anything about this measure. No, not a single word. He simply reported a naked bill, and he would have proposed, I presume, that the discussion should be limited to three minutes to each man, and then put the bill through under the previous question.

Now, sir, I do not believe that in any other country but this such legislation would ever be tolerated for a moment; and I do not believe the people of any other country would tolerate men who would thus vote away their money without being duly and fully advised concerning the measure. Sir, the prospect is encouraging. Already, inspired by the prospective success of this scheme, and by the prospect of money running so freely out of the public Treasury, some enterprising person has laid upon our desks to-day a proposition for a subsidy to ocean mail steamers and ocean mail routes. Abundant arguments can undoubtedly be adduced why we should grant two, three, five, or ten millions a year as subsidy to these ocean mail routes.

Mr. THAYER. Will the gentleman from Illinois allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. THAYER. I observe that there is upon our files another House bill, No. 378, which is entitled "A bill to aid in the construction of the Kansas and Neosho Valley railroad," which is to connect the great lakes with the Gulf of Mexico; and I observe that by the fourth section of that bill it is proposed that the United States shall guaranty what are called "construction bonds," bonds of $1,000, twenty of which are to be issued for every mile of the road. I want to ask the gentleman whether he can give us any information in regard to that bill.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Oh, no; these railroad bills are so numerous, and they come in here so fast, that it would take any one member of this House almost all his time to keep track of them. I know I am kept busy moving to reconsider, and laying that motion upon the table, the references of these bills to the committees.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask where all this is to lead.

Mr. GARFIELD. To the Pacific coast. [Laughter.]

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. "In a horn!" [Great laughter.] It would lead to the bottom of an almost empty Treasury. That is where it would undoubtedly lead if this bill shall receive our sanction.

Mr. WINDOM. And then what would become of the Illinois ship-canal?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. That reminds me that if all the money go in this particular direction there will be none left for practical improvements demanded by the vast interests of the constituents of my friend and the people of the whole Northwest. My friend's constituents, like mine, have been plundered by these corporations and by these monopolies until they have declared that forbearance has ceased to be a virtue in regard to them, and when ninety-nine out of every hundred of my friend's constituents demand a better means of commercial transportation to the East I am surprised that he should be willing to gratify one out of a hundred by taking all the money of the Government to build this Northern Pacific railroad and devising nothing to afford them an outlet east.

Mr. WINDOM. They are emigrating to the West.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. And I do not wonder at it. If they do not send Representatives here who will see that their interests are vindicated, who will use their influence to give them a better market for their products, then I do not wonder that they emigrate to the West. [Laughter.] If I were a citizen of the State of Minnesota, I think I should emigrate West in that condition of affairs; although, if I were a citizen of the district of my distinguished friend, I should dislike very much to leave it on his account. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. WINDOM. I voted for the canal.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I know the gentleman voted for it, and I know he has been an able and vigilant Representative. But I tell him that if such schemes as this are to go through, it is no use for him, or me, or anybody else, to think of getting appropriations for what is so necessary to our people in the Northwest.

Mr. WINDOM. How about the money voted for Brigham Young?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I recollect that episode, when my friend seemed to be so much disturbed about a little money that he said was going to Brigham Young. He seems to have a prejudice against Brigham. I hope Brigham does not interfere with any of his rights, [great laughter,] so that he and I will quit there. My sympathy is in another direction; not in the direction of the gentleman from Minnesota.

But this is mere badinage, neither here nor there, and I am sorry the House has been detained so long about it.

I have seen a document which has been printed and laid upon our tables, styled "An appeal to Congress in behalf of the Northwest." Now, I consider myself a very small part of the Northwest. I believe I have been in the Northwest longer than any member of this House, except my venerable colleague from the Chicago district, [Mr. WESTWORTH.] [Great laughter.] He is longer there than I am. [Renewed laughter.]

I have been somewhat identified with the interests of the Northwest, for I have lived there more than half my life. I have seen it grow in power and in magnitude and also in glory, and I have felt a pride in it all. And I conceive that I might have some little share in the guardianship of the interests of the Northwest. But we seem to be left out of consideration in this matter, and the guardianship has gone to other hands.

Here is a pamphlet on this subject put on our desks. The names of the parties on the back of this book to which I have referred, this "Appeal to Congress in behalf of the Northwest," are paraded on the outside, some of them in very large letters, as the indorsers of this scheme. I find there the name of Lieutenant General Grant, of Major General Meade, and Brevet Major General Ingalls, as well as others, all gentlemen for whom I have the highest respect and esteem.

Mr. DARLING. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him one question?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Yes, sir.

Mr. DARLING. I desire to inquire whether, when the charter of this company was granted two years ago, the gentleman from Illinois did not propose an amendment by which the name of General McClellan was stricken out and the name of General Grant inserted as one of the incorporators.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. It is very likely, sir. It was certainly a very excellent change. [Laughter.] If the gentleman feels aggrieved about the matter, I hope he will make his grievance known to his constituents.

Mr. DARLING. No, sir. I agree with the gentleman that it was a very good change.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I do not suppose, sir, that General Grant ever knew that his name was in the list of incorporators. But his letter on this subject has been referred to, and the gentleman from Iowa, though I do not know why he should do so, has appealed to me particularly to listen to what General Grant had said on this subject. Now, sir, the opinions of that distinguished officer on subjects with which he is familiar, and to which he has given his attention, have very great weight with me, though I am not bound to permit his opinion, or that of any other man, to override the convictions of my own judgment. And let me say to my friend that the opinions of General Grant have weight with me because of his notions in regard to these very questions of economy, for I undertake to say that no man has devoted himself more zealously to reducing the expenditures of the Government and diminishing the taxation of the people than has General Grant during the last year.

Mr. PRICE. I think so, too; and that is the reason why I have given General Grant as an authority on this bill.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. What does General Grant say? Let me say to my friend from Iowa that I do not know but I indorse every word that General Grant says on the subject. He says:

"In my opinion, too, the United States would receive an additional pecuniary benefit in the construction of this road, by the settlement it would induce along the line of the road, and consequently the less number of troops necessary to secure order and safety."

No doubt it would be a benefit in that way. But he adds:

"How far these benefits should be compensated by the General Government beyond the grant of land already awarded by Congress, I would not pretend to say."

That is the language of General Grant. And he says further:

"I would merely give it as my opinion that the enterprise of constructing the Northern Pacific railroad is one well worth fostering by the General Government, and that such aid could well be afforded as would insure the early prosecution of the work."

Yes, sir, "such aid as would secure the early prosecution of the work." That aid this company already has. So far as regards the propriety of the Government guarantying the stock of this company in the manner proposed, let me say that General Grant himself told me that he declined an indorsement of the policy of a guarantee of the stock by the United States.

Sir, I have spoken on this question with some degree of earnestness, for I have the strongest conviction of the impolicy of the measure. I do not know that there ever came before the House a measure calling forth the more earnest attention of the House than this bill demands. Sir, if we are to aid in this way in the construction of this road, shall we not be called upon, on the same principle, to aid in the construction of a southern Pacific railroad, so as to have three roads? And with what consistency could we refuse to build that road if we build this? The same argument would apply. We have already committed ourselves to the Central Pacific railroad by the stupendous grant of lands; as well as by assuming a liability of $95,000,000. We had better get through with that project before assuming any new liabilities. Mr. Speaker, there is an additional suggestion. The Committee of Ways and Means, after working carefully, judiciously, and faithfully, during the whole session, have brought in a bill to reduce the taxes of the country; and, sir, the reduction which will be accomplished by that measure is just about equivalent to the sum we propose to vote away in this bill.

If this bill is to pass, the bill for reducing the taxes ought not to pass, if we expect to pay our obligations and keep up the national credit. Let my friend from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] move to strike out the enacting clause of his bill, and let the burdens upon the people still go unrelieved in order that this mammoth corporation shall make the Government liable for the vast sum provided in this bill. But I will detain the House no longer, but yield the floor.

Mr. STEVENS obtained the floor.

UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD COMPANY.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which, with the accompanying documents, was referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, and ordered to be printed:

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
WASHINGTON, D. C., April 24, 1866.

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I submit herewith, for the consideration of Congress, the accompanying communication from the Secretary of the Interior in relation to the Union Pacific Railroad Company, eastern division.

It appears that the company were required to complete one hundred miles of their road within three years after their acceptance of the conditions of the original act of Congress. This period expired December 22, 1865. Sixty-two miles had been previously accepted by the Government. Since that date an additional section of twenty-three miles has been completed. Commissioners appointed for that purpose have examined and reported upon it, and an application has been made for its acceptance.

The failure to complete one hundred miles of road within the period prescribed renders it questionable whether the executive officers of the Government are authorized to issue the bonds and patents to which the company would be entitled if this as well as the other requirements of the act had been faithfully observed. This failure may, to some extent, be ascribed to the financial condition of the country incident to the recent civil war. As the company appear to be engaged in the energetic prosecution of their work, and manifest a disposition to comply with the conditions of the grant, I recommend that the time for the completion of this part of the road be extended, and that authority be given for the issue of bonds and patents on account of the section now offered for acceptance, notwithstanding such failure, should the company in other respects be thereunto entitled.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD—AGAIN.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I promised to yield a portion of my time to the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. WRIGHT.]

Mr. STEVENS. I think we can arrange the difficulty. Although I intend to go on this evening, the speech of the gentleman from Illinois was filled so full of "chimeras, gorgons, and hydras dire," that my nerves have been shocked, and I do not care to speak to-night. [Laughter.]

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Then I hope we will adjourn.

INTERNAL REVENUE BILL.

Mr. LATHAM, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Printing, reported a resolution that there be printed in pamphlet form, for the use of the members of the House, ten thousand extra copies of the bill to amend the internal revenue laws, reported by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, April 25, 1866; which was read, considered, and agreed to.

IMMIGRATION.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Commerce have considered and are ready to report a bill in relation to immigration, which has some provisions in regard to over-crowding passenger ships, and also in connection with the cholera. I ask unanimous consent that it shall be considered to-morrow after the pending subject has been disposed of. There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

EQUALIZATION OF SOLDIERS' BOUNTY.

Mr. ELDRIDGE, by unanimous consent, presented the memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin, for the equalization of soldiers' bounty; which was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

NEW MAIL ROUTE.

Mr. ELDRIDGE also presented a memorial for a mail route from Trempealeau to Sumner, in Trempealeau county; which was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

WISCONSIN SHIP-CANAL.

Mr. ELDRIDGE also presented a memorial in relation to a ship-canal through the State of Wisconsin connecting the Mississippi river with the waters of Lake Michigan; and a memorial for the improvement of the harbor at Superior City, Wisconsin; which were ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

SENATOR DOOLITTLE.

Mr. ELDRIDGE also presented joint resolutions of the Legislature of Wisconsin, declaring it to be the duty of Senator DOOLITTLE to resign the office of United States Senator; which were ordered to be printed, and referred to the select joint committee on reconstruction.

EXPENSES OF REVENUE COLLECTION.

On motion of Mr. STEVENS, Senate joint resolution No. 75, making appropriations for expenses of the collection of revenues from customs, was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

And then, on motion of Mr. BINGHAM, (at five minutes to five o'clock p. m.,) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. BOUTWELL: The petition of B. R. Curtis, and others, citizens of Boston, Massachusetts, in reference to the reorganization of the courts of the United States.

By Mr. WARD: The petition of James L. Waads and others, prominent members of the bar of Che-mung county, New York, against the Federal judiciary law.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, April 27, 1866.

Prayer by Rev. W. B. GILLETTE, of Cumberland, New Jersey.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore signed the enrolled joint resolution (H. R. No. 67) providing for the reappraisal of the lands described in an act for the relief of William Sawyer and others, of Ohio.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles and referred as indicated below:

A bill (H. R. No. 434) for the relief of Isabella Strubing—to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (H. R. No. 473) to extend the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

A bill (H. R. No. 475) to facilitate the settlement of the accounts of paymasters of the Army—to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

INTERNATIONAL OCEAN TELEGRAPH.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 26) to encourage telegraphic communication between the United States and the island of Cuba and other West India islands, and the Bahamas.

The first amendment was in section two, line three, to strike out the words "during a state of war;" so as to make the section read:

That the said International Ocean Telegraph Company shall at all times give the United States the free use of said cable or cables, through a telegraphic operator of its own selection, to transmit any messages to and from its military, naval, and diplomatic or consular agents.

The next amendment was after the word "agents," in the same section, to insert these words:

And the said company shall keep all its lines open to the public for the transmission, for daily publication, of market and commercial reports and intelligence; and all messages, dispatches, and communications shall be forwarded in the order in which they shall be received; and the said company shall not be permitted to charge and collect for messages transmitted through any of its submarine cables more than the rate of $3 50 for messages of ten words.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House of Representatives.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope the Senate will not take sudden action on this question, nor at any time concur in the amendment with reference to the rate of charge. The charge here proposed to be allowed for telegraphing during the period of years this exclusive privilege is to last is far greater in proportion to the distance than any made anywhere in the United States. The charges now made for telegraphing across the continent to the Pacific coast from this city amount to about seven dollars and eighty cents, or thereabouts.

Mr. CHANDLER. To avoid discussion I will move that the Senate non-concur in the amendments, and ask for a committee of conference, if the Senator will give way for that purpose.

Mr. CONNESS. I wish to say what I was proceeding to say at the present time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California is entitled to the floor.

Mr. CONNESS. I shall not occupy long. I was stating, sir, that at the present time the cost of telegraphing from Washington city to the Pacific coast by the Overland Telegraph Company is for every ten words about seven dollars and eighty cents, a very high rate of charge, as we who pay it happen to know from day to day and from hour to hour.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish to suggest to the Senator from California that the rate is ten dollars from here to Portland, in Oregon, for every ten words.

Mr. CONNESS. I have no doubt it is, going by California. My purpose, however, was only to call attention to that as a high rate; but this is a higher rate still, three dollars for a distance of a hundred miles, which may be the means of communicating with the European continent, and the only means in case of the continued failure of the northern ocean line. As I understand, the French Government are now taking steps to construct a line by the Cape De Verde islands. My purpose, however, is only to call attention to the fact, and I do not want this question disposed of by being committed to a committee of conference.

Mr. CHANDLER. Well, let it go.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope the honorable Senator will allow me to proceed for a moment. I was about to say that I did not want this question disposed of by being referred to a committee of conference which shall agree to this rate. I notice, now, that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] is in his seat, who feels some interest in this subject; and whatever course is taken, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the rate fixed here is a rate that ought not to be permitted, in my opinion.

Mr. MORRILL. The Senate is undoubtedly sufficiently aware of the opposition to this bill.

Mr. CONNESS. I wish the honorable Senator to understand that I voted for the bill on its passage, and opposition to the bill is not my purpose now; but I am utterly opposed to adding to the exclusive privilege granted to this company the right to make this extraordinary charge.

Mr. MORRILL. Of course I did not propose to refer to the Senator particularly as "the opposition" to which I adverted.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President—

Mr. MORRILL. Does the Senator wish to interrupt?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I was going to ask the Senator having charge of this bill, who I believe is the Senator from Michigan, as it is going to give rise to debate, to let it go over, and let us proceed with the bill which we had up in the morning hour the day before yesterday, and which was partially discussed and postponed. I hope he will allow that bill to come up as there seems to be a disposition to debate this matter.

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not think it will lead to any debate. It has been thoroughly discussed heretofore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maine give way?

Mr. MORRILL. Not yet. I do not propose to lose sight of this bill just here if I can help it. This bill had the consideration of the Senate, I believe, fully. The question now is upon concurrence in the amendments of the House of Representatives. I have not the slightest objection to the bill taking the direction which the honorable chairman who has charge of the bill has suggested, and to its going to a committee of conference where it can be adjusted, as the Senator from California, I am disposed to believe, very properly suggests. The bill, so far as it has been amended by the House of Representatives, has been in derogation of the interests of the corporators. It was thoroughly discussed in the Senate, and I believe the Senate will bear me witness that the judgment of the Senate was favorable to the bill. On this question of the exorbitant character of the charge, I am not now in a position to judge. I am half inclined to believe with the honorable Senator from California that it may be so; but I suggest to him that the power to amend this charter in all particulars, including the subject of charge, is reserved in the bill, so that if the charge is found to be exorbitant hereafter it can be reached.

If it is the judgment of the Senate that this bill ought to pass, why not pass it now? We have had the deliberate judgment of the Senate once on this measure. My friend from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] thinks it ought not to pass without consideration. We have had consideration. That Senator is opposed to the bill in toto, and the opposition he makes to it, I dare say, is the opposition of the other day renewed. The bill having once had the sanction of the Senate, unless it is obnoxious to some such charge as the honorable Senator from California raises in this one particular, I object to its receiving the go-by, and I insist that its friends ought to give it a direction which will facilitate its passage at an early day. It should not be forgotten that it was said on a former occasion that time was essential. I suggest, therefore, to the honorable Senator from California to allow the bill to take the direction suggested by the chairman of the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CONNESS. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. MORRILL. Certainly.

Mr. CONNESS. My object is not to delay the passage of the bill. I finally consented to vote for it in the Senate when it passed. My opposition to it ceased then, as a matter of course. But I ask the Senator, in whose judgment I have great confidence, whether, in his opinion, the limit fixed by the amendment of the House of Representatives to the company's right to charge does not preclude us from acting on that subject hereafter under the general clause placed in the bill by the Senate originally reserving to Congress the right to alter and amend it. My impression was that it would have that effect as to that point. If it does not, as a matter of course the naming of the amount to be charged in the House amendment does not make the bill any more obnoxious than it was before, because as I voted for it they had a right to make what charge they pleased. But it occurred to me that if we agreed to the amendment of the House fixing this sum as the limit of the charge to be made by this company it would bind us hereafter in any action that we might propose to take on this subject.

Mr. MORRILL. I think the honorable Senator will see, on a moment's reflection, that it cannot by any possibility have that effect. The provision is simply that they shall not charge exceeding that amount, and of course, within that limit, it will be under the control of Congress.

Mr. CHANDLER. The only change made by the House was, first, making this line free to the Government of the United States in time of peace and war; second, putting in a proviso that they should not charge over so much for ten words, because the House were not willing to give to this company the great scope which they deemed to be contained in the original bill. But the same powers are reserved in the bill now that were in it before it went to the House. The amendments that have been inserted are simply against the company. I hope the vote will be taken on concurring in the amendments.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I trust that this measure will go back to the Committee on Commerce and receive more consideration than it has already received. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. BROWN] has suggested a measure to the Senate whereby the United States will take the exclusive control of the telegraphing of this country. The Senator from Oregon and the Senator from California feel the full force and weight of the exorbitant demands of these great monopolies, and the business of the country every day suffers from the exclusiveness of this great interest. It strikes me that there should be an amendment to this bill providing that the privileges and the rights granted by it shall cease when the United States shall have taken possession, as they have a right to do undoubtedly under the Constitution, of the telegraphing of the country. Give us a clause to that effect; amend your bill; let us understand that the policy of the country is to prevent those exclusive monopolies which now embarrass the business interests of the country.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Maine has very correctly stated that I was opposed to the passage of this bill when it was under consideration before, and that I have not changed my mind. I have no objection to the character of the company who undertake this enterprise. On the other hand, I think the gentlemen engaged in it are men of capacity and have ample means to execute their purpose. My idea is that within a very short time—I hope within a year or two—there will be an entire revolution in the system of telegraphing. As it is now, it is only a luxury for the rich. A dispatch of ten words to my own State costs $1 75 to the citizen who sends it, while probably the real cost to the companies does not exceed from one to two or three cents a word at the outside. The receipts for telegraphing in the United States annually are probably equal to the entire cost of all the telegraphic lines. That this system cannot continue, that some change must take place soon, I believe every man engaged in business is thoroughly convinced. Private enterprises will, even at a disadvantage, compete with existing lines, unless they are finally bought up as has been the case in very many instances. There must be some way of reducing the cost of what is now an absolute necessity in modern existence, telegraphing. I have no doubt that the same history of progress in the reduction of telegraphic charges will exist and continue for a few years to come as we had in the post office system. Within my recollection, a letter from New York to Ohio cost twenty-five cents. It is now reduced to three cents, and that is the price for conveying a letter to California. I have no doubt the same system will exist as to telegraphing. It is the cheapest mode of transit, and requires the least capital of any mode of transportation. Railroads, stage-coaches, turnpikes, canals, all require a vast outlay of capital, but telegraphing is the cheapest possible mode of communication; the least capital is required to be employed for the length of line, and therefore the price of telegraphing will gradually go down, with the improvements of the age, with competition, probably with the assumption of telegraphing by the Government of the United States. I have no doubt that that will occur in a short time.

My objection to this bill was not to the enterprise itself—for I was in favor of it—but it was to the monopoly character of the project, the granting to a private corporation in the State of New York of a sole privilege. It is true it was answered that this was somewhat modified by the right of Congress to repeal or change the law; but it seems to me that it is always a difficult thing to change such a law. After men have embarked in an enterprise of that kind, there is always an appeal, at least, to our magnanimity and liberality, not to deprive them of a franchise under which they have invested their money. I do not know whether any cases have occurred where Congress have changed or modified a private charter of this kind. There may be many such cases, but I know of none; and I am sure it will be very difficult indeed to change and modify this law.

The only objection I had to the bill was to the exclusive character given to this corporation; but that objection is made worse now, by one of the amendments proposed by the House of Representatives. By that amendment they have the right—that is the limit, and they will undoubtedly exercise it—to charge $3 50 for ten words, from Florida to Cuba—one hundred miles of submarine telegraph. Gentlemen are well informed as to the cost of this submarine telegraph; how much it will cost per mile. It is manufactured in the United States, and an estimate of the cost can be readily obtained.

It should be remembered that this line may become the only mode of communicating with Europe. It is probably the most feasible line that is now proposed; and if the projected line between Ireland and Newfoundland should fail again this summer, this probably will be the only interoceanic telegraph. We know, also, that the French Government are now engaged in pressing their lines along the African coast, and expect to connect the French possessions in the West Indies by oceanic telegraphs, and then this line would connect with those. In view of the importance of this enterprise, it seemed to me that it was not wise to grant this sole and exclusive privilege, and especially to put a limitation which is an invitation to charge $3 50 for every message sent across one hundred miles. As a matter of course the cost of the message from the connecting lines to the southern coast of Florida will be added to the cost of the message from Florida across to Havana; but the cost of communication will be in the hands of a single company without any rivalry or competition. It seems to me this ought not to be granted. I therefore felt myself justified in opposing this measure in all its various stages, and I think now the best disposition will be to send it to the committee that has charge of this matter.

I will state that that committee is now pursuing its investigations. It is in correspondence with all the existing companies with a view to get the basis of the cost and expenses of communicating telegraphic information. I do not, however, wish to have this referred to that committee, although I believe it would be better to let it lie on the table until the committee report and the subject is disposed of. I think that if the majority of the Senate are still of opinion that this bill ought to pass, the better way would be to have a committee of conference and have, if possible, a reduction of the maximum rate.

Mr. MORRILL. I do not know but that the good time is coming, and very suddenly, when the Government will take possession of all the telegraphs in this country; yet I am a little incredulous on that subject and do not see exactly how it is to be done. I suppose we shall have the millennium prophesied some time; but the question is whether we had better suspend all enterprise on these big hopes. It is this kind of enterprise that heralds the millennium if ever it comes; precisely this.

Now, Mr. President, I was not mistaken, I think, in my suggestion as to the opposition of my honorable friend from Ohio; and I cannot understand exactly how it is that a bill has been made obnoxious by an amendment which is itself a limitation on the power of the company. When this bill passed the Senate the power to charge was unlimited and unrestricted. The House of Representatives have limited the power of the company to charge beyond a specific sum. Now, I do not understand the force of the argument which renders that obnoxious to the charge of being exorbitant. It seems to me it is a limitation, to say the least of it; and to that extent, as I said when I was up before, it is against the interest of the company.

I do not wish to protract debate, and do not intend to do so, but I simply repeat that the question when up before on its merits was discussed at large and the judgment of the Senate was that the bill ought to pass. All that has taken place in the other House, I submit, does not change the attitude of the bill as it was before the Senate on its passage. It has all been in restraint of the interests and the rights of the corporators. I submit, that having been the judgment of the Senate, whether the concurrence in this action, as moved by the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, who has charge of this bill, is not reasonable.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I should like to inquire of the honorable Senator from Maine whether this amendment coming from the House of Representatives, fixing the price of messages at $3 50, is in such form as to prevent Congress reducing that price hereafter if they think it necessary to do so.

Mr. MORRILL. It does not change the character of the bill in that respect, except that it prevents them from charging beyond that price, leaving the bill entirely within the control of Congress.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The question in my mind is whether, if Congress assumes to specify a given sum, Congress may not feel itself bound by that, so as not to interfere; whether the amendment ought not to be amended so as to embrace in direct terms a provision that Congress retains the power at any time to reduce this price if it is regarded as exorbitant.

Mr. MORRILL. Congress now retains in its hands the power to alter, amend, or repeal the act; and of course that necessarily includes the power to change this provision.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I know it was so argued, and perhaps that is the true construction; and yet it would do no harm whatever, and would relieve it of all possible doubt, to insert the words that Congress should have power at any time to fix the rates if these should appear to be exorbitant. I hope it will go to a committee of conference, and they can arrange it between themselves.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will put the question on the two amendments together unless a division is asked for.

Mr. MORRILL. I wish to say to the honorable chairman who has charge of this bill that I have not the slightest objection that it should go to a committee of conference, as I understood him to suggest.

Mr. CHANDLER. That was to avoid debate. I am content to take the bill as it is, or let it go to a committee of conference. The amendments have had the approbation of the Committee on Commerce. I think we had better vote on the question now.

Mr. CLARK. I suggest to the Senator from Michigan that, in my judgment, it had better go to a committee of conference. It may be that this limit is right; it may be that it is not right. It may be that it is too high. The Postmaster General has promised the committee on this subject to furnish them with some information in regard to the price of telegraphing, and in regard to the investment of capital, and the rates at which it may be done. I think, perhaps, that if we have a committee of conference they can confer, and determine what is best to be done, for I have no idea but that the chairman of the Committee on Commerce desires to have it at the proper rate, and they can act, perhaps, more intelligently in that way than if we at once concur in the amendments.

Mr. CHANDLER. I withdraw my motion to concur, and move that the Senate non-concur in the amendments, and ask for a committee of conference.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I have but one remark to make on this question, and that is with reference to a suggestion which fell from the Senator from Maine as to the millennium. If the millennium can be as easily reached as the establishment by the Government of the United States of telegraph lines between its post offices, I confess that it will be very easily reached. It seems to me as much the province of the Government of the United States to establish lines of telegraph between its various post offices throughout the country as it is to establish the post offices themselves.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion now is that the Senate non-concur in the amendments proposed to this bill by the House of Representatives, and ask a conference with that House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. How shall the committee be appointed?

Several SENATORS. By the Chair.

By unanimous consent the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the committee; and Messrs. CHANDLER, MORRILL, and CONNEX were appointed the committee on the part of the Senate.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. JOHNSON presented the memorial of Joshua Jones, of St. Mary's county, Maryland, claiming damages for property of his, of which forcible possession is alleged to have been taken by the Freedmen's Bureau; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HENDERSON presented additional papers in relation to the claim of Washington Crosland for compensation for property belonging to him situated in St. Louis, Missouri, which was seized by order of General John C. Frémont, and used for Government purposes; which were referred to the Committee on Claims.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. HOWARD, from the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, to whom were referred various petitions praying for the construction of a railroad from the south line of Kansas to the north line of Texas, and also for a railroad across the Indian Territory from the south line of Kansas to Red river, asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a message from the President of the United States, transmitting a memorial of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Colorado in relation to the location of the Pacific railroad, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Mary Johnson, praying for compensation for property destroyed by the rebels under the command of General Longstreet, near Suffolk, Virginia, reported adversely thereon.

Mr. KIRKWOOD, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 85) for the disposal of the public lands for homestead actual settlement in the States of Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Florida, reported it with amendments.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. NYE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 290) to incorporate the National Life and Accident Insurance Company of the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

USE OF HALL.

Mr. WILSON. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the use of the Senate Chamber be granted to James E. Murdoch, Esq., on Thursday evening, May 3, for the purpose of giving a reading for the benefit of the fair to be held in this city for the National Home for the orphans of soldiers and sailors.

I will simply say that there is being held at the present time a fair for the benefit of the orphans of soldiers and sailors. Mr. Murdoch, who has devoted almost all his time during the war to the cause of the soldiers, has offered to give a reading for the benefit of their children. If such a privilege is ever granted for any purpose it ought certainly to be for this.

Mr. RIDDLE. I am in favor of the object of the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts, but—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will inquire if there be any objection to the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. RIDDLE. I object, then.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the resolution lies over.

NEW YORK AND MONTANA IRON COMPANY.

Mr. WADE. I move now to take up Senate bill No. 203, the unfinished business of the morning hour of yesterday.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 203) to enable the New York and Montana Iron Mining and Manufacturing Company to purchase a certain amount of the public lands not now in market; the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. POMEROY to the first section of the amendment reported as a substitute for the bill by the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. POMEROY. I desire to withdraw the amendment that I moved yesterday, which was to add the proviso at the end of the original bill to the first section of the substitute reported by the committee, and to offer another proposition which will better secure the object I have in view. No action having been taken upon it, I suppose it is competent for me to withdraw it, which I now do, and in lieu of it I propose to insert in the tenth line of the first section of the substitute, after the word "purposes" the words "or in any other preëmption or homestead settlement;" my object being simply to make secure any settlement that may have been made against the location to be made by this company.

Mr. WADE. If the Senator will allow me, I will state that the Senator from California [Mr. CONNESS] has shown me an amendment that he has prepared which I believe covers the whole ground, and to which I have no objection.

Mr. POMEROY. Very well; I will withdraw my amendment and listen to the amendment of the Senator from California.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas withdraws his amendment to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. CONNESS. I have prepared a few amendments to this bill with a view of perfecting it or making it unobjectionable, and at the same time, of course, carrying out the purposes that its friends have in view. In the thirteenth line of the first section of the amendment of the Committee on Public Lands, I propose to insert after the word "be" the words "made under regulations from and," and in the fourteenth line, to strike out the words "Secretary of the Interior" and insert "Commissioner of the General Land Office;" so that the clause will read:

Three of which sections may be selected of lands containing iron ore and coal, and the remaining sections of timber lands near the said selections containing ore and coal, which selections shall be made under regulations from, and subject to the approval of, the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

That is the only amendment I propose to that section. The amendment reconciles it to the practice of the Land Office.

Mr. WADE. I do not think there is any objection to that amendment; but the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] has had great experience on this subject, and I should rely more on his judgment than on my own, in regard to this amendment.

Mr. HENDRICKS. My only objection is to the latter part of the amendment, inserting "Commissioner of the General Land Office" instead of the "Secretary of the Interior." It has been the custom to submit the question of important selections of the public lands to the Secretary of the Interior. Railroad lands, swamp lands, and other selections are submitted to his judgment as the head of the Department. Of course, before they go to him they pass the supervision of the General Land Office, and the bill as it now stands secures the examination both of the Commissioner and of the Secretary. I do not see any propriety in cutting off the Secretary's revision of the judgment of the Commissioner, as is customary on all such questions. I do not object to the first part of the amendment, and therefore shall ask for a separate vote on it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question will be taken on each amendment proposed separately. The question now is on the amendment of the Senator from California, to insert in the thirteenth line of the first section of the amendment reported by the committee, after the word "be," the words "made under regulations from and."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the amendment of the Senator from California, to strike out in the fourteenth line of the amendment of the committee the words "Secretary of the Interior," and to insert "Commissioner of the General Land Office."

Mr. CONNESS. If there be any objection to that amendment I have no objection to its withdrawal.

Mr. WADE. I hope the Senator will withdraw it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. CONNESS. I propose to insert at the end of the second section of the amendment of the committee the words "for the period of thirty days;" so that it will read:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the said company may acquire immediate possession thereof on the selection of the said lands by permanently marking their boundaries and publishing a description thereof in any two newspapers of general circulation in the said Territory for the period of thirty days.

Mr. WADE. There is no objection to that. The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONNESS. I now propose to amend the fourth section of the amendment of the committee by striking out all after the word "coal," at the end of the second line, in the following words:

Or to any lands held by right of possession, or by any other title, except Indian title, valid at the time of the selection of the said lands.

And to insert in lieu thereof:

Nor to any lands lying within any grant for railroad purposes heretofore made, nor to any lands held by possession for mining or agricultural purposes, nor, should mines of the precious metals be hereafter discovered upon said lands, shall any citizen of the United States be prevented from entering thereon and mining for the same, nor from using, free of charge, so much timber as shall be necessary for such mining purposes.

So that the section will read;

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the said patents shall convey no title to any mineral lands except iron and coal, nor to any lands lying within any grant for railroad purposes heretofore made, &c.

Mr. WADE. On reflection I am disposed to think that that is an unnecessary precaution. It will certainly throw a cloud over the title that this company will acquire by purchase from the Government. Of course they will have no right to any gold that may be discovered on the land by anybody, for under this bill they have no right to take gold and silver or anything but iron and coal. But if persons are to be permitted to go searching upon that land and they should find gold somewhere upon it, and are then to be permitted to cut the timber belonging to this company, it would render the whole grant very uncertain. I think when we expressly reserve in the bill all mines except those of iron and coal, sufficient caution has been had. I think it is anticipating what will not probably take place, and it will throw, as I said before, a cloud over the title that this company will acquire; because, after they have purchased and taken possession of the land, it will reserve not only the mines upon that land, but will reserve the privilege to strangers of going on there and using the timber on the land of this company to work the mines that may be discovered. I think there is no necessity for that.

And here I desire to say that this bill has been submitted to the most critical and searching examination of the Committee on Public Lands, and especially of the gentleman on that committee most competent to make this examination, who himself, perhaps, is as much a master of this whole subject as any gentleman in the Union. I think we have submitted to about amendments enough. I am afraid this amendment will involve the title, or cloud it so that it may, perhaps, defeat the grant. I think the bill is sufficiently clear without this amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON. I suppose the objection of the honorable member from Ohio is to the latter part of the amendment, not to the first part.

Mr. CONNESS. Will the Senator permit me to explain the amendment?

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly.

Mr. CONNESS. The question involved here is whether you will grant twenty miles of land in a mining region which may contain the most valuable mines of gold and silver, or whether you will not. I know there is an exception made in the bill of non-conveyance of lands containing these precious metals; but it is impossible, as this company are authorized to go into the forests, into a new country, to determine before they obtain the title to the lands, whether valuable mines of the precious metals are contained in these lands or not. They will therefore get the title and the patent of the United States to the lands before those discoveries can be made. Suppose that by the bill, although the patents issue, such lands are reserved as shall be found to contain valuable mines; I apprehend that without a provision, as a condition of the title, allowing persons to enter those lands, no person would have the right to go on them, and the mines would be practically reserved to and subject to the will of the company to whom we give title to the land.

The next point is as to the use of such timber as shall be necessary to work those mines. In the first place, you will remember that all the timber on these twenty miles of land goes with the land to these parties. It is said they want the timber in order to work the iron. So they do; but they are not prevented by my amendment from having all the timber that they will require. But if the lands be valuable for the purpose for which we are about to make this grant, as to give this company the right to make this selection and purchase, certainly the lands are also valuable if they shall be found to contain valuable mines of the precious metals to the public; but they will be valueless unless they are permitted to be worked, and they cannot be worked without timber.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the special order.

Mr. CONNESS. Let it lie over informally.

Mr. WADE. I hope that the special order will be passed over informally, so that we may be permitted to take a vote on this bill.

Mr. CONNESS. I shall only occupy a few moments in explaining this amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. By common consent, the special order may be laid aside if there be no objection.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Let it be laid aside informally, so that it shall be the business in order as soon as this bill is disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No objection being made, that will be considered as the understanding of the Senate. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. CONNESS. If you shall subject all the timber upon this twenty miles of land to the will of the parties to whom you now convey the land, you practically subject the valuable mines that may be discovered there also to their use; for they may put such a price upon the timber as will make it utterly impracticable for anybody but themselves to work the mines, and it may be totally impracticable to obtain timber from the contiguous territory; for twenty miles of timber may embrace all that there may be within a very large district; and thus we come back to the original proposition. If the purpose is to make the grant complete, then I have nothing to say, because the Senate will understand when they vote that they vote upon that proposition. If the purpose is really to reserve the mines, remembering at the same time that the owners of this land and this iron-working company will have a right to become miners themselves, they may enter and discover the mines, and they may retain possession of those mines, and the condition that is imposed here may inure to them, so that there is no conflict if that should occur; but if other citizens are to be permitted to enter, to explore and ascertain whether valuable mines exist there or not, I submit that the right to use as much timber as is necessary to carry on their purpose is an absolute necessity to their occupancy. I submit that to any Senator who is acquainted with that section of the country and its business.

Mr. WADE. I shall occupy but a moment of time. I might apply to this case the old maxim, "If the sky should fall we may catch larks." Now, sir, this proposition is as broad as it is long. The gentleman thinks that by probability a gold mine may be discovered there valuable to work, and if it is, he wants the timber that these parties purchase subjected to the purpose of working those mines. It may be perhaps as possible in the future that such a mine will be discovered, and that they will want all our timber and thus destroy our iron-works, as it will be that we shall deprive the gold miner of the opportunity of discovering a mine and prevent him from using the timber to work it. The cases are altogether too remote. They escaped the searching investigation of that most competent committee that reported this bill, and I hardly think they would wish to attach to it a provision to anticipate against a contingency so remote and so unlikely to occur. On the one hand it is as likely to affect us who ask this grant and propose to pay for it, as it is that the discovery will be made by somebody else, and that they will want the use of our timber. I think it is too remote altogether, and it is subjecting the grant to such contingencies as will render it less valuable and less secure, and make men hesitate to embark in it, for it must be remembered that in order to go on with this great work of manufacturing iron in this distant Territory a great capital must be laid out there in the start. It will require a very large capital to start the work, and capitalists are very apt to be frightened out of their propriety if they see such unusual conditions attached to the grant. They do not like to run the hazard. That is the principal objection that I have to it. The danger is certainly so remote that the gentleman cannot suppose that it is necessary to anticipate and provide against a contingency so unlikely to occur.

Mr. CONNESS. The danger and the objection to making such a grant as this in a country entirely new is, that nobody knows what that country contains. I submit to the honorable Senator from Ohio that this is not by any means a remote condition, because you are to begin at the beginning of it. Persons enter upon that land, knowing nothing of what it contains, or what are in its bowels. I am not strenuous about the proposition that I have submitted; but I feel it my duty to explain it to the Senate, so that they may vote understandingly upon it. It is a matter of very little consequence to me whether you grant to A B twenty miles of land in the midst of one of your Territories or not. I have always been of the opinion that the title should go to the mines; and if the purpose here is to convey the title to the mines, all right, let it be done. But I submit that if that is not the purpose, and you are going to grant twenty miles of land for the purpose of working iron, and you intend to reserve to your people the working of the mines of precious metals that may be discovered there, you should reserve to them the reasonable use of the mines and of the working of the mines. The one is not worth anything without the other. My purpose is not to embarrass this company, nor to throw a cloud upon their property.

But the honorable Senator replies to me twice, thrice, that a committee have examined the bill. So they have. I submit the remarks I have made to that committee, or to the members of it here. I care nothing about whether this amendment is adopted or not. I live in the very midst of a country involving the conditions that I discuss, and I have seen them from day to day, for years of my life. We have appended the same condition to our Pacific railroad grants. We granted to the Pacific railroad all the timber upon the even sections and the land and the timber upon the odd sections; but you will find that we incorporated an amendment, in 1864, in the grant, reserving against the railroad company and former grant of the timber as much of that timber as was necessary for the operations of the miners upon the even sections where mines may be discovered, because the reservation of the timber is as necessary as the right to work the mine itself. This amendment, therefore, is not applying a new condition, but carrying out a policy that has been adopted, and a policy that every man who lives in a mining region understands the necessity of.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I should like to make a suggestion to the Senator from California. I understand very well the propriety of the reservation in regard to the lands falling within the line of the Pacific railroad. They need the timber for ties; but in this case this land, except where iron ore itself exists, is needed for the purpose of producing coal to work the ore. I understand from the Senator from California that the necessity for timber in mines is for no other purpose than that of cropping—I do not know the technical name.

Mr. CONNESS. Timbering their tunnels and shafts.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. For timbering their tunnels and shafts. I apprehend the amendment would not be objectionable if it were confined to that; but under this amendment extensive steam-works and all that kind of thing may be set up there and the timber taken off this land to run those steam-works.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If the Senator from Iowa will yield to me for one moment, I desire to suggest to the Senator from California that I cannot conceive that his amendment is necessary for the purposes that he desires. The bill already declares that no mineral lands other than coal or iron shall be granted; and it provides that the title which shall be issued shall not convey any lands containing the precious metals. Now, the company by the patent get no title to any land except of the character intended to be granted. They cannot take more than that. They do not become the owners, by virtue of the patent, of any lands except of the classes described. The effect of the amendment proposed is to give the right to take timber on land that is not of the character described. If you adopt this amendment, it makes the title uncertain as far as they have a right to acquire. Therefore, I think, if we intend to pass this bill, we had better stand by the language of the committee.

Mr. CONNESS. I find a good deal of objection to this amendment. As I said before, my purpose is not to oppose one tittle of interference or impediment against this bill. I am quite aware of the practical necessity of the suggestion that I have made. At the same time, having placed my views on the subject before the Senate, I am perfectly willing to withdraw the amendment. It is, as I stated before, a matter of no consequence to me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Mr. President, it is my opinion that the amendment proposed by the Senator, my colleague, would be a well-advised amendment if the bill required it; but I do not think it exactly germane to the bill. It is my judgment that the whole proposition is what may be denominated as special legislation. I do not understand why "the New York and Montana Iron Mining and Manufacturing Company" should "be authorized within one year after the approval of this act" to select tracts of land in the Territory of Montana "which, in the aggregate, shall not exceed twenty sections." Such a thing has never been done in this country to develop any such interest. The persons who discover iron—and this is the age of iron—are protected sufficiently by the present law. Those who discover gold or silver or copper, or any other valuable metal, are protected sufficiently by the present law. That to a company incorporated there should be granted twenty sections, is a proposition the meaning of which I can only understand in this way, that it is a matter of speculation. The men of the West, where I inhabit, have been too much disturbed by speculation. Individual enterprise has developed all the West, from the Mississippi valley to the mountains and to my own coast. We have not sought the support of organizations arranged in New York, which is my own native State and of which I speak with respect. All these things have been achieved by individual enterprise, as they have combined themselves; and companies organized here for speculative purposes have no right to any such franchise or any such grant from this Government. To pass such an act as this would be an evil precedent. It should not be incorporated in our laws. I speak to the main question of the bill and to those who have considered what the office and business of legislators is. Those who are ignorant should not undertake to speak of countries which they never inhabited and about which they know nothing. Those who think should pause. There are but few here—I know none but my colleague and myself in this Senate Chamber and the Senators from Nevada—who know anything about the country concerning which it is now proposed to legislate. I cannot account for the bill except as a matter of personal speculation against the policy of the country and against its true interest.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I desire to make one or two suggestions as to this bill with a view of eliciting some information. My attention has not been called to it until this morning. I find that section two of the bill provides that this company may acquire immediate possession of this land by marking the boundaries "and publishing a description thereof in any two newspapers of general circulation in the said Territory."

Now, if I understand the meaning of that section and of the other provisions of the bill, it is that this company can proceed at once, as soon as they mark their boundaries and publish their description of these lands, to take possession of the lands and hold them for two years without taking any other step, and during that time they may make any use of these lands they see proper. They may cut off and convert the timber to any use, and in every way appropriate the lands contrary to the intentment of this bill.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Will the Senator read the last section of the substitute?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not know that that changes particularly the effect of the second section. I desire further to inquire—I think it is desirable to know—who constitute this New York and Montana Iron Mining and Manufacturing Company. Is this one of the moonshine organizations that are so numerous at the present day, or is it composed of solid, substantial men? Do they mean business by securing this grant? I do not know but that the policy of the bill may be perfectly correct; but before I vote to grant to any company consisting of persons unknown to Congress twenty sections of land, I desire to have more information on the subject than I have at this time, because by this grant we not only transfer this land, which may be very valuable, but it also becomes a precedent, as it occurs to my mind, which we may be hereafter called upon to follow, and in that respect it assumes an importance. I do not know that after I am further advised upon the subject I shall oppose this bill, but I should like to have more information than I now have about the matter.

Mr. WADE. I know some of these corporations, and they are some of the wealthiest men I know of; they have been engaged long in the iron business. Mr. Ward, of Detroit, is one, who is very extensively engaged and has been for many years in that business. He was applied to to join this enterprise. It was supposed that it would be a great benefit to that western country, to the Pacific railroad, to the working of the mines, and everything else there, if instead of taking all their iron from the East and carrying it thousands of miles over the plains without any roads or proper means of carriage, manufactories could be erected upon the spot where iron to a large amount might be made. It would be a great benefit to the country, and those engaged in it believe that they could make it profitable to themselves. We are all confident that such an enterprise, if successful, will be of the greatest benefit to the people of the country there, enabling them to erect machinery to work their gold mines, and use iron for all the purposes for which iron in a country like that is useful. It is more doubtful in my mind whether it will prove to be a good speculation.

Before such men as Ward and some other wealthy men that are engaged in business—who are not speculators any more than they can speculate out of a legitimate business—would embark in such an enterprise, it was deemed necessary that the company should have a grant of lands something like this, and for this reason, which will occur to the Senator from Oregon in a moment: if they should lay out $200,000 or $300,000 and commence operations there in erecting their furnaces and other works, the people about there would see at once, "These men who are preparing to operate thus extensively will want the timber near by," and they would enter upon the lands immediately and have it in their power to put the furnace company upon just such terms in regard to timber for making coal as they saw fit. These men said at once, "Although it may be a good business for us, provided we can get the means of working it, we will not undertake it unless we can secure the title to enough timber land to make coal sufficient to carry on this business." Is that unreasonable? I know very well that they will not enter on this business unless they can thus acquire a title. They would be very foolish to do so, because the prosperity of their business would immediately be in the hands of strangers that would impose upon them just such terms as they pleased in regard to an essential element without which they cannot make their capital available. All there is in this bill is that it allows the entry of the land before the surveys. They may go now if they can find iron anywhere on lands open to entry, and they may enter all the land they please, provided they can pay for it. They could do so in Montana but for the fact that the land there has not yet been surveyed. They cannot enter it for that reason, and it may not be surveyed for two or three or four years. By this bill they wish barely to acquire just such a right as everybody will have as soon as the land is surveyed. That is all there is about it.

I hope this explanation will be satisfactory. There is no other speculation in it than the contingency of that business that they propose to engage in being profitable. They can work no gold mines, they can acquire no title to any gold or silver mines, nor anything else but iron; and if there should be coal there they would have the advantage of it. It is not very likely they will find any.

Mr. GIMES. I wish I could look at this matter—

Mr. HENDRICKS. I ask the Senator from Iowa to yield that I may call up the other bill. I suppose the Senator from Ohio will not now object. It appears that this is leading to debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The special order was laid aside only informally by unanimous consent. It is now before the Senate.

CONTRACTORS FOR VESSELS AND MACHINERY.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 220) for the relief of certain contractors for the construction of vessels-of-war and steam machinery, the pending question being on the motion of Mr. HENDERSON to postpone the further consideration of the bill until the first Monday in December next.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to give notice that if I can get the consent of a majority of the Senate on Monday, whatever else may interpose, I shall seek to press the passage of the Post Office appropriation bill, and on the next day the Army appropriation bill. The accumulation of business from the Committee on Finance is becoming so great that we feel it our duty to press these appropriation bills on Monday and Tuesday next; and I give this notice now, so that Senators may make their arrangements accordingly, that I shall expect the Post Office and the Army appropriation bills to be disposed of on Monday and Tuesday.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish the attention of the Senate for a few moments to one or two points made against this bill by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CLARK] some days since. It will be recollected by the Senate that the Senator from New Hampshire objected to the bill upon the ground that it provided relief for some persons whose title to relief he doubted. Among others, he selected the contractor for the machinery of the double-enders Chenango and Ascutney, Mr. Quintard. Now I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the very points in the report to which the Senator from New Hampshire alluded in his argument. After showing the excess of the cost over and above the contract price, the report of the board goes on to say:

"That there is no charge in the bill for these vessels for rebracing the boilers; that the causes of delay in building the hull and machinery of the Onondaga were on account of expensive alterations, and also the same as apply to the Chenango and Ascutney; that he was relieved from the time of his contract for this vessel, so far as regards time of completion, by the extensive alterations ordered to be made, and that the Department was fully satisfied that she was finished as soon as possible."

This entire contract for building the machinery of these vessels, the Chenango and Ascutney and for the hull and machinery of the Onondaga was taken together, as I understand; and the report of the board covers in this passage the entire three pieces of work. The loss of Messrs. Quintard & Company was $29,000, shown by the evidence, upon good work, the quality of the work not questioned anywhere. The board finds that their loss upon this particular machinery was $29,000. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa will reduce the allowance to a little less than ten thousand dollars. So where there was an actual loss, as proven before the board—and it is not questioned anywhere—of $29,000, the bill, as amended on the motion of the Senator from Iowa, proposes to allow a little less than ten thousand dollars.

Mr. President, the machinery for the Chenango and for the Ascutney belonged to a class of twenty-two which will be found in the award made by the board; and I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the machinery there contracted for by these men was of a very much heavier and more expensive character than was supposed at the time the work was commenced. It will be recollected by the Senate that there was great demand for this work at the time. The Government was in a strait for a Navy, and it was impossible at the time the contracts were made to have the drawings and specifications prepared so that the contractors might know exactly what they were to build. I will call the attention of the Senate to the evidence in one or two cases merely as illustrative of the class. That there was much more expensive machinery—engines and boilers weighing very much more than was supposed at the time it was made—is established by the testimony of twelve of these establishments. The contractors for the Mattabesett, the Shamrock, the Chicopee, the Tallapoosa, the Otsego, the Metacomet, the Mendota, the Lenapee, the Mackinaw, the Osceola, the Sassacus, and the Pawtuxet, twelve in all, establish the fact that this machinery was much heavier and more expensive than was supposed at the time the contracts were made.

I will refer only to two cases. I read from page 38 of the report of the board, in regard to the Mattabesett and the Shamrock:

"The contract price was $164,000." * * * *
"There is no charge in the bill (annexed to this record and marked No. 38) for any condemned material or faulty workmanship, and it shows the actual cost of labor and material, and the bill of extra work shows a profit of about twenty per cent. At the time of taking these contracts there were no drawings furnished, and it was understood that the engines were to be about the same size and weight of the class of the Paul Jones, but in reality were of very much heavier weight and increased size, which was one of the chief causes of loss to the contractors, over and above the contract price."

Now, I call the attention of the Senate to the case of the machinery for the Pawtuxet, on page 21. There the report says:

"The excess of cost, over and above the contract price, was due to the greater weight of engine than the contractors were led to expect them to be, Mr. Isherwood, chief of the Bureau of Steam Engineering having assured them that they would not exceed those of the Paul Jones class, (three hundred and seventy-four thousand pounds); whereas the weight of one built by them was six hundred and thirty thousand pounds."

Very much above what was supposed by the contractors at the time the contracts were made. The trouble was, that at the time the contracts were entered into, or the bids received, the drawings and specifications were not prepared. I presume these men were sufficiently intelligent in their business to know what would be the weight and expense of an engine in ordinary times if the drawings and specifications were complete; but twelve of these contractors establish in their cases that the machinery was much heavier than was supposed at the time the contracts were made or the bids put in. Although the argument of the Senator from New Hampshire was forcible against this particular class, and was very favorable to another class, I think this entire class of contractors for the machinery are also entitled to relief. I ask the attention of that Senator to the fact that the average of loss to the men who contracted for the machinery was above $25,000, some $29,000, and some $40,000, but the average was about $25,000. Now the proposition of the Senator from Iowa brings down the allowance of each one of these men to less than $10,000.

The contract price for machinery was $32,000. The Senator from Iowa has secured an amendment that there shall be but twelve per cent. allowed upon it, which will be less than $10,000, if my calculation be correct. We are to allow less than $10,000, where the losses average above $25,000. Of that entire class there are two where the loss was only between five and six thousand dollars on each vessel; but in those cases the parties had the iron at the time, and therefore there was no loss upon the material, but all the others averaged, I believe, about twenty-five thousand dollars loss. When the fact is shown in twelve of these cases that the machinery was very much heavier than the contractors were led to suppose at the time, when the further fact is considered that the drawings and specifications were not prepared, and could not be with the greatest diligence, I presume, in the Department, so that the parties might know the precise weight and size of the machinery, I submit whether this little allowance of one third of the actual loss is an unreasonable thing for these parties, the contractors for the machinery, to expect at the hands of the Government.

It may be, Mr. President, that I am all wrong in my views about this; but this fact has had much weight upon my mind: the Government was in a strait; she came into this war with a navy that could not contend with any of the considerable nations of the earth; she had to establish a blockade upon one of the longest coasts in the world, at more points than perhaps were ever blockaded in the world; the Navy Department had to strain every energy possible, it had to require all these workmen to do its work, and when they preferred doing work for individuals rather than going into contracts with the Government they were almost compelled by public sentiment at the demand of the Department to undertake it. They did undertake it, and at an early day, considering the magnitude of the work, they placed upon the ocean a navy that enabled us to defy the Powers of the world, the grandest navy in the world, that makes every port along our coast secure against every hostile Power who may come against it. Is it becoming the dignity and the justice of this nation that these men shall bear a loss in the prosecution of so great a work for the country? For the commanding general that gains a battle we pass a vote of thanks and give a medal; and for illustrious and great deeds in the history of nations monuments are erected; but for these men that placed upon the ocean a navy that makes our coast as secure as it is possible for man to make a coast—for this great work these men, instead of having a medal, or a vote of thanks, or a monument, are to bear a loss, and some of them to go into bankruptcy.

Now, sir, I cannot appreciate the sentiment that requires that these men should bear all this loss. The fact of loss is clearly established. Upon that question no member of the committee had a doubt, no member of the board who examined this question for five minutes had a doubt that they sustained the loss, and that they sustained the loss in many cases because of the interference of the Government; and I submit whether it is becoming in us to let that loss fall altogether upon them. Taking the classes that are objected to by the Senator from New Hampshire, they get but about one third of their loss by the bill as it is now amended, and taking the entire class they get not quite, I believe, fifty per cent. of the entire loss; and I submit, if it is the pleasure of the Senate to relieve these parties, if we can do it more securely to the Government than by passing the bill as now amended. It allows but twelve per cent. in any case upon the contract price. My judgment is satisfied that this is below what is right.

Mr. CLARK. I gave this matter some examination when it was before the Senate at an earlier day. I have given it some examination since; I have given it a more thorough examination since that time than I gave it before; and all the examination and all the attention that I have been able to bestow upon it assure me that the bill ought not to pass. If the Senator from Indiana and those other gentlemen of the Senate who have this bill in charge had turned their attention to examining the cases individually, and would show us which ought to be provided for, and which ought not, I could agree to vote for those that ought to pass, and cheerfully vote for them; but when they bring here forty-two cases and do not pretend that all ought to pass, but that some are good and some bad, and thus make the good carry the bad, I cannot quite agree to the whole.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Senator does not quite place the committee right. The committee who make this report think that each case ought to be relieved. That was the opinion of the committee, but the equities of some were not quite so strong as others.

Mr. CLARK. Then I will understand the Senator as representing the committee, and the committee as being of the opinion which he now states, that they all ought in equity to be relieved. Will the Senator allow me to ask him if he is of that same opinion still, that they all ought to be relieved?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Yes, sir, I am.

Mr. CLARK. Then I will ask the Senator to follow me as I examine some of these cases, one by one; and I will ask him by and by, when I come to some of these cases, whether he is then of the opinion still. I ask the Senator to turn his attention first to the cases of the Agawam and the Pontoosuc. I examined, I think, three cases when I spoke to the Senate before—the cases of the Iosco, the Massasoit, and the Chenango. I have been through the list on page 2 of the table of "double-enders, wooden hulls," I think, including eleven or twelve, and I find them all much in the same condition. I now take the two which come next to the Iosco, the Agawam and the Pontoosuc. If Senators will turn to page 8 of the report of the commission, composed of Selfridge, Fletcher, and Eldredge, they will find the statement of the person who built the hulls:

"Regarding the contracts for the United States steamers Pontoosuc and Agawam: there appeared before the board George W. Lawrence, ship-builder, of Warren, Maine, and constructor and contractor for the above vessels built by him, at Portland, Maine, and having been duly sworn, stated that the above vessels were constructed at the same time by him, and the cost shown is that of both together. That both contracts were signed on September 9, 1862, and the vessels to be launched in one hundred and twenty-six days, or on January 13, 1863. That the Agawam was launched on April 21, 1863, and the Pontoosuc on the following May 20, 1863, and on those same days, respectively, delivered over to the engine-builders; that the delay in launching was, on his part, of no loss or inconvenience to the Government, having been delayed on account of certain valves, &c., required previous to launching, having not been fitted in place by the Portland Works, contractors for the steam machinery."

These vessels were detained on the ways some two or three months by the want of the valves by the persons who were to furnish the steam machinery.

"That the contract price for each vessel was $75,000," or $150,000 for the two. Here I want to call attention to what was the contract price, or what was the cost of the machinery of the Paul Jones. Can the Senator from Indiana tell me?

Mr. HENDRICKS. No, sir; I cannot.

Mr. CLARK. Can the Senator from Nevada tell me what was the contract price for the machinery of the Paul Jones?

Mr. NYE. I cannot tell now, but I can find out.

Mr. CLARK. Perhaps I can inform the Senator. I do not know precisely, but my information is—and my information comes from the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs—that it was $52,000, or not to exceed $55,000. I understand that to be correct.

Mr. GRIMES. Yes, sir.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I ask the Senator when the Paul Jones's machinery was built.

Mr. CLARK. I cannot state precisely when it was built.

Mr. GRIMES. The Paul Jones was built some time before the contract was made for these other vessels. The engines of these other vessels, for which $82,000 was contracted to be paid, were considerably heavier than that of the Paul Jones.

Mr. CLARK. That was precisely the point to which I desired to bring attention. These men complain that they supposed the engines they were to build were to be about the weight of the engine of the Paul Jones, and that they cost more because they were heavier. Now, the fact is that the machinery of the Paul Jones cost $52,000, or not exceeding $55,000, and the Government gave from $75,000 to $80,000, $90,000, and over $100,000 for these engines for the reason that they were heavier.

Mr. GRIMES. Eighty-two thousand dollars.

Mr. CLARK. Eighty-two thousand dollars for some, and some higher than that, I think.

Mr. GRIMES. Eighty-two thousand dollars for those that were made on the model of the Paul Jones.

Mr. CLARK. The same model. Now, it is evident at once to the Senate that they had their consideration for it, and they are not to be allowed to come here and complain that the engines were heavier than that of the Paul Jones, when their price was proportionably heavier. But I want to go along with these hulls.

"That the contract price for each vessel was $75,000 each, $150,000. The total cost of both vessels, including all extra work, $189,429.40. That there was paid by the Government for extra work $10,319.93; allowance made for material sold after completion of vessel, $1,587.93; allowance made for material on hand after completion of vessel, $1,300; making a total for extras of $13,207.86. That the total cost of both vessels over and above the contract stipulations and amounts paid by the bureau for extra work was $17,221.54."

Precisely that sum is reported here; for each vessel $8,610.77 allowed by the board.

"The contractors for the steam machinery were allowed fifty days after the launching, in order to erect it on board, which time expired in the case of the Agawam on June 10, 1863, but that she was not by them delivered to the Government until December 9, 1863, two hundred and thirty-two days."

Here is the point: here was this Government engaged in blockading a coast many times larger than ever had been attempted before; they wanted the vessels, they contracted for the vessels, they stipulated to have them at a given time; but these people did not deliver them for more than a year afterward, some six months, some nine months, some twelve months after they had agreed to deliver them; and all that time prices were rising; and now they come in here and ask us to pay, not for the vessels at the contract price after that time, but to pay for all the extras they were put to by reason of their delay. After so long a time elapsed beyond the time at which the vessels were to be completed, if the Government had said, "We will not take these vessels; we wanted them for blockading the coast; but you did not furnish them in time; the war is well-nigh toward its end; we will not take them," could these contractors have complained? But the Government did not say that. The Government said, "We will take the vessels; we will pay you the price which we stipulated, even at this late day;" and yet these contractors are not content. They want the Government not only to pay them the price which it agreed to pay, nine months or a year after the time had elapsed, when it had been denied the use of the vessels, but also to pay the extra price which arose by the enhancement of labor and materials while they were thus delaying.

"And in the case of the Pontoosuc, instead of the machinery being completed on July 9, 1863, when the fifty days expired!"

Two years nearly before the war closed—

"she was delayed until May 16, 1864, or three hundred and sixty-one days."

That was within less than a year of the time of the surrender of Lee. She was detained for the want of the machinery three hundred and sixty-one days, only four days less than a year, enhancing the price of the hull, which we are obliged to pay, depriving the Government of the use of the vessel, and then calling upon us to pay this enhanced price. Does the Senator from Indiana think that quite right? I will ask him, then, to turn with me over to pages 16 and 17, and let us see about the machinery for the Pontoosuc and the Agawam.

"Appeared before the board Edward H. Davis, treasurer of the Portland Company, Portland, Maine, on the part of the company, contractors for the machinery of the double-enders Pontoosuc and Agawam. Under oath states, that the contract for these vessels was dated, by the Navy Department, August 30, 1862."

A little more than a year after the war commenced—

"in which they were allowed one and a half month from April 21, 1863, the time of receiving the hull of the Agawam from the builders, to complete the machinery of said vessel, and one and a half month from May 20, 1863, the time of receiving the hull of the Pontoosuc from the builders, to complete the machinery of said vessels and deliver them to the Government; but the Agawam was not so completed and delivered until November 30, 1863; the Pontoosuc until April 14, 1864."

Now, I ask the Senator's attention particularly to this part of the report, if he will give it to me, to what these people say themselves in regard to it:

"The principal cause of delay was from the difficulty of the work, and being unprepared for the manufacture of marine engines, the works having been employed, previous to making this contract, in the building of locomotives principally; labor was obtained with difficulty, and when obtained, of an inferior kind."

Here is this very remarkable statement—I invite the attention of the Senate to it—that these men undertook work which they were not prepared for, which they were not skilled in, which they found to be difficult, and for which their shop was not prepared, and they were thus delayed two hundred and seventy and three hundred and sixty days in the two cases by their own inability and want of preparation for the work which they undertook; and yet they come forward and ask you to pay them $40,000 apiece on each vessel. That is the report on each of these vessels which were delayed thus by their own insufficiency in preparation for the work. If a man who is unskilled in work undertakes to do it, and binds himself to do it, who is to suffer for it? That was exactly this case; and now I want to ask the Senator from Indiana whether he thinks that men who had not the ability to do the work, and who found it difficult, whose shop was not fit for it—they had not been used to building marine engines, they had been used to building locomotives—I want to ask him whether, when such men undertake work of that kind, for which they are not fitted and for which they are not prepared, the Government ought to pay all the extra expense they are put to by such unskillfulness and want of preparation? They do not say a word about the engines being heavier, that I remember, and yet they may. I will look and see; they go on to state:

"That the machinery for both vessels cost $222,606 79; that the bills for extra work still unpaid are $1,219 37—total cost, $223,826 16; that the contract price was, for both vessels, $164,000; leaving a balance, the excess of cost to them over and above the contract price, including amount claimed for extra bills, of $59,826 16."

Resulting, as they say, from the difficult character of the work, from their not being prepared for it in their shops, because they had not been used to building marine engines, but to building locomotives, and because they could not get labor and materials. That is the statement they make themselves; and what is worse than all this, when they ask you to pay $59,826 16 extra, they go on to say:

"That there is no charge in this bill for proportion of general expenses in running the works, which is estimated to be twelve and a half on the whole amount, which is a minimum charge, amounting in all to $26,712 81, which they claim as a part of the actual cost of the vessels' machinery."

They sustained a loss on the contracts of $59,826 16 on the two engines, and then they wanted $26,712 81 as interest on their tools, which they say were not fitted for such work, and which delayed the work; and this board actually allowed them $21,041 36 for interest on these tools which were not fit for the work, and swelled the whole amount of allowance up to over eighty thousand dollars. This board report for these two vessels completed in that way about ninety-seven thousand dollars extra. They report on each of the hulls $8,610 77, and on each of the engines $40,433 73 to these men who undertook work which they could not perform, for which they were not prepared, and which they delayed the Government in getting, one of them within four days of a whole year, when the Government wanted the work.

Now, I want to ask the Senator a question. He says that when a general fights a battle and wins a victory, we vote him thanks. Do we vote thanks to that commander who is ten miles behind and does not get up into line? Most of these men were a year behind and did not begin to form in line at the time they said they would, deprived the Government of the use of the vessels all the time they were so hanging back. The price was going up and enhancing, and they ask the Government to pay that enhanced price which arose from their own delay. That is the statement of the case. I ask the Senator from Indiana if he is in favor of paying the two men who built these two engines. Did not the Government do all for them that the Government ought to do when they took these engines off their hands, nearly a year afterward, and paid them the full price under the contract? If the Government had said to these men, "You have been delaying this work; we have suffered for the want of these engines; you agreed to furnish them at a certain time, but you did not furnish them; we must deduct so much from your pay;" what could these men have said? What would an individual have said in a case of that kind? Suppose one individual had contracted with another to furnish him a marine engine on a given day, and he did not furnish it until a year after, and that man had been losing all his trade and business by the want of that engine, what would an individual have said? He would have recovered damages, and he would have been entitled to damages. He would have recovered damages such as he could have shown in any court. But the Government did not say that; the Government did not say to these men, "We must have damages from you for not fulfilling this contract;" the Government went forward liberally, at the end of the time, took the engines, and paid the men the money. Now they are not satisfied. They come in here and say, "We must have more; it is very true we delayed you; it is very true in the case of the Agawam we were two hundred and twenty-three days behind; it is very true in the other case of the Pontoosuc that we were three hundred and sixty-one days behind; but the Government ought to be generous." I agree the Government should be liberal; but when men come into the Congress of the United States and ask the Government to be generous, they should show that they performed good service for the Government. The bill is now in a better situation than it was some days ago; but if we give these men what this bill provides, twelve per cent., we shall pay them over nineteen thousand dollars for delaying work in that way, for delaying work by their own unskillfulness, for delaying work which they could not accomplish for the want of proper experience, for delaying work for want of proper shops and tools; and they knew when they undertook that work just what their shops and tools were fitted for, and they knew that their experience had been in locomotives and not in marine engines.

Now, Mr. President, if it could be shown on the part of these contractors that they undertook this work unwillingly, that the Government came to them and besought them to take up this work, that they objected to it, that they stated to the Government they were not used to doing it, that their tools were not prepared for it, that their shop was not fitted for it, that they had doubts whether they could carry it through in the time stated, and that the Government then urged them, and said, "We must have this work from some quarter; we will run the risk, and you must undertake it and do the best you can," that would have been one thing; but there is not a particle of proof of anything of that kind. They do not suggest it. These men were anxious to get these contracts; many of them were exceedingly anxious to get them, some not so much so. When the persons to whom the Senator has alluded took the contracts the weight of the engines was specified and they knew what they had got to do. It is true they undertook before that to build them, and had gone on before they got the contracts to commence their work; but they had signed no contract, and if when the contract came and the specifications came, they found the work heavier than they expected or agreed to do, it was easy to say, "Mr. Secretary of the Navy, that is not what I undertook; you represented to me that these engines were to be of the weight of those of the Paul Jones; I cannot agree to do that," the objection would have been considered; but that is not this case nor either of these cases which I am considering, for neither of these men allege that he did not understand what the weight of the engines was, nor does either of them allege that it was heavier than he expected when he undertook the contract.

I come now to the case of the Osceola, which is found on pages 6 and 7 of the report of the board:

"Appeared before the board E. F. Tilden, of the firm of Curtis & Tilden, ship-builders and constructors of the United States steamers Massasoit and Osceola. Under oath states the whole amount of cost of above vessels to have been $63,597 35; the amount of extra work allowed and paid by bureau $7,340 57; the amount of contracts $50,000; the cost of these vessels over and above the contract price and allowance paid for extra work to be $8,256 78. That the contract for the hull of the Massasoit was dated September 10, 1862, and the vessel to be launched on January 14, 1863, (one hundred and twenty-six days.)"

I shall skip the Massasoit, as I believe I made some observations on that the other day.

Very nearly the same time, it will be seen, was allowed for building all these vessels.

"That the contract for the hull of the Osceola was dated October 15, 1862, and the vessel to be launched on February 8, 1863, (one hundred and twenty-six days.) That the vessel was ready for launching April 15, 1862, but was not launched until May 23, being detained on the ways—the bed-plates not being completed and put in the vessel by the engine-builders."

Here is the same excuse, the same difficulty—the engines were behind, the bed-plates were not put in.

"That the vessel was delivered to the contractors for steam machinery on May 23; that they were allowed fifty days, or until July 12, to erect on board the engine, &c., but occupied until November 27, 1863."

Here was a delay of one hundred and thirty-eight days beyond the stipulated time. They were to have fifty days, and they took one hundred and eighty-eight; nearly four times as many. These contractors say:

"By the delay on the part of the engine-builders to complete the machinery, they [Curtis & Tilden] were unable to complete the work on the two vessels and receive the several payments as agreed upon in their contracts, and also suffered pecuniary loss from the great rise in labor and material during that time."

That is, during the time they were delayed.

Mr. NYE. Let me ask the Senator from New Hampshire one question, whether it was not a fact that the engines and the hulls were separate contracts. The engines constituted one contract and the hulls another.

Mr. CLARK. Certainly.

Mr. NYE. Then the man who built the hull was not to blame.

Mr. CLARK. The man who built the hull, if he performed his contract in time, would not be to blame; and I do not know that in this case the firm of Curtis & Tilden, though they did not get their vessel off until two months after, were to blame, because they were delayed by the men who were to build the machinery and put it in; they were delayed for the want of bed-plates. But the machine-builders undertook to contract with the Government that the machinery should be ready. This firm made a contract that the hull should be done at a certain time, and the engines were to be put in in so many days after. The hulls were delayed by the engine-builders in not putting in what should have been put in earlier, and were then delayed by these same machine-builders for a great length of time, four months after the time allowed. The Senator says the man who built the hull was not to blame; but who was? The man who built the machinery; and yet you put the man who built the hull and the man who built the machinery together, and serve them both exactly alike. That is the effect of your bill. Somebody is to blame. The Government were defrauded of this vessel—I said defrauded, I mean deprived of the use of this vessel—about two hundred days by somebody. By whom? By one or the other; and yet you propose to pay both. Now, if the man who built the hull was not to blame, pay him alone, but do not undertake to pay the man who deprived him of the power of putting his work in the water and delivering it at the time he agreed to do—the man who built the machinery. Now, will the Senator from Nevada and the Senator from Indiana turn to page 17 and let us see about this machinery?

"Appeared before the board Oliver Edwards, president of the Atlantic Works, East Boston, on the part of the company, contractors for the machinery of the double-enders Sassacus and Osceola. Under oath states, that the contract for the Osceola was dated September 20, 1862, and for the Sassacus, October 15, 1862, in which they were allowed seven months, or until April, 1863, and May, 1863, to complete the machinery of said vessels and deliver them to the Government, but the Sassacus was not so completed and delivered until September, 1863, and the Osceola until November, 1863."

And here the whole summer of 1863 passed away, when these vessels should have been operating in the southern Atlantic in the blockade, or elsewhere; the most favorable part of the year passed away, and the vessels were still delayed at the wharf for the want of machinery; and yet this is not a liberal Government that will come forward and pay the men what it agreed to pay after such a delay.

It is not liberal to lose the use of your vessel all the summer, and then in November pay for it the same as if you had had it originally; but it must be liberal to take it off the contractors' hands and pay their bills.

"The principal causes of delay"—

This is their own statement; it is not anything as to the weight of the engine, but it is the delay I am now complaining of—

"The principal causes of delay being the difficulty of obtaining labor and material, as the Government was putting out so much work."

It was this very work that the Government was putting out that these people undertook to do, and undertook to do in a given time, for a given price, and which they delayed to do, and for which they received a full price, and are now not satisfied. The company was relieved by the Navy Department of the term of the contract regarding the time of the completion of the machinery. They found that they could not get along with it, and this Government, that it is said should be liberal, was not hard; it extended the time, and then they went on; and they say "that it was finished as soon as possible; that the total cost of the machinery for both vessels was $205,027 46." Here was a small vessel, the contract price for building the hull of which was only $25,000, and yet the price of one of these engines, as made by the machine-builders when they got through, was $102,513 83.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I will state to the Senator that it is very evident that that is a mistake in the printing of the report.

Mr. CLARK. Is not the record right?

Mr. HENDRICKS. There is a mistake in printing.

Mr. CLARK. What should it be?

Mr. HENDRICKS. They all cost the same price. Eighty-two thousand dollars was the contract price.

Mr. CLARK. They do not undertake to say what was the contract price, but what was the cost of building the engines. I am speaking of the cost to the builder.

Mr. HENDRICKS. It ought to be $82,000. That was the contract price; and then the cost beyond that was what it cost the contractor above the contract price.

Mr. CLARK. If the Senator will give his attention to the report he will see that there is no mistake here—"that the total cost of machinery for both vessels was $205,027 46." That is what it cost the builders, as they say "that the contract price of both vessels paid by the Government was $164,000."

Mr. HENDRICKS. I was not observing the report there. The mistake that I alluded to is in another case, where the cost is printed as being $50,000, when it should evidently be $150,000. This is correctly printed.

Mr. CLARK. I thought there were some mistakes in the report, but I am not mistaken here. This is correct. The hull cost $25,000, and the machinery $102,500.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I understand this now. My attention was not given to what the Senator was saying at the time. I thought he said that the cost of the machinery was $50,000.

Mr. CLARK. No.

Mr. HENDRICKS. It is stated that the cost of the hulls was $50,000.

Mr. CLARK. The two.

Mr. HENDRICKS. But evidently that ought to be $150,000. There is no doubt about that. The contract price was $150,000, and the cost $165,000. It is just $100,000 less than it ought to be. It is a mistake in printing there.

Mr. CLARK. I do not know but that that is so.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Unquestionably so. It belongs to a class.

Mr. CLARK. But it is not material to the argument, as I understand. This man says the excess of cost was $41,027 46 for the two. Now, I want to call the Senate's attention to what appears in regard to these two classes of vessels. The contract price for the Agawam and the Pontoosuc, as found on pages 16 and 17, was $164,000, just the same that it was for the Massasoit, the Sassacus, and the Osceola. The Senator from Indiana says these vessels were the same class, and the contract price was the same. Now, I want Senators to note the fact that when George W. Lawrence & Co. build the Agawam and the Pontoosuc, they make them cost $17,000 above the contract price; but when Curtis & Tilden build the same class they make them cost only about nine thousand dollars beyond the contract price; and in the case of the Pontoosuc and the Agawam, the engine-builders make the engines cost $80,000 beyond the contract price; and in the other case, the Atlantic Works only make them cost $41,000 beyond the contract price. Why that difference? Why should this Government pay one set of builders $80,000 beyond the contract price, and another set of builders, for two engines of exactly the same class, $41,000 above the contract price? How happens it, except from the unskillfulness and the want of diligence on the part of these men in building these engines? And yet this report says pay these gentlemen at Portland $80,000 beyond the price, and pay these gentlemen at Boston $40,000 beyond the price. It seems to me, a man had only to delay his work the longer to get the more money, for they give him all he says it cost him; and so the longer he delayed and the more it cost, the more they gave him.

Now, Mr. President, I ask Senators to turn to the Chicopee. I have been through the whole range of these double-enders; they are in the same way. I do not want to weary the Senate, but I want to show enough of these cases to let the Senate see what they are about to pass upon. I do not deny that there may be some good cases here; I think some of the gentlemen who built the hulls of these vessels and were delayed in this way are entitled to the additional expense; but I do not think the men who put on board the engines and loaded them down with delay and deprived the Government of them for that extent of time should also be paid for that delay. On page 17 you will find the statement of Mr. Curtis, who built the Chicopee:

"Appeared before the board Paul Curtis, ship-builder, Boston, and contractor for the double-ender Chicopee. Under oath states, that the contract for the Chicopee was dated by the Navy Department September 9, 1862, in which he was allowed one hundred and twenty-six days, or until January 13, 1863—

The contracts were all given out at about the same time, and they were to be ready at about the same period—

"to launch the vessel and deliver her to the engine-builders; but the vessel was not put in the water until March 4, 1863, as the engine-builders (Neptune Iron-Works) were not ready to erect the engines on board."

The same excuse again. It would almost seem that these fellows had got this excuse stereotyped; they all agree upon it. They were delayed by the engine-builders!

"That the vessel was delivered to the Neptune Iron-Works March 11, 1863, and they were allowed fifty days, or until May 1, 1863, to erect the engines on board, but the machinery was not completed and put on board until April 1, 1864, at which time she was delivered at the navy-yard, New York."

They were to have had it on board May 1, 1863; they did not have it on board until April 1, 1864, eleven months afterward.

"By which delay on the part of the engine-builders he was at great loss, by being obliged to pay larger prices for material and labor to complete the vessel. That the entire cost of the vessel, including bill for extra work, amounting to $7,115 09, was $97,674 61; that the contract price of the vessel, delivered in New York, was $75,000; that he has received from the bureau for extra work, $3,304 20; total amount received from Government, $78,304 20; leaving a balance of loss to him, over and above the contract price and allowance for extra work, of $18,870 41."

Now, turn to the table again. Paul Curtis built one of these vessels, taken at the same time, at the same rate, when labor was scarce and materials scarce; the contract price was $75,000, and she cost $97,674 61, making an excess over the contract price and extra allowance of $18,870 41; four times almost as much as the extra cost price in the case of Curtis & Tilden. Now, we are asked to pay this, and the committee say this is right and this is fair; and they want to give a percentage to the whole. I do not see any fairer about it. If it is right that Curtis & Tilden should have $4,000 above the contract price, it should be right that Paul Curtis should have the same unless he shows a difference, and he fails to show any.

Now turn to page 44, and you will find the case of the machinery of the Chicopee:

"Appeared before the board Mr. William Boardman, one of the proprietors and on the part of the Neptune Iron-Works, contractors for the machinery of the Chicopee and Tallapoosa. Under oath states, that the contract for the vessel was dated by the Navy Department August 15, 1862, in which they were allowed seven months, or two months after the receipt of the hulls from the builders thereof, to complete and erect the machinery on board; but that the Chicopee was not received until March 11, 1863, and the machinery was completed, and trial trip satisfactorily concluded on January 23, 1864; and the Tallapoosa was not received until March 16, 1863, and the machinery was completed, and trial trip also satisfactorily concluded March 12, 1864; they were relieved by letter from Department in regard to the time of completion of contract prior to the signing of the contract. That the actual cost of machinery was, including extra bill of $2,065 75 yet unpaid, $206,004 35; contract price received from Government, $164,000; leaving an excess of cost, over and above the contract price, of $42,004 35."

Twenty-one thousand dollars on each vessel for delaying her at the wharf eleven months, depriving the Government of the use of her all through the summer of 1863 and the fall of 1863, the winter of 1863 and 1864 up to April in the spring of 1864; and yet this very big-gardly Government, this Government that is exhorted so much to deal fairly by these gentlemen, deprived of the use of this vessel for eleven months, comes forward and pays the contract price, pays the full bill for extra work, and then is asked to pay all the enhanced cost by reason of the delay. Is it fair? Is that the kind of liberality you would recommend to your Government to the tax-payers? Now, as to a contract between two individuals where one stipulated to have a given work done by a given time and he failed for a year to do it, if the man who contracted for the work should come forward and take it off that man's hands and pay him the price and say, "Here, you have done the work and I will pay you the full price and take it, though I have been delayed," would not that be considered liberal? Would the man that had done the work ask for anything more? Yet here they undertake to say we must pay not only this individual man, not only this individual firm, but we must pay every one of these forty-two right straight through twelve per cent. on the whole contract price, not because they would not be glad to have more, but because they have loaded it so down with the weight of delay that they know these iron-clads will not swim with such a load upon them.

Mr. President, I suppose it is hardly necessary that I should go through with case after case of this kind. You may take any one of these double-enders and you will find much the same state of things. I cannot say that you will in every case, because I have not examined; I cannot affirm or deny; but I say that in all the cases I have examined I find this same state of things. And now I will ask the Senator from Nevada if he can tell me where in this report. I shall find the report in regard to the hull of the Mendota. Has the Senator seen it? Does he know it is there?

Mr. NYE. I think it is here.

Mr. CLARK. I will ask the Senator from Indiana. These gentlemen have undoubtedly considered this case. I want them to tell me where in the report of this commission I can find the report as to the building of the hull of the Mendota. I state to them that I have been unable to find it; that is as it is put down here. I want to know from them if they have found it, and if they have examined it. I wait, Mr. President, for those Senators to show me, if they can, where the Mendota is found here.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Do you want an answer right now?

Mr. CLARK. If you know where it is found.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I will examine.

Mr. CLARK. Has the Senator seen it and examined it?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Yes, sir, and I will find it presently.

Mr. CLARK. Well, Mr. President, perhaps I can help these gentlemen a little. I only wanted to see the care with which they have examined this report.

Mr. NYE. When we ask you to help us we will let you know. I propose to answer you.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator from Nevada in his quiet way says that when they find it they will let me know.

Mr. NYE. No, I did not say that.

Mr. CLARK. Or in substance, that when they ask for my aid they will let me know.

Mr. NYE. Yes; that was it. You will make your own speech, I suppose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. DOOLITTLE in the chair.) The Senator from Nevada will address the Chair.

Mr. CLARK. I did not know but that possibly I might have fallen into a mistake. I have my own notion about this matter, but I wanted the aid of those honorable Senators in investigating it. I hunted this report through and I could not find the report of the Mendota for building the hull, but I did find something which I suppose was meant for that, but is not that. If the Senators will turn their attention to the fifth page—

Mr. HENDRICKS. I will tell you where you will find it, sir. You will find it on page 5; it is there printed as the Mercedita; reference is also made to it on page 32. That is my understanding.

Mr. CLARK. I suppose that is so. I turned this book through and I could find no such vessel as the Mendota; that is, no contract for the hull. I then resorted to the table. I found the Mendota placed there at such a price, and looking through I came across the name of the builder, Mr. Tucker, of Brooklyn, New York, who is said to have built the Mendota, but here he is reported to have built the Mercedita, and the Mercedita is nowhere to be found in the table. We had a vessel called the Mercedita. I think she was at New Orleans in the fight there. I think she was purchased by the Government; she was not one of these vessels.

"F. Z. Tucker, ship-builder at Brooklyn, Long Island, and constructor of the United States steamer Mercedita, having been duly sworn, stated that the contract for above ship was signed September 9, 1862, to be launched and built (in one hundred and twenty-six days) on January 13, 1863; that the vessel was launched on that day and delivered to engine-builders, after being coppered, on January 24, 1863, to receive her machinery."

This man got his vessel along; she was launched on the day.

"That the total cost of the vessel was $92,475 70, as per statement marked No. 4, and annexed to these proceedings—the contract to have been $75,000; that there was paid by him for extra work done over the price, by order of Inspector S. M. Pook, and others, the sum of $1,020 70, as per statement marked No. 5, and annexed to these proceedings; and also for work done in accordance with specifications, but not required in general advertisements for bids under which the ship was commenced, by authority of the bureau to have been $7,335 75, as per statement marked No. 6, and annexed to these proceedings; leaving a loss on his part, over and above these amounts, of $3,110 27 on the original contract price for the hull; that no money for extra work has ever been paid to him over and above the contract stipulation; that the engines and boilers were to be completed by builders of machinery in fifty days, or March 14, 1863, but was not completed until February 14, 1864, (three hundred and forty days.)"

Eleven months after they were agreed to be furnished they were furnished. All this time the hull of the vessel was rendered useless by the delay of the engine-builders. This man may deserve his price for his hull for aught I know; it is not very much above the contract price—I believe some four thousand dollars; and yet I think there is something in this report that will show the manner in which these costs were made up. I ask the Senators' attention to page 31 in regard to this gunboat Mendota. On the 19th of June, 1865, Mr. Tucker made up his bill of costs for that vessel and presented it to the board. Mr. Naval Constructor Pook was asked about it on page 31, and in regard to that bill he says:

"Having examined the extra bills of F. Z. Tucker, for gunboat Mendota, I am of opinion that some of the charges are improper, and that he be requested to examine and correct them."

Here was this board established for the purpose of ascertaining the cost; they met together, and they notified contractor A to come before the board at such a time; they notified contractor B to come before the board at such a time; and they came, they made up their costs, and then those bills were examined; they were submitted to the naval constructor, he was asked whether they were right and proper; in many of the cases he said they were right and proper. In other cases he said they were not right and proper; and "Mr. Contractor won't you correct them?"

I ask the attention of the Senate for a few moments—because I will not run through all these cases, there are forty-two of them, and they would weary the patience of the Senate and take up too much time—to the case of the engine of the Lenapee, on page 42:

"Appeared before the board Mr. Joseph Belknap, superintendent, and on the part of the Washington Works, contractors for the machinery of the Lenapee. Under oath states, that the contract for the vessel was dated by the Navy Department August 25, 1862, in which they were allowed six and a half months, or within two months after receipt of hull from builders thereof, to complete and erect the machinery on board; but that the vessel was not so received until June 19, 1863, and the machinery was completed August 31, 1864. The principal causes of delay in completing the contract were owing to the bursting of a boiler while being tested, and difficulty in obtaining labor and material."

They have built an imperfect boiler, and while they were testing it it burst, and so they were caused delay.

"That the cost of machinery was $111,161 24; contract price received, $82,000; leaving an excess of cost, over and above contract price, of $29,161 24."

And precisely that amount of cost, $20,161 24, was allowed them when they set down the extra delay to the bursting of a boiler which they had made imperfect. I suppose if they had burst entirely up and blown their shop up, the whole would have been passed in. It does not seem that it made any difference what was claimed, what went into the cost, whether it was interest on shop and tools that were not fitted for the work, whether it was the unskillfulness of the contractors and the workmen, or whether it was the want of preparation, or the bursting of a boiler, or anything else that went into the cost, it was allowed; and now we are asked to pay twelve per cent. on the contract price.

I should be glad to see some measure before the Senate that would do more justice to these people than this. If a man is entitled to the consideration of the Senate, has been delayed by the Government and for that reason has been put to cost, that cost ought to be paid. It should not be twelve per cent. If he has been delayed by his own unskillfulness, his own negligence, his own want of care and skill and industry, then he should not be paid, not twelve per cent. nor any other percentage. These people say:

"That the excess of cost was owing to the rise in labor and material, and also to the fact of the time of the completion of the engine being extended over and above the time specified by the contract, due to the fact of our being unable to procure the necessary labor and material."

I will ask the Senate to turn for a moment to the case of the hull of the Lenapee, which is found on page 13—I think I alluded to this before—where the contract price was $75,500 and the cost price $150,000, more than double what the Government offered to give them. They contracted to do this work for $75,500, and they say the total cost of the vessel, including the bill for extra work, was $152,691 37. Now, Paul Curtis, of Boston, built the Chicopee, a vessel of the same class with the Lenapee. He took his contract on the 9th of September, 1862; and Edward Lupton, the contractor for the Lenapee, took his contract on the 9th of September, 1862, precisely the same day. Of course the same price for materials was to be paid by both. The same prices for labor were to be paid by both. One was operating in New York, near the commercial center, and the other was operating at Boston. They were each allowed one hundred and twenty-six days, until January 13, 1863, to complete their contract. Mr. Curtis put his ship into the water on the 4th of March, 1863, and Mr. Lupton put his in the water on the 7th of June, 1863, three months afterward. Mr. Curtis built his ship for $97,674 61, and Mr. Lupton made his ship cost $152,691 37. Under oath, he stated that to be the cost. The commission did not see fit to allow him such a bill of costs as that, but they did allow Mr. Lupton $18,576 52, $2,000 more than they allowed anybody else, and more than four times as much as they allowed Mr. Curtis.

I do not know that it is worth while for me to pursue these cases further. There are several more of them that I have examined, and they lead to the same result as those I have stated to the Senate. In general, the work upon the hulls of the wooden vessels seems to have been done with much more rapidity, and much nearer the time at which they were to be delivered, than the work on the machinery.

I suppose, when the Government was hiring hands for its navy-yards and its ships, and when the men were going into the Army and the Navy, there was a difficulty in obtaining labor; but I do not understand why the difficulty was so much greater in procuring mechanics for ship machinery than procuring ship-carpenters in yards. Both employments require skill; both are carried on by artisans peculiarly fitted for the profession; and yet the men who built the hulls seem to have had far less difficulty than the men who undertook to build the machinery. But, sir, you undertake by this bill to give precisely the same percentage to the men who built the machinery, and from whom most of the delay came, that you do to the men who built the hulls. I do not undertake to find fault with the men who built the machinery for these vessels. I do not undertake to talk about the mechanic. I undertake to talk simply about the cases that are presented here. I have examined the report which has been presented here by the commission. I have taken the testimony which these gentlemen have furnished themselves; and I can come to no other conclusion whatever than that this bill ought not to pass.

I do not mean to say that there are not some persons included in this bill who might be entitled to perhaps all that this bill proposes to give them; there are others who are perhaps entitled to the twelve per cent. which the amendment proposes to give them; but I am entirely satisfied there are men here who ought not to have the twelve per cent. I am entirely persuaded that this leveling process of giving a percentage to all these people, no matter how they have done their work, how faithfully or unfaithfully, how skillfully or unskillfully, is not the true principle of legislation.

Sir, if a man has built, for instance, Army wagons under a contract with the Government, and he has found labor and material enhanced, why should you not give him twelve per cent.? If a man has made guns for the Government, whether small-arms or ordnance, by contract, why should you not give him twelve per cent.? They worked for the Government; they are mechanics; they are deserving; the derangement was the same to all. Why should you not say, by a general omnibus bill, that everybody who contracted for labor and material for the Government should have twelve per cent. over and above the contract price? Some of them made money, it is true; but the price of labor was enhanced to them just as much, the price of machinery was enhanced just as much, and the price of material.

I believe, sir, that the pending question is the motion of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENDERSON] to postpone the bill until the next session of Congress. I shall vote for the motion to postpone, if the friends of the bill desire to have it postponed, if they think any measure can be arrived at which shall do justice, I mean individual justice, to these people; but if the bill is not postponed I shall vote against its passage as it stands. I know we are urged to pay the twelve per cent. I know it is said that it does not take more than half as much as the committee report, and you had better give that to them; the Government will have as much to pay in the end. But, sir, I want to be more discriminating. If I pay the money, I want to pay the money to the men who ought to have it, and not to the men who do not deserve to have it. Assume me that every one of these men ought to have the twelve per cent., and I will yield; but until that time comes I must vote against the bill.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I have but a very few remarks to make in reply to the Senator from New Hampshire, and when I shall have made them, I shall have said all that I intend to say upon this measure, so far as I am concerned. It shall then depend on the pleasure of the Senate. I shall not undertake to reply to all that the Senator has said. Much that he has said I attempted to explain on a former occasion; for instance, his comparison of the expense and cost of some of these vessels to some of the contractors, as compared with the cost to other contractors. I undertook to explain (as is explained in the report) on a former occasion, that peculiar circumstances caused the machinery to cost some men more than others, and the hulls some men more than others. I thought I had explained that sufficiently heretofore in answer to another gentleman.

Now, sir, I will call attention to a few of the cases to which the Senator has alluded; for instance, the Lenapee on page 13. Leaving the Senator's argument alone, it would produce the impression upon the Senate that this board had allowed a very improper claim. The contractors for the Lenapee undertook to build that vessel for $75,000. They claim that she cost $152,000, making a claim of $77,000 of cost over and above the contract price; while other contractors for vessels contracted for at the same time, and just like the Lenapee, only claim from $14,000 to $18,000.

Mr. CLARK. Some of them but a little over four thousand dollars.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I explained those; those were peculiar cases; but the average was about from $14,000 to $18,000. If the board had allowed to the contractors of the Lenapee $77,000, and to others only from $14,000 to $18,000, the Senate, of course, would be astonished at such a result; but the case of the Lenapee was heard; all the evidence on the subject considered; and the board did not allow the claim of $77,000.

Mr. CLARK. So I stated.

Mr. HENDRICKS. It allowed but $18,000.

Mr. CLARK. I stated that the board allowed about $2,000 above what they allowed in any other case.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I know; but the Senator failed to state the further fact that of the $18,000 allowed, $6,000 was for extra work, not within the contract at all, not yet paid for; so that upon the Lenapee the board allowed for cost of the work over and above the contract price, only $12,000. Is there anything in that case to prejudice the Senate against the bill? And yet the argument of the Senator was as plausible in that case as perhaps in any other.

Now, sir, we will take up the case of the Mendota, on page 31. Naval Constructor Pook was called as a witness, and his testimony will be found on page 31. He testifies that some of the charges made by the contractors for that vessel ought not to be allowed, and, comparing the claim made by the contractors with the award of the board, I take it that those items were not allowed. So much for that case.

The next case is the Chicopee on pages 17 and 44. On page 17 it appears that the contractors for the hull were delayed in completing that vessel by the failure to complete the machinery, as they claimed, and therefore it cost them something more on that account than it otherwise would have cost. Now, let us see what is the claim of the contractors for the machinery. We will take that case to which the Senator has referred, and I wish to go a little further than the Senator did. I call the attention of the Senate to page 44 of the report, as the Senator did, and let us see whether the argument ought to have all the force that the Senator gives it. He gives it as much force as it is possible for it to receive. He makes the case thus: the contractors for the hull were delayed in the completion of their work, and loss was sustained by them, because the machinery was not finished according to the agreement of the contractors. Now, how does the case stand? It appears that the contract was signed on the 15th day of August, 1862, at the Department, and the machinery was to be finished in seven months, two months after the completion of the hull. The Chicopee was not received until March, 1863:

"The machinery was completed and trial trip satisfactorily concluded in January 24, 1864."

It ought to have been completed in June, 1863, but was not completed until January, 1864.

"And the Tallapoosa was not received until March, 16, 1863, and the machinery was completed and trial trip also satisfactorily concluded March 12, 1864"—ten months after the time limited for the completion of the work. The report goes on to say that the contractors "were relieved by letter from Department, in regard to the time of completion of contract, prior to the signing of the contract."

I ask Senators, how does that come? Here is a bid made; the specifications are not before the bidder; he has no opportunity to know exactly the style of the work; the party goes on with the work; and before the contract is reduced to writing and signed, a letter of the Department relieves him from the time agreed upon. I ask the attention of the Senate to this sentence:

"They were relieved by letter from Department, in regard to the time of completion of contract, prior to the signing of the contract."

A different time was allowed, the Department becoming satisfied that it was impossible to complete this work within the time specified, within seven months:

"That the actual cost of machinery was, including extrabill of $2,665 75 yet unpaid, $208,004 35; contract price received from Government, $164,000; leaving an excess of cost, over and above the contract price, of $44,004 35. That the excess of cost was owing to the great rise in labor and material, and difficulty in procuring the same."

I believe the Senator stopped just there; but I will ask the attention of the Senate a little further.

Mr. CLARK. What page is the Senator reading from?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Page 44:

"There are many reasons why the engines cost more than the amount of contract: first, when the engines were contracted for, drawings and specifications were not furnished us, and we were totally ignorant as to the weight of said engines, boilers, &c. From the best information and belief, we were led to suppose the machinery would weigh about three hundred and eighty or three hundred and ninety thousand pounds, and have to say that the raw material was worth about the amount of the contract, for the reason of the great excess of weight of metal over and above our estimate. We would also state, that owing to the losses on these vessels in connection with those contracted for in 1861, namely, the Octo-rara and Genesee, we have been compelled to make an assignment. That there is no charge in the bill (annexed to this record and marked No. 42) for any condemned material or faulty workmanship, and that the bill shows the actual cost of labor and material."

I ask the attention of the Senate to this case, one of the cases upon which the Senator made a very forcible argument. The facts are these: before the contract was signed a letter from the Department relieved the parties from the time fixed by the contract, seven months, and allowed them such time as was actually necessary for the construction of the machinery; and secondly, when the contract was made the Department was not prepared to furnish the contractors with the drawings and specifications, and therefore they could not know the exact dimensions of the machinery; and when they came to construct this machinery they found that the raw material, the iron alone, cost them about what they would receive for the machinery when finished. Is there no equity there? Is there no justice for these claimants, as shown upon the report, in the very case that the Senator makes a forcible argument upon? Is there nothing to be considered by the Senate in the fact that the Department, before the contract was signed, found that it was impossible for the machinery to be constructed within the time limited, and by letter allowed them a longer time? Is it not to be considered by the Senate that when the contract was made the specifications and drawings were not prepared, the parties were not informed so as to form a judgment of the size and weight and cost of this machinery? Is it not to be considered by the Senate that when the work came to be made, it was found that the material itself cost the contractors as much as the contract price? That is all that I have to say upon that case.

On page 17 we find the case of the Osceola. The Senator made a strong point upon that. On page 7 will be found the contract and statement for the hull. The contractors for the hull showed that they could not complete the hull until the machinery was completed. That is the point upon which the argument of the Senator turned, that the hull could not be completed until the machinery was ready to be put into it. What is the statement of the contractors for the machinery? Let us see if they have no equity before Congress, admitting the argument just as strongly as the Senator states it, that the hull was not finished, and that the cost of the hull was increased because the machinery was not ready to be put in at the end of the six months:

"Appeared before the board Oliver Edwards, president of the Atlantic Works, East Boston, on the part of the company, contractors for the machinery of the double-enders Sassacus and Osceola. Under oath states, that the contract for the Osceola was dated September 20, 1862, and for the Sassacus, October 15, 1862, in which they were allowed seven months, or until April, 1863, and May 1863, to complete the machinery of said vessels and deliver them to the Government, but the Sassacus was not so completed and delivered until September 1863, and the Osceola until November, 1863."

Several months, six months, perhaps, after the time limited in the contract.

"The principal causes of delay being the difficulty of obtaining labor and material, as the Government was putting out so much work. That the company was relieved by the Department of the terms of the contract regarding the time of completing the machinery, and was fully satisfied that it was finished as soon as possible."

If there was a contract made to build machinery which it was supposed would cost $82,000, and it was intended between the Government and the contractors that the work should be finished in seven months; if in fact it could not be done in the nature of things; if there was a mistake both on the part of the Department and the contractors, a mutual mistake, and that mistake results in a great loss to the contractors because of the fact that the work had to be done at a time when material and labor cost so much more than was anticipated, I ask Senators, if, upon grounds of equity, the parties are not entitled to relief. The Department felt that the work could not be finished within the time. It is shown here that the Department was satisfied that it was completed at as early a day as possible, and the Department itself relieved the parties from the terms of the contract in regard to the time limited. But further in the case, which the Senator did not call the attention of the Senate to because it did not lie in the line of his argument—there was another point to which he alluded in another part of his argument—these contractors say:

"That the excess of cost over and above the contract price was due, mainly, to the fact that the contract was accepted upon the representation of Chief Engineer Isherwood that the weight of material would not exceed that of the Paul Jones more than fifteen per cent., when in fact it did exceed that of the Paul Jones seventy-five per cent.; another cause being the rise of material and labor."

There is their case. They did delay the completion of the hull; that is not to be questioned; but how did it occur that they delayed the completion of the hull? It occurred because of the fact that such machinery could not be constructed in seven months. Here is the machinery for twenty-two vessels, and in no single case was that machinery completed within the seven months. Why? Senators will not say that all the contractors were negligent; that all the contractors lacked means to prosecute the work with diligence. That cannot be pretended; but it is apparent, as I think, that it was impossible to complete the work within that time. In these two instances to which I have called the attention of the Senate in response to the Senator from New Hampshire the Department felt that the work could not be completed in the time fixed in the contract, and extended the time, and held that the work was done at as early a day as possible. Then the further point is stated, that Mr. Isherwood, who, I understand, is a very skillful man in his profession and a very competent officer, thought that this machinery would not weigh more than fifteen per cent. above that of the Paul Jones, but when the machinery came to be constructed according to the specifications and drawings subsequently furnished, it weighed far beyond that and cost enormously above the sum contemplated.

The Senator has called the attention of the Senate to the fact that the contract price of the machinery for the Paul Jones was $52,000. In the investigation of these cases I did not think it important to inquire into the case of the Paul Jones. That was machinery built before these contracts were made. That was machinery built when everything was at the very lowest price, a contract made long before these contracts were made, and machinery completed before these contracts were made, and machinery, as I understand it, completed before there commenced to be an advance in the cost of labor and material. If the Senator be right that that machinery cost but $52,000, what weight ought that fact to have upon the judgment of Senators? That work was done when iron cost but half what it did afterward; and if Senators will look at the table accompanying the report of the committee they will see that the labor upon the machinery of the Paul Jones, and the material used in its construction, could not have cost the contractors one half of what it cost these men to complete their contracts. Therefore it is no fair test, that because the Paul Jones in 1861 could be built for $52,000, all these ought to be built for that sum, or they ought to be built for $82,000. The contract price was $82,000, and it is evident beyond all question that the machinery did cost far above that.

I cannot undertake to go over all the cases that have been referred to by the Senator; but I say the fact that in not one single instance was the machinery completed within the time specified, but many months were required on the part of all these contractors to complete that machinery, shows that there was a mistake on the part of the Department, and on the part of all these contractors, too, in regard to the time necessary for the construction of the machinery. I take that as a general proposition, that there was a mutual mistake, and that mutual mistake, causing the work to run into months when labor and material were much advanced, accounts for the loss sustained by these parties. I submit to Senators, are not contractors oftentimes relieved upon grounds of mistake, in equity? Even in the courts, between man and man, if there is a mutual mistake, equity will correct that mistake. Whether equity between man and man in respect to a question like this would relieve, I will not say; whether this would be a precise case for the interference of a court of chancery, I will not say; but as between the citizen and the Government, I do claim that there being a great mistake in regard to the time necessary for the construction of this machinery, it is such a mistake as appeals to the conscience and sense of equity and right of the Government. That proposition that all these parties were mistaken in regard to the time, that the Department itself was mistaken in regard to the time, and the further fact that this was much heavier machinery than was contemplated by any of these contractors, certainly ought to control when we come to administer equity between the Government and the citizen.

There was a point made about a misprint of the name of the Mendota. That was called at the proceedings of the board Mercedita. I was embarrassed to understand that when I came to examine the case; I could not find the report of the Mendota, and the facts of the case, but upon a careful examination I succeeded, as the Senator himself seems to have succeeded, in identifying the vessel. The Mercedita mentioned on page 5 is the Mendota unquestionably.

Mr. CLARK. If the Senator turns to page 32 of the report he will find it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. That is the contract for the machinery.

Mr. CLARK. It is down near the bottom of the page:

"Appeared before the board F. Z. Tucker, contractor for the double-ender gunboat Mendota, with explanations and corrections of the bills of cost of said gunboat, rendered on the 19th June, 1865."

If the Senator will refer back to that, date, he will see that Tucker, who was the contractor, rendered evidence in regard to the Mercedita, on page 5, so that that makes it very certain that that must have been the same vessel.

On page 13, in regard to the Lenapee, I understood the Senator to say that the extra work was included in the award of $18,576 52.

Mr. HENDRICKS. So I understand.

Mr. CLARK. Where is the evidence of that?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I will give it directly. That is my impression.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator will see, by turning to page 13, that the contract price was $75,500, and that the contractor has received a requisition on his claim for extra work of $5,923 48, which he has never presented to the Navy agent for payment. He has got a requisition for that amount, and this other amount is all for work on the Lenapee, without extra work, as I understand.

Mr. HENDRICKS. My impression was when I examined the case originally—I have not examined it to-day—that that $6,000 was included in the award; but I may be mistaken about that. If I am mistaken, it is $18,000; if I am correct it is $12,000 on the cost of the vessel. From reading the report, I thought it was as I stated.

In the case of the Mendota, on page 5, there is a statement rendered by the contractor; and on page 31, Naval Constructor Pook was called as a witness, and testified that some of the items charged by the contractor were not correct and ought not to be allowed.

Mr. CLARK. Only as to extra work, as I understand.

Mr. HENDRICKS. On the next page an explanation is made by the contractor, so as to make that right.

Mr. CLARK. It did not affect the amount of the bills at all.

Mr. HENDRICKS. No, sir; it does not affect the amount of the bills; but here is the explanation, and I will read just what the contractor said:

"Appeared before the board F. Z. Tucker, contractor for the double-ender gunboat Mendota, with explanations and corrections of the bills of cost of said gunboat, rendered on the 19th June, 1865, which corrections do not affect the total amount of bills previously submitted."

That is all there is upon that subject.

I understood the Senator to say that when the contracts for these twenty-two engines and boilers were made the weight of the machinery was ascertained and known to the parties. If he stated that he was mistaken.

Mr. CLARK. Oh, no.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I understand him now to say that he did not so state.

Mr. CLARK. I did not state the weight. I said I supposed, when the contract was reduced to writing, they understood what they were contracting for.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The weight of the machinery was specified when the contract was reduced to writing, though not when the work was commenced. I ask the attention of Senators to that important fact. Parties come here and make propositions to construct machinery. The specifications and drawings are not prepared. They can know but little about it. They propose to construct the machinery for $82,000 per vessel. They go on and commence the work. Afterward the specifications are drawn up, and it appears, after they have commenced the work, that it costs very much more to build the engines and boilers than was expected. I ask if that does not establish an equitable right to relief on the part of the contractors. I believe that was the case in regard to every one of them; that the work, in fact, was commenced before these contracts were reduced to writing, under the supposition that the machinery would be about of the weight and cost of the Paul Jones, or rather the weight of the Paul Jones; the cost would be greater, inasmuch as there had been an advance in labor and material. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. Nye] has called my attention to the evidence that is furnished on page 21 as the weight of the machinery of the Paul Jones:

"That the excess of cost, over and above the contract price, was due to the greater weight of engine than the contractors were led to expect them to be. Mr. Isherwood, chief of the Bureau of Steam Engineering, having assured them that they would not exceed those of the Paul Jones class—three hundred and seventy-four thousand pounds."

Another one of the contractors says, under oath, that he understood that the machinery was to weigh from three hundred and eighty to three hundred and ninety thousand pounds; and the evidence in the case of the Pawtuxet is that the machinery weighed six hundred and thirty thousand pounds, almost double that of the Paul Jones. That mistake ran through all these cases, in regard to the weight, and I submit to Senators whether the Senator from New Hampshire has succeeded in establishing a substantial error in the report of the board in regard to any of the other cases. His argument is aimed at the contractors for the machinery. When it appears that there was a mistake on the part of the Department and on the part of each one of these contractors in regard to the time necessary for the construction of the machinery; when it appears that the contractors thought, at the time they made their bids, upon the representations made to them in the Department, that this machinery would weigh about as much as the machinery of the Paul Jones, and when it further appears that the machinery weighs greatly more, and is greatly more expensive, I ask Senators if the case for relief is not substantially made out.

Mr. CLARK. I desire to ask the Senator whether, supposing more time was necessary, the man who got out his work in six months was not more deserving than the man who got it out in twelve months.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I should say so.

Mr. CLARK. Then what is the propriety of putting them all at twelve per cent.?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, there is not any very great difference in the time that was occupied in the completion of this machinery.

Mr. CLARK. One hundred days in some.

Mr. HENDRICKS. No, I think not. There was one case where the machinery was furnished for one vessel as early as September, 1863. I noticed that as I was reading over the report; and in some cases the machinery was not finished until the spring of 1864.

Mr. CLARK. A difference of six months.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Yes, sir; but I recollect of but one case in which the machinery was finished as early as September, 1863. That same house got out another engine and boiler in November, 1863; but most of this machinery was finished during the winter of 1863-64.

Now, I repeat to the Senate, that although there is much force in the argument of the Senator, when it is considered that the Department and the contractors made a mutual mistake in regard to the time necessary for the completion of this machinery; when the Senator cannot say that these men by the exercise of the greatest diligence could have completed it within the seven months; when that longer time necessarily added very much to the cost of the work; when it is considered that they were deceived—I will not say deceived; it was not intentional on the part of the Department, unquestionably—but misled in regard to the weight of the engines, and they weighed greatly more than was anticipated when they made their bids; when it appears that with diligence they did prosecute the work, because there is no complaint on the part of the Government that they did not, and in some cases Congress relieved them and in some cases the Department relieved them in regard to the time; when it is shown that the Department thought they were finished as soon as was possible in one case—when all this is considered, and these men have done good work at as early a day as possible, will not Congress relieve them from the great loss which resulted from these mistakes mutual between the contractors and the Department? It seems to me, notwithstanding the critical argument made by the Senator from New Hampshire, that there ought to be relief.

Mr. President, I now submit the case so far as I am concerned, to the sense of justice of the Senate.

Mr. CLARK. I have but a word or two in reply, and it is not so much in reply as it is in aid of a suggestion or two made by the Senator from Indiana. I think, taking the Senator's statement to be entirely true, it shows conclusively that this kind of legislation that we are attempting here now is not the proper, intelligent legislation that we ought to have. Now, supposing these engines to have been heavier than any of the contractors contemplated, how much heavier were they? Does the Senator know, except in one case where a person says that the one which he built was so heavy? Before we can legislate intelligently we ought to have from the Department the weight of these engines, if the contractors complain of that, and know how much heavier they were.

Mr. HENDRICKS. They were all of one style.

Mr. CLARK. I understand that some of these people do not complain of that. Many of them do not complain that they were deceived in the weight; some do. If we could have the weight of these engines we could then know if that was a matter of equity, how much equity there was in the case.

Taking the matter of time, the Senator says that the Department was satisfied the time was not long enough. Do we know how much time the Department thought was long enough? Do we know how far the Department relieved them in regard to the time? We should have the information from the Department in all these cases before we can legislate intelligently. It is to this blind method of legislation that I so much object. It may be true, as I stated before, that the Government will have to pay as much in the end as this twelve per cent. would be; but I do not like this method of legislation. I want the people who are deserving of it to have the money, and those who are not deserving of it, if there be such, not to have it.

Mr. NYE. I have only two or three sentences to utter in regard to this bill, and I may as well commence where the Senator from New Hampshire left off. He says we ought to have evidence from the Department in regard to the increased weight of this machinery. Sir, this question was examined before the Department itself. The Senator from New Hampshire seems to forget that it was the very Department to which he refers that made this examination; and if there had existed in the Department the power to gainsay the evidence that was given by these contractors, I believe it is a fair presumption that it would have been given. This board was no tribunal of ours. If there were any omissions on the part of this board, it was not the fault of this Senate or of the contractors. The Senator from Iowa [Mr.

GRIMES] read here the other day the criticisms and strictures of Mr. Isherwood on these claims. I do not understand that in that communication there was any complaint or any sort of denial of the fact that this machinery was heavier than that of the Paul Jones. The Paul Jones was familiar to this board undoubtedly, and they understood the fact to be precisely as these contractors testified. Their report was before the Department and considered by it long before it came before the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The misfortune that the Senator from New Hampshire seems to be laboring under is, that nobody has examined this case but him, and because he found a wrong name in one place he turned round with quite a theatrical air of triumph, as much as to say, "I would impeach not only the intelligence but the integrity of the committee to which this subject was referred," and with an air of triumph he attempted to render us some aid. The fact appeared that the committee jointly happened to be as wise as the Senator separately, and found out the same thing that he found from examining the report. I congratulate the committee jointly that they were able to do what the Senator could do alone!

My friend from New Hampshire has argued this case as a very critical lawyer, and it seemed to me that he fell into the error of supposing that he was defending some one in New Hampshire, or somewhere else, against a legal claim made to recover in these several cases. Sir, the committee that made this report placed the report upon no such foundation. They have reported that these ships honestly cost these people, from the evidence that satisfied the commission appointed by the Government itself, so many dollars and so many cents. The appeal is not in the character of a legal claim, but it is an appeal of honest men that have labored honestly, that have not let their furnaces go unheated, whose hammers have been heard night and day; and for what? To aid this Government in constructing a navy that is to-day its proudest boast.

My friend from New Hampshire seems to hang upon this question of "time" as though it was a very important thing. "It is so nominated in the bond," says the Senator from New Hampshire. He returns to the bond. He argues well if this Government turns Shylock; but he does not argue well when an appeal is made to the sense of justice of this Government. Time, sir! It is patent to everybody that time in regard to these Government contracts has not been observed by any contractor. The whole country was in a state of wild confusion. Time! Why, sir, the time was set for McClellan to go into Richmond, when he marched out with the proudest army that ever went from here; but he did not get there at all. The time was set for peace, by the distinguished Secretary of State, in sixty days after the troubles commenced; and yet the controversy lasted four long years. So far as that distinguished officer of the Government could fix the time, he fixed it; but instead of sixty we had more than fourteen hundred days of bloody strife.

The Senator says these contractors have kept the Government out of the use of these vessels. What is the fact? The fact is, that the Government yards and every private facility for the construction of ships in this whole country were engaged. Besides, Congress passed a law providing that the laborers in the Government navy-yards should not be subjected to draft; but they passed no such law in regard to the private yards of this country. The fact is, that when these contractors got their shops full of men, the strong arm of this Government would come along and sweep them out in a day by a draft; or, just as fatal to them, by bidding a thousand dollars' bounty to every one who would enlist as a soldier, and a private workshop or a ship-building yard would be cleared in a single day. These facts are not proved; they are patent. There are some things that everybody knows; they are stamped indelibly upon the tablets of our memory; and among those things is the fact that the exigencies of the country required these men in these several vocations; and the universal testimony of this entire report is that the labor which they were able to procure was of an inferior character, and had to be paid for at high prices, and was obtained with difficulty. Does the Government desire that proved? It is written on every page of history for the last four years. It is patent.

Sir, this Government acted far more magnanimously than its distinguished advocate from New Hampshire now does. They did not hang upon time. They were glad to get these ships whenever they came. They would have been glad to get them sooner, and they would have taken them later had they come. My friend, with a great deal of assurance of manner at least, and I presume he felt so from the strength of his argument, asks us, would an individual do it? I answer yes, if the individual's necessities were as great as the necessities of this country, and he would have been glad to do it. An individual who will stand upon the bond when a man has given him a superior article, and heavier than he contracted for, and say "I will take it, because it is so nominated in the bond," is not an honest man; and, sir, you would not trust him, nor would the Senator from New Hampshire trust him; and he could not get trusted in a country store in the State of New Hampshire.

I was utterly surprised at the pertinacity with which the Senator from New Hampshire adhered to this question of time. Sir, the truth is this Government "took no note of time save by its loss" during this struggle. It was all time and no time with them. For four years there has been no note of time save in preparation for bloody strife. I repeat again, I was utterly surprised to hear the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire, who is generally so generous, and takes such enlarged views of things, nail his objection to this measure on the question of time. Why did he do it? To show that this excess of cost arose from the delay of these contractors. Is there a particle of evidence of that sort in this case? Is not the contrary apparent throughout, that they strained every nerve to complete these vessels in time? They had two controlling motives to do it: first, in order to help to rescue the Government they loved from its peril; and next, because every day told them prices were increasing enormously; and yet my friend says they must suffer the entire loss occasioned by this delay.

Now, Mr. President, I desire to make two or three statements that are matters of history, and my friend will find them to be so if he goes to the Department. I have but one single acquaintance in this whole lot of contractors, but I have taken occasion to look a little into the record. Mr. Quintard has built ten ships for this Government.

Mr. CLARK. Thirteen.

Mr. NYE. No, sir.

Mr. CLARK. He told me so.

Mr. NYE. I guess you are mistaken, because he gave me the names.

Mr. CLARK. He told me he had built thirteen.

Mr. NYE. Well, all the better, as I am so often wrong and my distinguished friend always right. I understood that he built ten ships entire, and the machinery for three.

Mr. CLARK. That is what he may have meant by the thirteen.

Mr. NYE. I have it in writing from him. He has built ten ships, and the evidence can be obtained, if my friend desires to consult the Department, that not one of those ships did he want to build; and he has never built a ship for the Government upon which he has not sustained a loss. He tells me—and George Quintard tells the truth always—that these things were urged upon him. The Government said they could not do without them; he must do them; they could not get them done anywhere else. And yet, amid this whole turmoil in the building of thirteen ships, and thirteen such ships, my friend from New Hampshire seems to count the very minutes of time against him as a reason why this Government should not be just to him. To that kind of reasoning I object. I insist upon it that the very severe criticisms of the Senator from New Hampshire, so fully answered by the distinguished Senator from Indiana, were not fair upon this report or upon the bill.

Now, sir, as little as I know of legislation, I think I see a way in which the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire could have shown his fairness much more clearly to my mind. He declares to you that some of these parties are entitled to remuneration. Then, why does he not move to strike out such as are not entitled to recover, in his opinion? He says he will vote to postpone the bill. That is a very easy thing for a Senator to do; but it is a very hard thing to be endured by those who are groaning under burdens they can hardly bear, for honest toil, honest labor, and honest material that they have given to this Government in the hour of her direst necessity. It is very easy for my friend from Missouri and my friend from New Hampshire to say, "We will postpone it for another year," when the very case shows you that every one of these parties who has not gone over already is tottering on the very verge of bankruptcy. Oh, postpone it! Give my friend time to read the pamphlet! If we will only postpone it, he is going into it very thoroughly; he will spend the vacation in reading the literature of double-end iron-clads, and next winter he will come here ready to be appointed, if the exigencies of the country should require it, a naval constructor!

Sir, we have here the testimony of two men who have grown grey in the service of this country, two naval constructors whose fame is not bounded even by our own shores, who have been consulted by other countries, long-tried and faithful servants of this Government, and they substantially indorse the testimony of these contractors. Sir, I insist upon it, that when these men come here they are entitled to an answer. I have taken no pains to ascertain how Senators are going to vote on this question; but if these men are to be buried amid the ruins of their misfortune, bury them now; for burial would be a relief. Do not keep them hanging upon the tenter hooks of uncertainty till frost time again, and then the Senator from Missouri or the Senator from New Hampshire may not have got fully booked up on the subject, and will move to postpone it for another season. Sir, quick poison is better than slow; and if this Senate has made up its mind that the rule of conduct they will establish is to take two and a half millions of money from citizens of this country, do it now. If the blow must be struck, let it fall now. Their agony already has been greater than they can endure. My friend from California knows that hundreds of thousands of dollars are involved in his own State, where the men have advanced their own money and have carried their loss like good soldiers and patriots.

Mr. President, all that I regret is, that this whole subject had not been referred to the honorable Senator from New Hampshire originally, and then we should have had set forth exactly what ought to be paid, and what ought not to be paid. I hope that this motion to postpone will not prevail, but that the bill will be passed as amended on the motion of the Senator from Iowa; it is throwing at least a crumb to hungry men, which is ever grateful.

Mr. GRIMES. My amendment has been adopted.

Mr. NYE. That amendment being adopted, I hope the bill will pass. I am entirely satisfied that it will be in consonance—and I make this remark in view of the inquiry that the Senator from New Hampshire made whether the tax-payers would like it—with the judgment of the people of this nation that they shall not take the labor of a man who has labored faithfully for them and he go unrequited. Sir, this is all that I desire to say on this question.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator from Nevada finds fault with me that I insist upon time in this contract, and he says, why insist upon time? McClellan was so many months in Washington before reaching the Chickahominy, and so many months so and so. Let me tell the Senator from Nevada that his allusion to that general and to time in that connection was an unfortunate one. I did not have him in my mind, if the Senator so supposed. If McClellan had come to time, as these contractors ought to have come to time, we should have saved hundreds of thousands of lives. If at the battle of Fair Oaks he had come to time, he might have gone into the city of Richmond. If at the battle of Malvern Hill he had come to time, he might again have gone into the city of Richmond. Again, if after the battle of Antietam he had come to time, he might have destroyed Lee and his army. And now, says the Senator, forsooth, what is the value of time? Why, sir, if Meade had come to time after the battle of Gettysburg we should have saved hundreds and thousands of lives; and who shall say that if we had had these ships, we should not have shortened the war and saved lives? The allusion was an unfortunate one from the Senator from Nevada for his argument, in my judgment. Sir, I am playing no Shylock with these contractors, and the Senator should know it.

Mr. NYE. I have not said so. I asked if the Government was prepared to play Shylock. I did not say the Senator was, by any means.

Mr. CLARK. The Government is playing no Shylock.

Mr. NYE. That is what I claimed, that it should not.

Mr. CLARK. It deals generously with these people when it extends the time and takes the vessels off their hands, when they have finished them, and pays them the full contract price for them. It does not say to these people, "You have delayed the performance of this work for months; six, eight, nine, ten, or eleven months, and therefore we will not pay you;" but it takes the vessels nearly at the end of the war, sometimes within eleven months of the end of the war, when they are comparatively useless, or not half the value they would have been if they had been in time, and pays them the full price; and yet the Senator from Nevada says "time, time." Sir, as we grow old we learn the value of time. The Senator knows the value of time; and he knows it is sometimes true, as Napoleon said, that a moment lost is the chance of future wretchedness; and especially so in war. This Government was in war; such a war as the world had not seen. It was straining every nerve, purchasing merchantmen for transport ships and for naval purposes, arming them, and doing everything it could to create a navy, contracting with these people to deliver ships within a given time, and they failing for nearly a year, this Government has not played Shylock; but after the war is over these gentlemen come and beseech the Government to be generous. Yes, let the Government be generous, but let it be intelligent in its generosity and reward those most who served it best.

Mr. President, I have said that I do not like this method of legislation. I know very well, and the Senator from Nevada must know very well, that when these men are put into a bill together—I do not say that he or the committee put them into a bill together—but he knows very well that these men came here together for the very purpose by collective influence of pushing a thing of this kind through.

Mr. NYE. I do not know any such thing.

Mr. CLARK. I well know such a thing.

Mr. NYE. Very well; you may, but I do not.

Mr. CLARK. It is very apparent that by the force of one given to the other, the thing is to be carried through by joint weight and joint influence. Some of these men may be, as the Senator says, poor; and some of these men may be rich, and if they are not misrepresented, are rich; but whether they be poor, or whether they be rich, makes no difference in the justice of the Government. If a man is rich and has earned well of the Government he should be paid. If he is poor, and has not earned well of the Government, then he should not be paid. It is not by any such standard that I wish to try these men.

Nor do I wish to have this matter lie over that I may examine it; for I have said nothing about examining it. I wish it could be laid over, or I wish some different scheme could be devised by which we might do justice, as I said, individually in these cases, each case by itself and for itself, and not lump them in this way, and by a general bill give them twelve per cent. on the contract price. As I said before, in that way a man may get more than he is entitled to or he may get less than he is entitled to. They should not be leveled down in that manner, but each should have according to what he deserves.

"Now," says the Senator from Nevada, "why does not the Senator from New Hampshire move to strike out a case?" Because I have not had time to examine the cases through. I have not had time to examine any one of these cases sufficiently to enable me to say that the man may not be deserving of something, though on the showing he makes he is not entitled to it. I might strike out some that were deserving. If I were to move to strike out so that the bill should pass as I think it ought to pass, I would move to strike out forty-one and leave only one, whoever he might be, and try that, and then take the others up afterward. That is the way we ought to legislate, one by one, as we do in other cases, and not in this collective method.

Now, Mr. President, one word in regard to what was first said by the Senator, that this board had examined the weight of these engines. Where is the evidence of it? This board was not established for any such purpose. It was not established to report upon the weight.

Mr. NYE. Here is the evidence of it. I read from page 21:

"That the excess of cost, over and above the contract price, was due to the greater weight of engine than the contractors were led to expect them to be, Mr. Isherwood, chief of the Bureau of Steam Engineering, having assured them that they would not exceed those of the Paul Jones class, (three hundred and seventy-four thousand pounds.)"

Mr. GRIMES. Who says that?

Mr. NYE. Mr. Henry W. Gardner, of the firm of Gardner & Lake, contractors for the engine and boilers of the double-end vessel Pawtuxet.

"Whereas the weight of one built by them was six hundred and thirty thousand pounds; that the total cost, including cost of collection of bill and interest," &c.

There is the evidence.

Mr. CLARK. Is that all the evidence?

Mr. NYE. No, sir; by no means.

Mr. CLARK. Where is the rest?

Mr. NYE. Here it is in several cases.

Mr. CLARK. Will the Senator turn me to the rest?

Mr. NYE. Yes, sir. I will turn you to the testimony of Mr. William Boardman, on page 44, which you did not read, but which was read by the Senator from Indiana:

"That the excess of cost was owing to the great rise in labor and material and difficulty in procuring the same. There are many reasons why the engines cost more than the amount of contract: first, when the engines were contracted for, drawings and specifications were not furnished us, and we were totally ignorant as to the weight of said engines, boilers, &c. From the best information and belief, we were led to suppose the machinery would weigh three hundred and eighty or three hundred and ninety thousand pounds, and have to say that the raw material was worth about the amount of the contract, for the reason of the great excess of weight of metal over and above our estimate."

And you will find it in two or three other places in the report.

Mr. CLARK. But that does not state the weight of the engines.

Mr. NYE. It states the weight of one engine, and the engines of the double-enders are all alike.

Mr. CLARK. Only one man, so far as I know, states the weight of the engines.

Mr. NYE. The fact appears—

Mr. CLARK. They state generally that they weighed more.

Mr. NYE. Will the gentleman allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. CLARK. Certainly.

Mr. NYE. The fact appeared clearly before our committee that the weight of the engines of the double-enders was about the same. I will ask the Senator from Indiana if he did not so understand it?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Yes, sir. I understood when the specifications and drawings came to be examined they corresponded.

Mr. NYE. They were alike.

Mr. HENDRICKS. There was no difference.

Mr. GRIMES. It is due to Mr. Isherwood and to the Navy Department to state that they say that to each one of these contractors to whom the $82,000 was paid the specifications were delivered when the contract was made. The drawings were not delivered, but the specifications were placed in their hands.

Mr. HENDRICKS. That was when the contract was signed, not when the work was commenced.

Mr. CLARK. The point to which I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Nevada is, that only one person undertook to state the weight of these engines before the board. The board was not established for any such purpose. The board was simply established to ascertain and to report what was the cost of the work.

Mr. NYE. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CLARK. Certainly.

Mr. NYE. How could they ascertain what this work cost unless they ascertained the weight of the engines and machinery?

Mr. CLARK. In various ways. I do not know how specific the bills may have been. I do not know whether these gentlemen put in the weight of the raw material; whether they put in the weight of the engines or whether they fixed their bills in some other shape, upon the day's work or in some other way. That does not appear here, and that is the very point. They could put bills of cost in different shapes, and, I dare say, did put them in different shapes. I dare say the material cost differently to different individuals. Some, perhaps, would pay more and some less. This commission was appointed for the purpose of ascertaining the cost over and above the contract price and allowance for extra work, and report the same to the Senate. That was their work, to ascertain the cost, not to ascertain the equities on the other side; not to say what was required by the contract and what was furnished by the contractors, but simply to ascertain the cost and report that. I desire a very different thing. I desire that the equities on the other side should be stated in regard to the cost, and that we should have the whole matter intelligently before the Senate.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I do not rise to discuss this question, but only to make an observation in reply to the Senator-soldier from New Hampshire. He has talked about the battle of Fair Oaks and said something about Malvern Hill, and he has spoken about a general who is absent. The maxim "de mortuis nil nisi bonum" applies to the absent as well as to the dead.

Mr. CLARK. Put in the dead. [Laughter.]

Mr. McDOUGALL. He will live beyond your period. General George B. McClellan was an excellent soldier and a true patriot. If General McDowell had been allowed to make his movement as he was directed, according to General McClellan's advice, down to Yorktown to support him, he would have been in Richmond very shortly. Cowardly men withheld his forces for the defenses of Washington, and therefore General McClellan had not the material with which to advance. I am no especial admirer of General George B. McClellan; but I speak this for justice. After having captured Yorktown, with a worse siege than the first time when Yorktown was taken, the history of which is indited in the Rotunda, he advanced and lacked simply the support that he required in his own programme as a military man according to the strategy that he had stated. Perhaps the Senator-soldier from New Hampshire has learned the retreat of the Ten Thousand and Moreau out of the Black Forest; perhaps he went with Hannibal and Napoleon across the Alps; perhaps he has fought on many fields; perhaps he is able to lay down with Machiavelli the science and art of war. I say those remarks about General George B. McClellan are unwarranted, for he was a gallant man and a patriotic man. It is still a question pending whether he was a great general or not. [Laughter.]

Mr. RIDDLE. Mr. President, these extraneous questions, I think, should not be lugged into a debate on so important a matter as this. On a former occasion, some days since, I expressed my views upon this bill, and told the Senate that I would discuss it hereafter if necessary. That discussion I think now unnecessary. I then said, and I intend to adhere to it at present, that I would vote for the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, and if that amendment should be adopted I would vote for the bill. I infinitely prefer now the motion of the honorable Senator from Missouri, and why? What is the reason for it? It is to enable us to winnow the wheat from the chaff. It has been shown us that some of these allowances ought to be made and some ought not to be made. Now give us time to examine into this matter. There is no mechanic suffering from this delay; the mechanics are all paid off; and I venture to assert, and challenge contradiction, that nearly every one, if not every one, of the gentlemen who made these contracts had made a fortune out of the Government before he lost something on these contracts. It was their own option that they took the contracts. They made their contracts with their sub-contractors before they assumed the great contract, and if they lose on one and we are compelled to compensate them for that loss, should they not, with the same propriety, come back and pay us the excess of what they made upon the others? Would not that be justice? Would not that be fair to the Government?

The details which are cited by Senators on this floor are comparatively unimportant. If these gentlemen have just claims upon the Government, let them present their claims to the Court of Claims; or, if they prefer it, let them bring their individual cases before the Senate, and have them examined upon their merits. I may vote, perhaps, for all of them; certainly for some; but let us have the just claims presented separately from the unjust claims. I am not going to discuss this question; but I repeat now what I have said heretofore, that if we are going to make this allowance, if we are going to open the door, there will be no closing it. As was remarked by the Senator from New Hampshire, why cannot your wagon-makers come in for an additional allowance? Why cannot your contractors who contracted to deliver hay for twenty dollars a ton and had to give thirty dollars for it come in for additional pay? Where are you going to stop? That is the question. My plan is to postpone the subject, or rather it is the plan of the Senator from Missouri, and I shall vote for that with all my heart. I trust the Senate will postpone the bill in order that we may winnow out the wheat from the chaff.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. DOOLITTLE in the chair.) The question is on the motion of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. HENDERSON,] that this bill be postponed until the first Monday of December next; and upon that question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 11, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Clark, Davis, Doolittle, Guthrie, Henderson, Howe, Kirkwood, Riddle, Sherman, Trumbull, and Wade—11.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Conness, Cragin, Foster, Grimes, Harris, Hendricks, Howard, Johnson, Morgan, Morrill, Nesmith, Nye, Poland, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Van Winkle, Willey, Williams, and Wilson—24.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Cowan, Creswell, Dixon, Edmunds, Fessenden, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Norton, Saulsbury, Wright, and Yates—14.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on concurring, in the Senate, with the amendments made in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HENDERSON. I now move to recommend the bill and the amendments to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. CONNESS. I wish simply to say in connection with my votes on this proposition, that I voted against the postponement because it is within my knowledge that some of the claimants comprehended by the bill deserve what is due them by the Government, for I believe sums are due them by the Government. But, although I believe that, I cannot vote for the bill in its present shape. I cannot agree to give twelve per cent. to parties who it has been clearly shown in the Senate are not entitled to a dollar, in order that those who are deserving shall be paid. Legislation of that kind cannot have my vote. It is not measured, in my opinion, by justice, for when we speak of justice we must never forget that there is more than one party who requires it at our hands. No addition, in my opinion, can be made at this time to the public indebtedness without the perpetration of a crime. It is an absolute crime, in my opinion. I say for myself that nothing can induce me to perpetrate that by my vote.

I am willing to vote the uttermost farthing that shall be ascertained to be due to any or all of the contractors who are parties comprehended by this bill; but only upon an examination of the cases; and I believe, and have believed from the beginning, that a specific examination of each case will lead to the payment of those who are most worthy at the earliest period of time.

It may be, Mr. President, that the Senate may pass the bill in its present form. If they shall do so of course I have no condemnation to utter in advance of what a majority may do; but until it is done by a vote of the Senate, I shall not believe that the Senate of the United States will pass the present bill or any bill made up as it is, comprehended as it is, putting upon the same level every class of claimants entitled to every degree of consideration. My opinion is that it should be committed for the separate examination of the claims. Whether that committal should be to the Committee on Naval Affairs or not is a question for the Senate to decide. I am perfectly willing that it should go there with instructions to them to report upon each case separately. I am prepared upon such a plan to be even generous as well as just to those who are found eminently worthy by the examination to be made. My own choice would be to commit it to the Committee on Claims of this body.

Mr. CLARK. We do not want it.

Mr. CONNESS. The Senator, who is chairman of that committee here, says he does not want it. I knew that; and although the Senator has discussed this measure with a clearness and acumen that commonly belong to him on every subject, and evidencing the industry that is of so much value to this nation, I have so much confidence in the Senator's sense of justice that I believe the cases having merit would receive due consideration at his hands.

It was suggested by the Senator from Nevada, who addressed the Senate a few moments ago on this subject, that the chairman of the Committee on Claims had now committed himself upon the subject. I do not understand that when a Senator performs the duty incumbent upon him here of analyzing closely the claims that are presented for the public consideration and payment he is committing himself against a measure. While the uttermost farthing that is due should be paid by the Government to whom it is found to be due, the uttermost farthing at the present time should be also kept in the Treasury if it belongs there; and I should feel for one that I was performing my part but illy here if I did not by my votes sustain such utterances. If the instructions are to go with this motion, or it is to be the understanding that when the bill is recommitted to the Committee on Naval Affairs they are to examine each case and report at the earliest period of time during this session, so that it may be acted upon, what is due to each of these contractors, I shall give a vote for that recommitment; but in its present shape I desire to say that the bill cannot receive my vote on its passage.

I have felt, Mr. President, called upon to make this statement more particularly because constituents and friends of mine are interested in some of these claims. I shall as a matter of course, both in the gratification of my feelings and in rendering them justice at the earliest period of time, seek the opportunity of serving them to that extent. If they expect anything beyond that they expect service that they cannot receive at my hands. I am in favor of the earliest examination of their claims, and the payment of the greatest amount that shall be found to be their due, and I have no doubt that their claims will stand the closest test of examination and comment when the facts are presented to this body.

Mr. WILLEY. Mr. President, if this bill is to be recommitted, speaking for myself only as a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, I hope the suggestion of the honorable Senator from California will prevail and that it may go to the Committee on Claims or some other committee. I have not deemed it necessary to participate at all in the discussion, not because I had not examined the claims sufficiently to satisfy myself, but because I saw the bill was being discussed by other Senators more competent to do justice to the case, and perhaps more familiar with the subject. My own convictions upon the subject from the examination I have given the case are very clear. My mind is made up very conclusively on the merits of these claims. Therefore I do not think it is justice to the Senate to recommit the bill to the Naval Committee, if the other members of the committee feel toward the claims as I do. I trust that if it is recommitted at all, the suggestion of the Senator from California may prevail, and I know of no better committee to which it could go than the Committee on Claims. I am satisfied that although there may be a difference in the merit of these different claims, there is not a claimant in the bill mentioned that is not justly and honestly, before the country and the Senate, entitled to more than the bill will give him.

In reference to the difficulty in regard to the form of the bill, I have not been able to see the point in the objection made. I think there can be no more difficulty because several claims are included in the bill than there would be in the case of the naval appropriation bill or any other general appropriation bill which contains many distinct appropriations for various objects. The report upon these claims is distinct and separate; the claims themselves are set forth separately in the bill; and it is just as easy to modify any one of the claims or to strike it from the bill entirely as it would be to modify an appropriation bill or to strike it from the bill entirely.

I do not think that the honorable Senator from New Hampshire has done the sub-committee of the Naval Committee justice when he urges upon the Senate that cases containing less merit than others are included in the whole, in an omnibus bill, for the purpose of carrying through those that may have less merit than others. It is hardly just to the Naval Committee to say that they would allow themselves to become the instruments of reporting any bill or any claim to the Senate that they did not believe to be deserving of merit and which they did not believe ought to be passed by the Senate.

I conclude these remarks without going into any examination. I hope the suggestion of the Senator from California may prevail, and that if the bill is to be recommitted it will go to the Committee on Claims or some other committee. I do not want it recommitted myself; I have no desire of that kind.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. DOOLITTLE.) The pending motion is to recommit the bill to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. WILLEY. I suppose the question could be as well tested on the recommitment, to which I am opposed, by moving to amend that motion so that the bill may be referred to the Committee on Claims, which motion I make.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia moves to amend the motion to recommit by referring the bill to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CLARK. I think we had better perhaps try the motion to recommit to the committee from which the bill came. I think there is no doubt the Senate have confidence in that committee. I am sorry the Senator from West Virginia should have understood that I intended to accuse the sub-committee of making up this bill in this way for the purpose of carrying one claim by means of another. What I meant to say was that these people who went before the board had done it for the purpose of carrying one with the other. I did not make any charge upon the committee.

I do not feel quite willing, so far as I am individually concerned, after having expressed myself so freely in regard to some of the claims, that the bill should go to the Committee on Claims, and solely for the reason that I feel that some of these people coming here with claims might not feel that confidence they ought to feel in a committee examining the matter. They might feel that I was prejudiced against their claims.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I hope this amendment which has been proposed by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GRIMES] will be adopted and an end put to this controversy. Everybody knows that in a case of this kind we cannot ascertain the facts with mathematical accuracy; and all we can do is to approximate to justice. This subject has been examined by a board constituted for that purpose; it has been reexamined by the Naval Committee; it has been elaborately discussed here before the Senate; and now I say it will be more economical for the Government, if there be any persons in this number presenting claims not just in law or equity, to pay them the twelve per cent. rather than to protract this litigation and controversy; and it will be better for the men entitled to more than twelve per cent. to have the twelve per cent. at this time than to be compelled to wait year after year and finally get in the end perhaps a larger sum. I am in favor, so far as I am individually concerned, of settling the question at this time.

Now, sir, if the proposition that has been suggested should prevail, and each one of these claims should be brought before the Senate and before Congress by itself, and discussed as extensively, as no doubt it would be, as the claims have been upon this occasion, very much of the time of Congress will be occupied with this subject, and I do not believe there is any probability that we shall ascertain the facts in the case and be more likely to do justice after all that time and trouble than we are now. So far as I am concerned, I have listened to this discussion and heard what has been said on both sides; and I believe that justice will be promoted, that it will be more to the advantage of the claimants to have the question decided at this time by the adoption of this proposition, and that the Government will save money by paying all these persons twelve per cent. I think they will be benefited and the Government will be benefited. I think the proposition ought to be adopted.

Mr. CONNESS. I need not say, as I have already spoken all I desire to say on that subject, that I differ very much from my friend from Oregon in the opinion he has expressed; but I rise to suggest that I think it is apparent that it will be found on a slight examination that the subject can be divided into classes when it comes before the Senate again and that although there are forty-two cases they need not come before us in forty-two bills; nor need even the examination be conducted except as to classes. I think that it is not so much of a work as is imagined and that if the bill be recommitted it will be found to be more easily and readily performed, and that we shall act upon it with more promptness and, I will not repeat, with more justice.

I am very glad the suggestion is made to commit the subject to the Committee on Claims. I wish to say again that I have no doubt the honorable chairman of that committee will act, not only with justice, but with generosity toward these claimants. The case, as has been stated, has been fully discussed here, and I think it may be conceded that it is the sentiment of the Senate to act with generosity toward these claimants, and I have no doubt that it will be examined with that view and with reference to that sentiment and opinion; and I hope that that course will be taken.

Mr. DAVIS. I would suggest to the Senator from Missouri that he add to his motion an instruction to the committee to report separately upon each case. I presume that each case has its distinctive facts and features, and I confess it struck me as somewhat improper to group in a single bill as many cases of different claims, each claim sustained by a different state of fact, as are embodied in this bill.

Another thought has occurred to me in relation to this matter. Some of these claimants may have had other contracts with the Government and upon those other contracts they may have made large profits, two or three times the amount of their losses on the contracts embodied in this bill. When a man contracts with the Government, as a general rule he must risk his contract and he must make or lose by it according to his judgment and according to his vigilance and energy in the execution of his contract; and when he has made profitable contracts with the Government, and consequently has received large profits, is it just to the Government, is there any claim of justice in his favor that he shall retain all the large profits which he has made upon other contracts and shall be indemnified in a contract on which he has made a loss? I think not. It seems to me that the committee ought to be instructed to report a separate bill in relation to each case, and that Senators might have an opportunity of withholding any remuneration in favor of parties who have made large profits upon other contracts. I therefore suggest to the Senator from Missouri that he add to his motion that the committee, to whatever committee it may be referred, be required to report a separate bill in relation to each claimant whom they deem entitled to relief.

Mr. HENDERSON. I decline to accept that amendment to my motion. I prefer that the bill shall go back to the same committee from which it came, since the discussion of the question. I do not desire that it shall be sent to the Committee on Claims. I have entire confidence in the Naval Committee, and after the facts that have been developed here in the discussion I think the Committee will do what is right. I have no doubt about that. If they report back the amendment of the chairman of the Naval Committee I cannot say that I shall vote against it; but I would rather they would reexamine it. I think the Senate would be better satisfied if there was a reexamination.

I do not ask that the committee report separate bills; I do not want them to do so; they may class the cases.

Mr. GRIMES. I think there would not be an absolute necessity for a separate bill in each case. I think the cases could be classified. For instance, the cases of the hulls could be put by themselves. There are some cases that spring out of the manufacture of wooden hulls of vessels entirely; others were different classes of vessels, and different classes of engines. Four or five or six bills might cover all the cases.

Mr. HENDERSON. I think the country will be better satisfied and the Senate will be better satisfied to have this measure go back for reëxamination; and if the committee shall, upon that reëxamination, decide that we ought to pay these claims, I am sure that I do not understand the subject sufficiently to put myself against the allowance; but I think facts enough have been developed to satisfy me anyhow that there are some claims here that ought not to be allowed. I suggest further, that the way the bill now stands the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] has secured the adoption of an amendment to pay two other claimants. I do not know whether their claims have ever been examined by the committee or not. I do not suppose they have.

Mr. SUMNER. They are only to be paid what they shall prove before the Department.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am not satisfied with that sort of legislation. They never were before the board, as I understand. I did not understand that the Senator's amendment provided that those cases should be examined by the Department.

Mr. NYE. The amendment is that they shall stand on the same footing with the others, the same percentage being allowed as in the other cases.

Mr. HENDERSON. Now, let me suggest that if the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, the able chairman of the Naval Committee, should be adopted, that pays twelve per cent. on the entire amount of the contract price. The amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts is to be included, of course, bringing in two contracts that have never been examined, and very large contracts, as I understand; those contractors will be paid twelve per cent., too, though the committee has never examined those cases at all. The committee has not reported that they are entitled to anything; the board has not examined those claims; and all I have to satisfy me that they are entitled to anything is the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts. That upon a great many radical measures would be amply satisfactory to me; but I do not know that I can vote twelve per cent. upon two large contracts merely because these gentlemen are thought by the Senator from Massachusetts to be as meritorious as those reported upon.

Now, I do not think we are legislating properly. Senators may think that I am putting myself in the way of doing justice to meritorious characters when I know nothing about the subject. That may be true. I think it is altogether likely that if the committee will reëxamine this question and report back to the Senate that I am mistaken, and that I am interfering in a thing about which I know nothing, I shall be perfectly satisfied. I do not know that I shall put myself in the way here again. I differ with the Senator from Oregon. He says the cheapest way to do this thing is to vote the bill and get rid of it. It has suggested itself to my mind that to-morrow morning I will bring a suit against my friend from Oregon. He says that when a claim is prosecuted against a defendant the best way is to pay it. I will only make my claim against my friend very large, and he will pay me twelve per cent. to get rid of me, I suppose, as the cheapest way to settle the suit. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. No doubt I should make money by it. [Laughter.]

Mr. HENDERSON. I will say no more.

I hope we shall vote on this proposition and refer it back to the Naval Committee.

Mr. MORRILL. I am very much in the position of the Senator from Missouri; that is, I know nothing very specially about this case. I have a general impression resulting from a general reading of the case and from some observations upon the case as it has progressed here. But what occurs to me is this: what are we to gain by sending it back to the Committee on Naval Affairs? We send it back to them for what purpose; with what expectation? Is it said that any new light has been elicited by the debate? Are we satisfied that this committee have been corrected in their judgment, instructed, or informed by this debate, so that they are in a better condition now than they were when the debate began? If so, there might be some hope; but if they are all of the opinion of my honorable friend from West Virginia, [Mr. WILLEY], I should have very little expectation of their changing much this report.

Is it expected by those who propose to send the report back to the Naval Committee that new evidence is to be taken? Is there any new evidence to be offered? Is it to be returned to the committee with instructions to reinvestigate and take new evidence? If not, what is to be gained by a recommittal?

It is to be recommitted, I hear it suggested, for the purpose of classification. How valuable that would be, I do not know. It might aid the Senate somewhat in its investigation, possibly; but after all it would not enlighten the judgment of the committee, and so far as results are concerned they would reach the same things precisely. And now all of us can see that this is a question of confidence to some little extent. I feel that I, to some extent, am to vote on this as a question of the confidence I repose in the committee and the commission. I believe the allowance is reduced now, on the motion of the honorable Senator from Iowa, the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, to twelve per cent. on the contracts or twelve per cent. on some definite sum. That I understand now to be the judgment of that committee; I believe the entire committee. The moving of the amendment by the honorable chairman conveyed to me the inference that that is his judgment; and now I understand the committee are agreed that at least twelve per cent. ought to be paid. I understand the suggestion of the Senator from West Virginia to be that there are no claimants named in the bill who ought not at least to have that much.

Now, sir, if we are to act on that basis, what on earth is to be gained by longer delay in returning this to the committee? The classification which is suggested as possibly being an advantage to us, after all I conceive will be of very little use to us. I have read this report, and at one time I went through it somewhat with a view to make up a general judgment about it; and I think there is specification. Although there is general aggregation, there is detail; each case is set down by itself and each case was considered by itself.

I have made up my mind that on the whole, if it came to a general vote, I should vote for this bill, not that I have examined each case in detail and have become satisfied of its particular merit, but I do not forget the general fact that this work was done at a time when everybody must know that in the nature of things it was impracticable to do the thing without losing money. The Government was pressing in these shops in all directions. They were crowded with work. They gave up their own private enterprises to facilitate the public service; and I think we all know enough of the general disorders of the country, the general disruption of business affairs, to know that it was impracticable in the nature of things that these business operations could have gone forward under the circumstances at all economically to the contractors.

But I am not going to argue the question, because I am not sufficiently posted on the particular facts to justify it. I mean to say simply that all the evidence, all the facts offered in this case, concur in showing that this business on the whole was a bad business for the contractors. The general judgment of the committee now is that at least twelve per cent. is due these contractors. There is no danger that injustice will be done by the Government if that much is allowed; much more is claimed, and much more, I believe, the majority of the committee concluded to report to the Senate.

One other thing should be considered: how does this case come here? The question was here last year, presented to the consideration of the Senate, and on the whole it was thought best to refer it to the Department out of which these contracts originated, who were supposed to have some information of course of the whole affair, to appoint a commission—a commission of its own choice, a commission of its own men, who would sit upon these cases, hear all the evidence, and make up a judgment. That was a commission appointed on one side; it is what in ordinary parlance we should say was an ex parte arbitration, arbitrators chosen entirely on the part of the Government; not in the ordinary law parlance an indifferent arbitration, but an ex parte arbitration, arbitrators chosen by the Government itself, Government employes, Government officers. Certainly a presumption ought to arise, I submit, that so far as the Government is concerned it has had an umpire of its own choosing. Nobody says it was not intelligent; nobody suggests that it has not been indifferent; nobody suggests that the award has not been the result of full consideration; and now I think the fair deduction is that the Government interests, at least under these circumstances, were duly considered.

Then, in addition to that, it has had a further safeguard. That report coming into this Senate has been referred to one of your first committees, and you have the evidence of the manner in which they have attended to their duties, and to-day I understand that all that committee concur in the judgment and belief that at least twelve per cent. ought to be paid these persons. Under these circumstances, I rose only to suggest that I shall vote, not to recommit, but for the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri moves to recommit this bill to the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which the Senator from West Virginia moves an amendment to commit it to the Committee on Claims.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the motion of the Senator from Missouri to recommit the bill to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. CONNESS called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 13, nays 23; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chandler, Clark, Conness, Davis, Doolittle, Guthrie, Henderson, Howe, Kirkwood, Riddle, Sherman, Trumbull, and Wade—13.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Cragin, Foster, Grimes, Harris, Hendricks, Howard, Johnson, McDougall, Morgan, Morrill, Nesmith, Nye, Poland, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Van Winkle, Willey, Williams, and Wilson—23.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Cowan, Cresswell, Dixon, Edmunds, Fessenden, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Norton, Saulsbury, Wright, and Yates—13.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. HENDERSON. I have but one more motion to make in regard to this bill, and then, if the Senate desire, they can pass it. I move that the pending bill and the amendments be committed to the Committee on the Judiciary with instructions to report a bill by which the claimants may institute their several actions in the Court of Claims and recover such amount as will reimburse their actual cost in executing the contracts. I ask for the yeas and nays. ["No, no."] I withdraw the call.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. For the purpose of ascertaining what is the precise judgment of the Senate on this matter, I move to amend the bill—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa will allow the Chair to state the question. The bill is in the Senate, and the question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole. Shall the question be taken on the amendments separately?

Mr. GRIMES. I think they had better be taken separately.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The first amendment will be read.

The Secretary read the first amendment adopted in Committee of the Whole, which was to strike out the original bill after the enacting clause, and insert in lieu of it the following:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the several parties the awards made in their favor by the naval board organized under the resolution of the Senate adopted March 9, 1865, the awards being made under date of December 23, 1865, and reported to the Secretary of the Navy: Provided, That the payment shall not, in any case, exceed twelve per cent. upon the contract price, except in the case of the Comanche, in which case the award shall be paid in full.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the first amendment.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. After the vote is taken, will it be in order to move an amendment to the bill as amended?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be.

Mr. CLARK. I think the Chair is under a mistake. The Senator wants to amend the original bill by striking out, as I understand him, some of the names in the original bill.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I want to do just this: I want to get a test vote, if I can, in the Senate. I intend to move to strike out one of these appropriations.

Several SENATORS. Which one?

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I take the first one for machinery.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is no test vote.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I want to see whether it is the intention to consider these matters separately or altogether. I think the evidence in regard to this one is such that it ought to be stricken out. Whether I can do that at this time, or after the amendments are passed upon, I do not know.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator can very easily do it by a simple proviso, providing that no portion of the money shall be paid to the contractors who built the particular vessel. In my judgment, that is the only way to reach it.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I am not familiar with the rules. I will state what I want to have done. I want to strike out the allowance to the Globe Works for the machinery for the wooden double-ender Isoco, if I can get at that in some way.

Mr. McDUGALL. It has been ruled before that until the amendments of the Committee of the Whole have been acted upon in the Senate, it is not in order to move amendments. So it has been ruled several times. I have seen it here. Whether the ruling is right or not, I do not know; but that has been the ruling.

Mr. CLARK. I think the proposition is a very clear one. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. GRIMES] moves a substitute for the whole bill, and it is in order, certainly, before the substitute is voted upon, to amend the bill which is proposed to be stricken out. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. KIRKWOOD] proposes to amend the original bill by striking out one item from the bill, so that it will leave then, to the choice of the Senate, either to take the substitute of the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. GRIMES], or the amended bill.

Mr. CONNESS. But that will not reach his object.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Will it be in order for me now to move to amend the original bill in the respect which I have indicated?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. I understand from the suggestion of Senators accustomed to preside that it is in order to move to perfect the original bill before the vote is taken on striking it out and inserting a substitute. So the motion of the Senator from Iowa, in that state of things, is in order.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. If I can succeed in amending the original bill—

Mr. GRIMES. Let me inquire of my colleague if he does not think the sentiment of the Senate has been sufficiently tested on the subject, when they refused to commit the bill to either of the committees suggested for the purpose of separating these different claims. I believe the Senate, by a vote of almost two to one, decided that it should not be done.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I am not certain of that; and for the purpose of being assured of it, I move, if it be in order, to strike out of the original bill this item on page 3:

To the Globe Works, of South Boston, Massachusetts, upon the machinery for the Isoco and Massasoit, $59,577 99.

I have before me the report of the board showing the reasons why this award was made. It is one of the cases to which the Senator from New Hampshire called attention. This is the explanation given in that case:

"The contracts for these vessels were dated by the Navy Department August 15, 1862, in which they were allowed seven months, or until March 14, 1863, to complete the machinery and deliver the vessels to the Government, but the Massasoit was not so completed and delivered until the 9th of January, 1864, nor the Isoco until the 18th of January, 1864, the principal cause of delay being the difficulty in obtaining workmen, as the demand for the services of men in the Army and Navy was so great, and also on account of the number of vessels being built by the Government, making it impossible, with the scarcity of labor, to fulfill the contracts within the given time."

The only reason assigned for the delay is that they could not get hands to do the work, and we are called upon for that reason to pay them $29,789 for each vessel. I think that they ought not to be paid that amount for that reason, and therefore I move to strike out this item.

Mr. CLARK. I desire to make a suggestion to the Senator from Iowa. It is the evident symptom of the Senate that they will take the substitute instead of what will be left of the bill if this item be stricken out. Then are we not wasting time in this way?

Mr. KIRKWOOD. This will be out of the substitute as well as of the bill, as I understand.

Mr. CLARK. Not at all, because the substitute refers to the report.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Does not the substitute refer to the bill?

Mr. CLARK. No, the substitute does not refer to the bill; it refers to the original report of the board.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. If the Senate are determined to pass this measure as it is, be it so. I am sure this claim to which I have called attention ought not to pass. As, however, my amendment is supposed to be wasting time without any object, I withdraw it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the first amendment made as in Committee of the Whole as a substitute for the original bill.

The amendment was concurred in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on concurring in the remaining amendment, made as in Committee of the Whole, to add an additional section.

Mr. GRIMES. I move to amend that amendment by inserting the words "such amount of" before the word "compensation" at the close of the amendment, so that the Secretary of the Navy may pay these claimants if upon investigation he shall conclude that they are entitled to such an amount of compensation as is allowed in the previous section.

Mr. SUMNER. Certainly, I have no objection to that.

Mr. HENDRICKS. That amendment, I understand, refers the question to the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. SUMNER. Yes.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to; and the amendment, as amended, was concurred in, as follows:

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That in the cases of Donald McKay, of Boston, Massachusetts, who built the Ashuelot and machinery, and Miles Greenwood, of Cincinnati, Ohio, who built the Tippecanoe, whose contracts have been completed to the satisfaction of the Department, and who were prevented from appearing before the naval board, they shall be entitled to the same rate of compensation as is authorized to be paid to other parties building the same class of vessels and machinery; and such payment to be made to them, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, under the supervision of the Secretary of the Navy, provided the evidence submitted for his examination fully establishes the right of the said parties to such amount of compensation.

Mr. CLARK. I believe there is no amendment now pending.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is not.

Mr. CLARK. I move the following amendment as a new section:

And be it further enacted, That the sums hereby authorized to be paid to the parties herein named shall be in full for all work done by said parties on the vessels and machinery for which said sums are respectively paid, and if accepted by any of said parties shall be on that condition; and none of said parties shall be entitled to said sums until he shall execute a receipt in full for said claim.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. TRUMBULL. On the passage of the bill I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 22, nays 11; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Cragin, Foster, Grimes, Harris, Hendricks, Howard, Johnson, McDougall, Morgan, Morrill, Nesmith, Nye, Ramsey, Riddle, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Van Winkle, Willey, Williams, and Wilson—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Clark, Conness, Davis, Doolittle, Guthrie, Henderson, Howe, Kirkwood, Sherman, Trumbull, and Wade—11.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Chandler, Cowan, Creswell, Dixon, Edmunds, Fessenden, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Norton, Poland, Pomeroy, Saulsbury, Wright, and Yates—16.

So the bill was passed.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. RAMSEY. I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day, it be to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 76) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States; which was read twice by its title, referred to the joint committee on reconstruction, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 77) respecting brevet rank of officers of the Army; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

- POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move to take up the Post Office appropriation bill so that it may be left as the unfinished business of to-day to come up at one o'clock on Monday.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Before the bill is taken up, I desire to submit an amendment which I wish to have printed.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let the bill be taken up first.

The motion was agreed to; and the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 280) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867, and for other purposes, was resumed.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I wish to withdraw the amendment which I offered to this bill some days ago, and I now send to the Chair an amendment to take its place, and I ask that it be printed.

The amendment was received and ordered to be printed.

Mr. RAMSEY. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, April 27, 1866.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

FREEDMEN.

Mr. KASSON, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be communicated to this House a collation of the provisions in reference to freedmen, contained in the amended constitutions of the southern States, and in the laws passed by those States since the overthrow of the rebellion, so far as information upon that subject may be in the possession of the Executive Government.

COMMITTEE DISCHARGED FROM SUNDRY CASES.

On motion of Mr. ANCONA, the Committee on Military Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of the following cases, which were laid upon the table:

Petitions and memorials, with accompanying papers, of sundry officers and their legal representatives, for relief from responsibility on account of funds, vouchers, records, &c., captured and lost by them during the late war, namely: Majors E. L. Moore, C. C. Clark, D. Colden Ruggles, deceased, by his administrator, General George D. Ruggles, and John M. Austin, paymasters United States Army; Lieutenant Henry J. Spooner, Brevet Major William R. Murphy, Lieutenant Alfred C. Law, and Lieutenant Augustus H. Plummer, acting commissaries of subsistence.

Also, the following bills and joint resolution: A bill (H. R. No. 395) for the relief of Brevet Major T. C. Bowles, assistant quartermaster United States volunteers;

A bill (H. R. No. 148) for the relief of Captain Charles Brewster, commissary of subsistence; and Joint resolution (H. R. No. 111) for the relief of Lieutenant A. H. Pearl, acting commissary of subsistence.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I call for the regular order of business.

The House accordingly proceeded, as the regular order of business, to call the committees for reports of a private nature, commencing with the Committee of Claims.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts, from the Committee of Claims, made adverse reports on the petition of Lewis Laddons, and the petition of W. P. Ellison and others; which were laid on the table.

MUNROE YOUNG.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill for the relief of Munroe Young; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was read in full. It proposes to pay $141 70 in gold to the claimant, being the amount wrongfully collected of him as duties on articles recovered from the wreck of the British ship William Corey, at Portland, Maine, on the 19th of June, 1865.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay that motion on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EDWARD P. MCKINNEY.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts, from the Committee of Claims, reported House bill No. 354, for the relief of Edward P. McKinney, of Binghamton, late captain and assistant commissary of subsistence.

The bill was read. It allows $475, or so much thereof as the proof shall establish, on the claimant proving satisfactorily that the money was properly paid by him prior to the 13th of August, 1864, to men of the Rhode Island and United States cavalry, and that his vouchers were forcibly taken and destroyed between Harper's Ferry and Winchester, Virginia, without fault on his part.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay that motion on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LISTON H. PEARCE.

Mr. THORNTON, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill for the relief of Liston H. Pearce; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was read in full. It authorizes the payment of $540 in full for the services of the claimant as chaplain of the one hundred and thirty-second regiment Illinois volunteers during the recent rebellion.

The report in the case was read. It states that the claimant was appointed chaplain by Governor Yates, of Illinois, on the 1st of June, 1864, and his name, through the negligence of the officers, was never placed on the muster-roll.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I would like to know why, if this man has performed services during the whole of the war, his name was not on the roll. It is very strange that there should be a chaplain serving during the war, treated as such, and getting no pay. It is, perhaps, one of those cases spoken of the other day. There were many of these patriotic men who proposed to go into the war, and who were willing to serve for nothing, and after serving on those terms they now come back and ask for pay.

Mr. THORNTON. I will explain it. The petitioner served only for three months, instead of during the war, and his name was not put on the muster-roll, as appears clearly from the testimony, from no fault of his, but of the officers. All the officers of the regiment certified that he performed service as chaplain of the regiment, which served only three months. He supposed his name was on the roll, but in consequence of the neglect of the officers it was not. But he performed the service in good faith.

Mr. TAYLOR. I would ask the gentleman if this chaplain was ever appointed by the Governor of his State or in any other way.

Mr. THORNTON. He was appointed by Governor Yates, of Illinois, and afterward by the late President.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. It is not made entirely clear to my mind why this gentleman's name was not put upon the roll if he was a regular chaplain.

Mr. THORNTON. The evidence does not disclose the reason, but the inference is that it was from neglect on the part of the officers.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I understood my colleague to say that this claimant was only in the three months' service.

Mr. THORNTON. That was all.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Well, the amount is small.

Mr. DEMING. I would ask the gentleman if he was ever appointed a field officer by any competent authority?

Mr. THORNTON. He was, by Governor Yates, of Illinois.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. THORNTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BARK MARIA HENRY.

Mr. THORNTON also, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of the owners of the bark Maria Henry; which was read a first and second time.

The bill, which was read, directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay the sum of $12,000 to George Henry, agent of the owners of the bark Maria Henry, as full compensation for the use and detention of the said vessel by the United States from the 26th of February to the 26th of May, 1865, inclusive.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that this bill be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. THORNTON. I hope that motion will not prevail. This case has been investigated very carefully by the Committee of Claims, to which it was referred. It provides compensation to the owners of this bark for the use or detention of the vessel. I think the Committee of Claims is just as competent to take charge of an investigation of such a matter as the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I submit that this bill involves an appropriation and must have its first consideration in a Committee of the Whole House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would have sustained the point of order if it had been made in time, but the House has already considered the bill in the House. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] has moved to refer it to the Committee on Commerce, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THORNTON] is making remarks in opposition to that motion.

Mr. THORNTON. I ask that the report be read.

The report was read.

Mr. THORNTON. It will be seen by the report that in February, 1865, the quartermaster's department chartered this vessel to carry oats and hay from Portland, Maine, to Port Royal, South Carolina; and the agreement was that she was not to be detained in discharging her cargo longer than ten days. This would have released the vessel on the 26th of February. Instead of that she was detained at Port Royal until the 9th of March, 1865, and was then ordered to Moorhead City, North Carolina, and there discharged her cargo, and was detained there until the 26th of May, 1865. The vessel was thus detained by the military authorities for nearly a hundred days. She then sailed for Philadelphia.

The proof shows that during the time this vessel was detained by the military authorities she might have earned $12,500 in carrying coal from Philadelphia to New Orleans. But the bark was detained, as I have said, and the committee have fixed upon the sum of $12,000 as the amount of damages sustained by the owners of the bark in consequence of this detention.

The committee are satisfied, from a thorough examination of the case, that the amount is much less than the very serious damage done the owners of the vessel during the time of its detention by the military authorities. I hope the bill will pass, and not be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I made the motion to refer this bill to the Committee on Commerce because bills of this character are always referred to that committee, as they have the jurisdiction of cases of this kind. I trust my colleague [Mr. THORNTON] will make no objection to referring this bill to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. THORNTON. I hope not; the matter has been already fully investigated.

Mr. UPSON. Is this amount of $12,000 estimated and reckoned as a loss of profit?

Mr. THORNTON. The difficulty was in determining upon the proper rule for estimating the amount of damages. The owners claimed constructive damages; but the committee based the amount here named in the bill upon the last contract made to carry coal from Philadelphia to New Orleans, and for carrying that coal the owners could have netted $12,500. In view of that and of the port and insurance charges and outfitting expenses, the committee are satisfied that $12,000 will not cover the entire loss.

Mr. UPSON. It is, then, an estimate of loss of profits?

Mr. THORNTON. To some extent it is.

Mr. UPSON. I do not know upon what principle of law this can be given.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. From the reading of the report in this case it appears that this contract was entered into, and a certain amount stipulated as demurrage, which, at the rate of $12,000 for the time here named, would make $48,000 a year for a bark which I presume could have been bought for $12,000 in the first instance.

Mr. THORNTON. It was a new bark, and cost $60,000. This was its first trip, according to the proof of merchants in Portland, Maine. The gentleman, therefore, is entirely mistaken in his conclusion.

Mr. LYNCH. I will say, in reply to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN,] that this was a new vessel of six hundred and forty tons, and this charter to the Government was for her first voyage. The vessel was worth from sixty to sixty-five thousand dollars. She was chartered for this trip to Port Royal, and was detained, as has been stated by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. THORNTON,] for sixty-nine days. She was rechartered to go to Philadelphia for a cargo of coal, and while waiting there she was notified that no cargo could be provided for her.

She was finally discharged in May, just at the time when business was at a stand-still in consequence of the collapse of the rebellion, and no freight could be obtained there. And the vessel had to take a very low charter to go from there to St. John, and there take a charter to England. Any gentleman acquainted with commercial matters must know very well that a vessel on a voyage cannot afford to take demurrage for lying in port. And besides all this, if the owners had had the liberty to take a charter at the time the Government chartered her, it has been shown here, and attested by the evidence of merchants in New York, Philadelphia, and Portland, who are well acquainted with these matters, that the owners would have made in that time more than twenty thousand dollars. This is not speculative at all, but the ordinary freight of the vessel, based upon the amount she earned from the time she left Portland until the time she had discharged her cargo at Port Royal.

Now, I want to say one word further, in regard to the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] to refer the bill to the Committee on Commerce. That will involve a delay of some months, and will very probably carry it beyond the close of this session. The Committee of Claims have had the matter in charge from the first of the session. There have been no lobby agents here, for the men who own this vessel are not able to employ lobby agents. They are a few men of limited means, who have put all their means in this vessel, and are now embarrassed for want of what is justly due them from the Government.

There are now claims upon the vessel which are waiting the payment of this amount which is due from the Government. I hope, at any rate, that the matter will be settled here now, so that these parties may know what is to be their fate. I trust that the bill will not be permitted to go over to the next session, which would inevitably be its fate if it should be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. DELANO. There are a number of other matters which I desire to get before the House this morning; and therefore I feel compelled to call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; which was upon the motion to refer the bill to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was not agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. THORNTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

COMPENSATION FOR HORSES.

Mr. THORNTON, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to provide for the payment of horses and other property destroyed in the military service of the United States,' approved June 25, 1864;" which was read a first and second time.

The bill provides that the act which it proposes to amend shall, from the commencement of the recent rebellion, extend to and include all cases of the loss of any horse by any officer, non-commissioned officer, private, or musician in the military service of the United States, while in the line of his duty in such service, by the abandonment of the same in consequence of injury arising from unavoidable accidents in land transportation furnished by the Government, wherever it shall appear that such abandonment was the result of the order of a superior officer, and the injury and loss were without any fault or negligence on the part of the person sustaining such loss.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read the third time.

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. Speaker, I will only remark that a law passed in 1849 provided for compensation for the loss of horses in consequence of accidents in water transportation. In 1864 another law was enacted, providing for compensation for the loss of horses captured by the enemy. There have been referred to the Committee of Claims a number of resolutions and bills contemplating compensation for horses lost in the recent war in consequence of unavoidable accidents by land transportation. During the war a great many horses were transported upon the various railroads of the country; and this bill simply provides that the act of 1864 shall be extended so as to include cases of horses abandoned by order of a superior officer, in consequence of unavoidable accident resulting from land transportation furnished by the Government. It will embrace only a very small class of cases. The committee are satisfied, from the cases which have come before them, that a law of this kind is necessary and just.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

Mr. McKEE. I trust the gentleman will not press the demand for the previous question. I desire to offer a substitute for the bill.

Mr. THORNTON. I respectfully decline to yield for that purpose. I am satisfied that the House is not ready at this time to go further than this bill provides; and I prefer that the gentleman should present his proposition at some other time.

On seconding the previous question, there were—ayes 53, noes 11; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER, under the rule, ordered tellers; and appointed Messrs. THORNTON and McKEE.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes seventy-five, noes not counted.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. THORNTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; which were thereupon signed by the Speaker:

An act (S. No. 158) to facilitate the settlement of accounts of the Treasurer of the United States, and to secure certain moneys to the United States, or to the persons to whom they are due, and who are entitled to receive the same; and

An act (S. No. 255) to remit and refund certain duties.

FRANCIS A. GIBBONS.

Mr. DELANO, from the Committee of Claims, reported back House bill No. 386, for the relief of Francis A. Gibbons, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill, which was read, provides that the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise expended, the sum of $563 19 to Francis A. Gibbons, the same being money paid by him for property purchased at a quartermaster's sale, in the city of Baltimore, Maryland, on the 15th day of February, 1863, under the direction of Colonel Belger, assistant quartermaster, which was not delivered to the purchaser.

Mr. DELANO demanded the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. DELANO moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BEALS AND DIXON.

Mr. DELANO, from the same committee, reported back Senate resolution No. 56, authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to adjust the claim of Beals & Dixon against the United States, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The joint resolution, which was read, provides that the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to cause the accounts of Beals & Dixon, for deliveries of material after May 1, 1861, under their contracts with the United States, to be adjusted and paid; allowing to said Beals & Dixon such additional prices for material delivered after May 1, 1861, as, in his opinion, they may be justly entitled to under the provisions of their supplementary contract, dated January 1, 1857; provided, that in the opinion of the Attorney General said Beals & Dixon have a legal claim upon the United States for an increase of prices under said contract.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. DELANO moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

GOLDSMITH BROTHERS.

Mr. DELANO. I am directed by the Committee of Claims to report back Senate bill No. 192, for the relief of Goldsmith Brothers, of the cities of San Francisco, California, and Portland, Oregon, brokers, and to move that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

I will barely say to the House and to the friends of this bill, which is to duplicate certain Treasury notes to the amount of $10,000 alleged to have been lost, that the committee after a careful analysis of the evidence came to the conclusion that in two particulars, it is too weak to justify them in recommending the passage of the bill, and for the purpose of enabling the friends to supply this deficiency I move its reference as I have indicated.

Mr. HENDERSON. When are we likely to reach the bill in the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar? I want to know so as to have the necessary proof ready.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would infer from the remarks of the chairman when the evidence is supplied he will call the case up. The bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

Mr. DELANO. I ask to have entered a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred, so that I may have the bill under my control.

The motion was accordingly entered.

ELISHA J. HOUSE.

Mr. DELANO, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill for the relief of Elisha J. House. The bill was read a first and second time.

It provides that the proper accounting officers of the Treasury Department shall credit and allow Elisha J. House $797 47 in the settlement of his accounts.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

WILLIAM M'BRYANT.

On motion of Mr. DELANO, the Committee of Claims was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of William McBryant, and the same was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

EMPLOYMENT OF A CLERK.

Mr. DELANO, in response to a resolution of the House, reported that in the judgment of the Committee of Claims a clerk is necessary and indispensable for the transaction of its business; that all the customary hours of labor during the day, and frequently far into the night, are devoted by the clerk to the necessary and legitimate business of the committee, and that no member of the committee has employed him in attending to private business during business hours for the reason that his time is fully employed in his public duties.

The report was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

W. N. SWAYNE AND P. K. HOWARD.

Mr. WARD, from the Committee of Claims, to which was referred the claim of W. N. Swayne and P. K. Howard, for damages sustained by collision of a United States transport with a tug on the Mississippi river, August 18, 1865, reported back the same with a joint resolution referring the claim for adjudication to the Court of Claims.

The joint resolution was read a first, second, and third time, and passed.

Mr. WARD moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved to lay that motion on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

HENRY HORNE.

Mr. McKEE, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill for the benefit of Henry Horne; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was read in full. It authorizes the payment of $400 in gold, or its equivalent in United States currency, being the amount advanced by him for the use of Federal prisoners at Andersonville in 1864 and 1865, under the supervision of Father Whelan.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. McKEE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay that motion on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. McKEE, from the Committee of Claims, made adverse reports on the following cases; which were ordered to lie on the table:

Petitions of William B. L. Thrasher, James Byers, and Benjamin Roach.

NATHAN NOYES.

Mr. THORNTON, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill for the relief of Nathan Noyes; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was read in full. It authorizes the payment to the claimant $150 in full satisfaction of Treasury warrant No. 8885, dated January 15, 1866, on the surrender of said warrant.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. THORNTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay that motion on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JAMES CRUTCHETT.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts, from the Committee of Claims, reported back Senate joint resolution No. 60, referring the petition and papers in the case of James Crutchett to the Court of Claims; and moved that the same be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the motion by which the joint resolution was indefinitely postponed; and also moved to lay that motion on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana, from the Committee of Claims, made an adverse report on the claim of N. P. Munroe; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. DELANO, from the same committee, reported adversely on the following cases; which were ordered to lie on the table:

Petitions of A. H. Markland, R. M. Shelton, John Kaye, M. J. Gonzales, James McLaughlin, and others.

CHARLES BREWER AND COMPANY.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill for the relief of Charles Brewer & Co.; which was read a first and second time.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Charles Brewer & Co., of Boston, Massachusetts, the sum of $3,520, in full for the passage in the Hawaiian bark Kamehameha, of sixty-eight destitute seamen belonging to American vessels which were burned by the Anglo-confederate pirate Shenandoah, from the island of Ascension to Honolulu.

Mr. ANCONA. I ask that the report be read.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. There is no report, except a letter from the Secretary of State. I ask that it be read.

The Clerk read the letter as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
WASHINGTON, March 14, 1866.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith a copy of a letter from Messrs. Charles Brewer & Co., of Boston, inclosing to this Department an account of the Hawaiian bark Kamehameha V, for the passage of destitute American seamen from the Ascension islands to Honolulu. These seamen, numbering sixty-eight, belonging to American vessels which were burned by the pirate Shenandoah, were landed on the Ascension islands without any provision being made for their support. They were found in a destitute condition by the master of the bark Kamehameha V, and taken to Honolulu. It seems but just and proper that this claim should be promptly paid. As, however, there is no fund at the disposal of this Department with which to meet it, the claim is respectfully referred to Congress, with the recommendation that an appropriation be made sufficient to cover it.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

Hon. E. B. WASHBURN, Chairman of the Committee on Commerce, House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired. Is there any objection to considering this bill at this time?

Mr. ANCONA. I demand the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. Then the bill goes over until next Friday.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

On motion of Mr. NIBLACK, by unanimous consent, the Committee of Appropriations was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of J. H. Sherwin; and the same was referred to the select committee of freedmen's affairs.

NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD.

The House then proceeded, as the regular order of business, to the consideration of the unfinished business of last evening, being House bill No. 414, to secure the speedy construction of the Northern Pacific railroad and telegraph line, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes.

The pending question was Mr. WESTWORTH's motion to refer to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. STEVENS. I hope, before anything else is done, the substitute which I offered yesterday will be read as I have modified it.

The substitute, as modified, was read.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I would inquire if that substitute has been printed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it has not been printed as it now stands. Some parts of the substitute as now offered have been printed, but some parts of it are in manuscript.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. How is it before the House?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] by the consent of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WESTWORTH,] who made the motion to refer the bill to the Committee on Public Lands, moved a substitute for the bill, and this morning he has modified that substitute, as he had a right to do.

Mr. BINGHAM obtained the floor.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope this substitute will be printed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] is entitled to the floor.

THE TAX BILL.

Mr. MORRILL. With the consent of the gentleman from Ohio, who has the floor, I desire to state to the House that the bill amending the internal revenue act which was made the special order for Thursday of next week, will not be called up before next Monday week after the morning hour. The bill will not be printed before-to-morrow; and gentlemen have intimated to me that they will not be able to examine its provisions before the time I have indicated.

NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD—AGAIN.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I do not know, in view of the many and various objections which were urged to this bill as originally reported by the committee, that I would have been willing to have given my vote for it in the form in which it first came into the House, for the reason that the bill, by reason of the general terms in which it was reported, was liable to misconstruction, and possibly liable therefore to the very objections urged against it by some of the gentlemen who have spoken.

But, sir, in my judgment, the substitute which has just been read to the House removes and silences every objection that has been urged by gentlemen who have heretofore spoken against the adoption of this measure.

I agree with gentlemen that it is the duty at all times of the Representatives of the people to guard with jealous care the Treasury of the nation. Assuming that position, and agreeing to the fullest extent, upon that point with honorable gentlemen who have spoken against this measure, I beg to say that it is capable of absolute demonstration that the substitute which has just been read in the hearing of the House, in any event, whether this company goes forward with this work or abandons it, guards the Treasury of the nation and puts money into it. The act of 1864 has passed for the time being beyond the power of this House. Rights have been vested under it. No forfeiture has arisen. The time has not expired, as was suggested at one time by my honorable colleague, [Mr. DELANO,] but which I believe he afterward corrected—the time has not yet expired which was fixed by the terms of the act of 1864, within which the corporators could exercise the privileges secured to them by that act.

Nor does that time expire, by the terms of the act, until the month of July next, within which time these corporators or their assignees, whoever they may be, may secure to themselves beyond the reach of cure on the part of this House the great franchise provided for in the act of 1864.

Now, what change is wrought in this legislation by the substitute as now presented to the House, and which I hope will pass, if for no other reason than that it so materially changes the existing act as to give additional security and make assurance doubly sure that this great road, the need of the country, will be speedily constructed? The pending substitute does this, among other things: it enables the Government of the United States to reclaim at once and hold as a security for the construction of this road—which all members will admit to be essential to the prosperity of the country and the development of its resources in the Northwest—all the lands contained in the original grant of 1864, lying south of the line of survey from the shores of Lake Superior to the shores of the Pacific ocean. The amount of land thus reclaimed is variously estimated on this side of this House and on that side. I have not stopped myself to make the calculation, but I am informed by one of the members of the committee, who has given his attention to it, that the amount of land thus reclaimed for the purpose of constructing this road is not less than twenty-three million acres.

What are the additional guards thrown into this bill by the substitute, and which, I say, remove the objections which gentlemen have urged here against it? The substitute provides that the Government of the United States shall not pledge one dollar of credit to the payment for the construction of any part of this road, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] urged yesterday, and urged not without some color of authority from the text of the bill as it was originally reported. Sir, the substitute is guarded as carefully as human language can guard anything, it limits and restricts the Secretary of the Treasury so that he can never issue the pledge of this Government save when the company shall have first constructed twenty-five consecutive miles or more of this road, and then the pledge is only to extend to the number of sections so completed. In the first division of the road, upon the construction of twenty-five miles or more by the company, and the full completion thereof as provided by the provisions of the original charter and of the pending substitute, the Secretary of the Treasury is to issue the pledge of the Government for the payment of the interest upon two hundred shares of the stock of the road per mile, to the extent that the road shall be so constructed, and after its completion, and not before.

As the company proceed with the work, by the construction of additional sections of the road from year to year, the pledge of the interest is only to be given under this limitation: for the first year, not more than fifty miles; for the second year, not more than one hundred miles; for the third year, not more than two hundred miles; for the fourth year, not more than two hundred miles; and thereafter not more than three hundred miles per year till the whole road is completed. The Secretary of the Treasury is to proceed to pledge, subject to these limitations, the credit of the Government, to guaranty the interest only upon the stock of the road, under the further limitations within the first division, which extends from the eastern terminus to the one hundred and first meridian of longitude, at the rate of two hundred shares to the mile and no more. This, sir, is not a pledge of the Government, as has been asserted over and over again in the hurry of debate, to pay the stock or any part of the stock. It is to pay the interest, and only the interest, semi-annually, from and after the date of the pledge, and not ante-dating it at the rate of six per cent. for so much of the road as shall have been constructed, and only upon two hundred shares of the stock per mile within the first division. The original charter fixes the amount of the shares at $100 each.

What, then, is the whole amount which the Government of the United States is liable to pay as interest semi-annually upon the first division of this road, as the same may be completed? It is but $1,200 per mile; that and no more. I hope the House will not mistake me in what I say here—$1,200 is the interest per mile on two hundred shares to the mile of the eastern division at $100 per share.

The interest per annum on the eastern division is $1,200 per mile, and no more, over the whole division. The gentleman [Mr. FARNSWORTH] says that it makes $24,000 in twenty years, but I ask him to remember his words of yesterday, which did injustice to his own intelligence, when he intimated that under this bill we were to allow the company this magnificent grant of lands on the north side of this road, and construct the road, too. Who ever before heard, in this country, of $1,200 building a railroad to the extent of a mile? Why, it would not supply the ties, to say nothing about grading the road, to say nothing about constructing the bridges, to say nothing about furnishing the iron, to say nothing about the work necessary to lay it down in its place, and to say nothing about the equipment of the road, all of which is provided for in the original act of incorporation, and by this bill is a condition-precedent to be performed by the company before the United States gives its pledge to pay $1,200 per mile per annum. What I have just said applies throughout the whole extent of the eastern division, a distance of about three hundred and eighty miles.

But, says the gentleman, that will be $24,000 per mile at the end of twenty years. So it might be if the Government in all that time received no returns either from the proceeds of the completed road or the sale of the lands. But, sir, upon the hypothesis that the company would build the road to the extent required by the law, and we are not to issue this pledge until the company does this—when we secure twenty-five per cent. of the gross proceeds of the road as is provided in this bill, and have the absolute control of it, the road touching your great inland sea, Lake Superior—I would like to know whether one fourth of the gross proceeds of the road would not pay the interest at the rate of six per cent. upon one half of the cost of its construction. I undertake to say, sir, that under the limitations of this bill, the Government does not assume to pay more than the interest upon one half the cost of the construction upon the eastern division of the road. Twelve hundred dollars per mile is but the interest on $20,000, and who believes that less than $40,000 will build and equip the road in the manner required by the original act? But if twenty-five per cent. of the gross proceeds of the road would not be sufficient, what remains? Some twelve thousand acres of land to each mile on the south side of the road, in addition to the twenty-five per cent. of the gross proceeds of the completed road are reserved to the Government to secure the Government on its pledge of $1,200 annually per mile.

The other gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN,] in arguing this question yesterday, objected to some of the provisions of the third section on the ground that the covenants were not mutual between the corporation and the Government; that the bill contained no provision which would enable the Government to enforce the security provided for its protection. On that point I ask the attention of the House to the consideration of the fact that by the substitute just read the third section has been struck out. Hence that objection falls to the ground, especially in view of the other provision contained in the substitute, that if the corporation shall fail to pay the interest for a period of ninety days after the maturity of the obligation it shall then be within the power of the Treasurer of the United States to proceed to sell every acre of the twelve thousand acres adjacent to each mile of the road so constructed and on the south side, and put the proceeds into the Treasury of the United States for the purpose of reimbursing the Government.

Upon a showing of this sort, I submit to gentlemen that there is no room here to cavil on this question of security, entire security, to the Government for this pledge of interest—none at all. I admit that there is a higher rate per mile laid upon the Government in the mountain district, which is the second or third division. But when gentlemen look into this question, they will find that, view it as they may, unless history altogether fails to repeat itself in this country in relation to railroads, it is utterly impossible that the Government of the United States can ever by possibility be a loser to the extent of a single dollar, in the event of the construction of the road, and without its construction by the company the Government incurs no liability whatever. The provisions of the bill pending simply secure the construction of the road by the company or the forfeiture of all the privileges granted by the bill.

In order that gentlemen may fully appreciate all the provisions of the pending substitute touching the other divisions of the road, I ask their attention to the further provision of the bill, that upon the second division of the road, there shall be pledged by the Government the interest upon two hundred and fifty shares per mile for the distance of six hundred and twenty miles, when completed by the company, and which, being carefully computed, amounts to $1,500 annually per mile. Let gentlemen consider that, before the second division of this road is reached at all, before one dollar is pledged by the Government of the United States toward the payment of interest upon one rod of the road to be constructed within the second division, you will already have in running order a road of three hundred and eighty miles running from the shores of Lake Superior westward.

Is any gentleman going to tell me such a road as that, in full operation and thoroughly equipped by this company, with twelve thousand acres of land to every mile of it, to be sold in the event of delay to pay the interest of this debt; that the Government of the United States, with the proceeds of these twelve thousand acres of land to each mile of the road and twenty-five per cent. of the gross proceeds of the road, cannot pay interest upon one half the cost of its construction or $1,200 per annum upon each mile of the completed road? If that could be so, a railroad would never be built upon this continent. Never, sir.

Mr. SPALDING. I do not think my colleague is readily embarrassed by interruption.

Mr. BINGHAM. Not at all; but my time is limited. I will, however, yield to my colleague for a moment.

Mr. SPALDING. I will barely ask, inasmuch as the gentleman says that the substitute materially alters the features of the bill, whether he expects the House to vote on that substitute without having an opportunity to read it in print. I am told that our objections are remedied by the substitute. If so, we would be happy to vote for it. I want my friend, before he sits down, to let us hear from him in regard to the fact of attaching this whole liability to the Government upon the credit of the nation.

Mr. BINGHAM. If my colleague had observed and weighed the words I uttered, he would have noticed I admitted the general scope and purpose of the bill, by reason of the generality of its language as originally reported, were liable to the misconstruction put upon it by gentlemen who have already spoken. The language of the substitute is so plain that it requires no lawyer to understand it. There is not a man between these oceans who can read the English language who will fail to know that the Government of the United States, under the substitute, can never issue one dollar of pledge for the payment of interest except at the rates provided, mile for mile, as the road is constructed, and not till it is completed within the limitations named.

I now come back to the further provisions of the bill of which I was speaking when interrupted by my colleague.

In the third division of the road the Government is to pledge the interest upon five hundred shares to the mile for five hundred and twenty miles. The third is the mountain division, on which the pledge amounts to $3,000 per annum per mile. What I have already said will justify me in saying that when the road reaches this mountain region, where are gold and silver and copper and iron beyond computation, the one fourth the gross proceeds of the road will pay, not simply interest at six per cent. on one half of the cost of its construction, but twenty per cent. on one half of the cost of its construction.

In the fourth division the limitation of the bill is the interest upon three hundred shares to the mile for two hundred and eighty miles, or $1,800 annually per mile. This is the substance of the bill as amended.

Now, touching its effect on the credit of the Government of the United States. By the adoption of this substitute you secure, in my judgment, the construction of this road. How? You lend the credit of a great people to an organized company, by which they are able to call upon the capitalists of the whole civilized world and say to them, no matter what may be the stress upon the credit of the United States, the Congress does not hesitate to pledge the credit of the Government to secure the payment semi-annually of interest upon the track of this great road.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's twenty minutes have expired.

Mr. BINGHAM. Only a word further. I repeat, the passage of this bill secures the construction of the road by saying to European capitalists, this great nation, oppressed as it is with a public debt of $3,000,000,000, considers this stock and company a perfect security against any embarrassment to its Treasury, a perfect security that not another cent of burden will be laid upon this people by reason of the loan of the nation's credit.

That is the position I assume here to-day. I wish to place it on record, that in my judgment the provisions of this bill, if passed, will never lay one cent of burden upon any citizen of the Republic. It cannot in the nature of things, unless a railroad like that pointing to the gold regions and commencing upon the shore of Lake Superior shall, by one fourth of its gross proceeds and the proceeds of twelve thousand acres of land to every mile of it, fail to pay the interest upon one half the cost of its construction and equipment.

I beg leave to say further that this measure, if adopted, instead of increasing the burdens of the people, will diminish them.

The adoption of this measure secures the construction of this road at a very early day to such an extent as, I believe, from the best information I have, will unite the head of navigation on the Missouri river with the head of navigation on the Columbia river, so that within the period of two years after the adoption of this bill we shall have through communication by rail and water from the Pacific to the Atlantic ocean. The survey reveals the fact that the distance between the navigable waters of the Missouri and Columbia is not more than five hundred miles; a remarkable revelation, indicating that God, in His providence, has so ordered it that this grand country, looking out upon Asia from the western slope of the Rocky mountains, and looking out upon Europe from the eastern slope, is to be one country, now and forever, one and inseparable.

I think it is the duty of statesmen to pass this bill if the effect of the measure will be to draw to the construction of this road the capitalists of the world, who are looking with eager eyes to our gold regions, and thus reduce the burdens of the people by the increase of the nation's wealth and the development of our great resources. It is certainly the first duty of statesmen, to whom the people have committed the trust of legislating for the general welfare, so to shape their legislation as to develop all the resources of this country, and thereby make this youngest-born of the nations the producer and the carrier for the civilized world; to enable it, in short, to lay its hand on the uncounted treasures of your vast western domain and the immense commerce of the great East, and make itself the carrier of the trade of all Europe, with China and the Indies, by the shortest possible route upon this planet.

I now yield twenty minutes of the remainder of my time to the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROGERS.]

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I have listened with considerable attention to the discussions which have grown out of this bill for the last two or three days, and especially to the position which has been taken by those who are opposed to it. In fact, from the wholesale charges which were made against the integrity of those who are here endeavoring to get this bill passed, before I had given the bill reflection and looked at the consequences that would result to the nation from our action in passing it, I was almost led to believe that some of the charges that have been made by those who appeared to be such sticklers at this time for the Treasury were true. But, sir, I find that the grand idea that appears to have been sought to be impressed upon members of this House and upon the country has been that this is a gigantic scheme or swindle for the purpose of robbing the Treasury of the United States and the people of the country. And, sir, I must say here in advance, as regards some of the persons whose names appear as directors of this corporation, that the charges which have been made against them as being public plunderers of the Treasury and men unworthy of the confidence of good citizens, are such as ought to be repelled by those who know the personal character, standing, and reputation of those men.

I find among those directors the names of R. D. Rice and of Hon. D. M. Swift, a former member of Congress, who, according to the theory of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. DELANO,] belong to the swarm of men who have come here for the purpose of depleting and robbing the Treasury of the United States for the purpose of putting the spoils into their own pockets.

Sir, it must be a weak case, indeed, that will not be met by argument on the part of those who are opposed to it; and because these men have been unable to discuss the real merits of this question at all, I have taken the trouble to investigate it and see whether these charges of wholesale fraud and corruption are true.

It is said by gentlemen who oppose this bill that this bill has been attempted to be put through under the previous question. This objection was raised by the honorable gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN,] who is himself always most ready to take advantage of the previous question whenever it answers his purpose. And yet he comes here and undertakes to brow-beat members who take the part of these honorable people, by howling against the attempt to make use of the previous question. I ask the gentleman to remember when my own State was interested in the passage of a bill, when one of her railroad corporations that had plighted to it the faith of the State of New Jersey, was attempted to be shielded by this Congress, then the gentleman was willing to shut my mouth and refused to allow me one minute to be heard in the defense of my own State, although millions of dollars were involved in the interest of that corporation, and hundreds of thousands of dollars of taxes in the interest of the people of my State.

I say, sir, that it is with a very poor grace that gentlemen of that character, men who have taken the position that that gentleman has taken in regard to the demand for the previous question upon measures heretofore pending of a like character to this, come before the House now and tell the country that this is a gigantic scheme to rob the Treasury of the United States, simply because by a vote of the House the bill was authorized to be brought before it at a night session, and because notice was given by the gentleman who had control of the bill that at some future time the previous question would be called upon it.

Now, there is no fraud and no taint of fraud in this bill from the beginning to the end of it; and there ought to be no imputations of that character upon honorable gentlemen who are here endeavoring to advance the best interests of the country by establishing this great railroad route which is to connect the Atlantic and the Pacific oceans by bands of iron and by the iron horse, which is to transport our troops in time of war, thus enabling us to bid defiance to Great Britain by locomotive power, which will run our troops and munitions of war along the very frontier of the British domain if they undertake to hurl their lion against the rights and liberties of this country.

Now, sir, I am moved, in my consideration of this bill, by nothing but what I believe to be the interests of the country. I do not wish to put it in the power of thieves to deplete the Treasury, but I believe that the United States, instead of being damaged by the construction of this grand enterprise, will stride onward in the path of prosperity; it will invite the legions of the Old World to these shores; and it will enable the people of this country to protect their rights and liberties whenever an invasion shall be made upon it by any foreign power.

But the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASH-

BURNE] says that another reason why we ought not to support this bill is that a great lobby has been here to secure its passage. The gentleman knows more about the lobby than I do. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHELLEBARGER] and his colleague [Mr. DELANO] say that they have been informed by somebody that the persons who originally went into this enterprise sold out and got $150,000 in money for their charter. I ask the honorable gentlemen how they happen to have such information unless they themselves have come in close contact with this immense and powerful lobby which is said to be employed to advocate this measure. I hurl back in the teeth of those who charge that there is a lobby here for the purpose of advocating this bill, the fact that the most powerful and gigantic interests known to exist among the railroad interests of the country are here to advance their own interests and prevent the passage of this bill.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Will the gentleman let me ask him a question?

Mr. ROGERS. Not now. Gentlemen talk about there being a lobby here. My experience, and I suppose the experience of every other gentleman here, is that no great enterprise has ever been started but that there were some men behind it to carry it on; and unless there were enterprising men, like these railroad men who are endeavoring to link the Atlantic and Pacific together, enterprises of this kind would die out, and we never would have that progress and civilization which have always been developed by the railroad interests of the country, as has been demonstrated in Illinois by the Central railroad which was established there; and I feel convinced that if we only plant ourselves upon the principles that the State of Illinois planted itself upon when it authorized that company to carry out its functions, we shall advance the prosperity, the wealth, the enlightenment, and the happiness of this grand empire of ours so as to make it equal to the State of Illinois, and you will find that those lands which are not now worth more than from twelve and a half to twenty-five cents per acre, will readily sell for ten and fifteen dollars per acre.

I do not believe that one dollar will be drawn from the Treasury of the United States which will not be paid back again. This entire road is to be within the control of Congress, and the moment this corporation, after the road is equipped and in running order, refuses to comply with one of the conditions of the charter which Congress has given them, we can file a bill in the court of chancery to have that charter forfeited, and we can stop the running of the road.

Now I do not believe it possible that when capitalists have invested twice what it is proposed the Government shall indorse in the way of interest, they will ever permit to be forfeited to the Government of the United States all the franchises of that corporation, merely to escape the payment of the forty or fifty million dollars that may come in time in the way of interest from the Treasury of the United States to help out this grand enterprise.

Now, I am for advancing the interests of this whole country. And in this grand enterprise I see that which I believe will bind the commerce of the country together from the Atlantic to the Pacific ocean. And the great continent of Asia, with its six hundred million inhabitants, will pour its commerce through this channel. And not only the great West, but the great East, the city of New York, and all the commercial cities of the sea-board, as well as the inland towns, are interested in this measure far beyond the pitiful sum of $57,000,000, about which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] talks so much as a depletion of the Treasury.

Sir, he did not talk about the depletion of the Treasury of the United States when the Freedmen's Bureau bill was up here; a bill which, according to the estimate of the President of the United States, would have cost the country $50,000,000 a year—a bill that would have required a standing army in time of peace. The gentleman from Illinois did not hesitate to cast his vote in favor of that bill, that obnoxious, wicked, and pernicious measure, on account of any depletion of the Treasury of the United States. When the interest of any case happens to suit his constituents, and his own feelings and interest and ambition, especially if a bill happens to have been reported from the committee which he represents, then he does not seem to think so much about the Treasury of the United States; but with all his power, and with all the zeal and venom which he has exhibited in this case, he portrays to this House, in almost wild enthusiasm, the reasons why he wants the measure carried into effect.

This is no political question; it is a question that is in no way connected with politics. It is a question that recommends itself to the sound discretion of members of this Congress, representing the interests of the whole country. And although my constituents, in the fourth congressional district of the State of New Jersey, may not be directly interested in this grand enterprise, yet the country is interested in it; a country that I expect to see united one day; whose flag I hope may float over the capitol of South Carolina as it floats to-day from the dome of this Capitol. And I feel myself called upon, as a man who loves his country, and has its best interests at heart, to sustain this great national enterprise which is to make us glorious and powerful. If there ever was a measure that appeals to the sympathies, magnanimity, and patriotism of all who love their country, and has the best interests of his posterity and of coming generations at heart, it is this; and we should not seek to destroy it simply because some millions of dollars may be drawn from the Treasury of the United States.

I have more confidence in the integrity, patriotism, and love of country of the people than to believe that they will refuse to return to the Congress of the United States any man who shall honestly, and from high and conscientious convictions, vote in favor of this magnificent enterprise. They are not so narrow-minded as that; they are not so puritanical as that. And when this bill shall be passed, and the road shall have been completed; when trains are running on it, carrying our glorious flag to those mountains, with the grand principles of American liberty, we shall have done that for our country which will equal all that any other Government has ever done for the people under it.

Men talk as if the Treasury of the United States were bankrupt, as if our national finances were in the most desperately hopeless condition, as if the country were ruined. Why, sir, this nation can bear a burden of debt much larger than the amount now resting upon it. In view of our present national debt of $4,000,000,000, which the people are so anxious and ready to pay, no man need undertake to make me believe that the mere addition of some $50,000,000 to that debt will deplete or destroy the ability of the United States to meet its obligations. No, sir, there is no such weakness on the part of this Government.

There is some disposition on the part of some gentlemen on this side of the House to doubt the constitutional power of the Congress of the United States to enact such legislation as is proposed in this bill. I ask the attention of such gentlemen for a few moments to a consideration of the plain provisions of the Constitution. Sir, I have no more doubt of the constitutional authority of the Congress of the United States to pass such legislation than I have of the existence of a Supreme Being. Sir, the eighth section of the Constitution enumerates the powers delegated to the Congress of the United States, and among those powers is one "to establish post offices and post roads." If Congress has not power to provide for the construction of a railroad through the territory of the United States, for postal and military purposes, I ask gentlemen to tell me what is the meaning of that clause of the Constitution. If that language does not authorize Congress to aid in the construction of a railroad such as is here contemplated, then that language is utterly without meaning; it is a mere dead letter.

Now, sir, I am opposed to any interference by the Congress of the United States with the eminent domain of a State. I am opposed to the United States undertaking to run railroads within the jurisdiction of a State without the consent of a State. I am opposed to an attempt by the Government to authorize a railroad between here and the city of New York without the consent of the States through which the road is to pass. I say that such legislation violates the true intention of the Constitution. But, sir, this bill provides that the three States through whose jurisdiction this road is to pass shall give their consent to its construction before the road shall be permitted to go through those States.

The proposition, here, as I understand it, is for the construction of a railroad from a given point to a given point, the road to pass over the territory of the United States, the bill expressly confining the corporation to the construction of the road within the eminent domain of the United States. This company will have no right, by virtue of its charter or this bill, to enter the domain of a State and interfere with its sovereign powers. This road cannot pass through any State except with the consent of the State, and it can only pass through lands belonging to the United States.

There can be, therefore, in my view, no well-founded legal or constitutional objection to this measure. If there are no just objections of this character, then it is the duty of conscientious legislators to support this measure, if they recognize it as one that will tend to advance the prosperity of the country by completing a work which cannot be accomplished except with the aid of the Government of the United States.

Sir, it is a most astonishing fact that when the act incorporating this company was passed it received in the Senate the vote of every member of that body.

The SPEAKER. The twenty minutes allowed to the gentleman from New Jersey have expired. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] has fifteen minutes remaining.

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. DRIGGS.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had disagreed to the amendments of the House to Senate bill No. 23, to encourage telegraphic communication between the United States and the island of Cuba and other West India islands, and the Bahamas, asked a committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Messrs. CHANDLER, MORRILL, and CONNESS as the committee on the part of the Senate.

NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD—AGAIN.

Mr. DRIGGS. Mr. Speaker, as no gentleman from my State has yet been heard on this question, I feel impelled to present some remarks upon the subject; and I shall be as brief as possible.

Sir, when this question was first presented to the attention of Congress, I felt it my duty as a citizen of the State of Michigan, feeling an interest in everything that concerns the Northwest, to leave my seat here and visit the city of Boston to ascertain all that I could in reference to the responsibility of this company and everything connected with it. I met in Boston, under the auspices of the Board of Trade, the representatives of the Northern Pacific railroad. As the result of my examination, I can only say that, according to my information, the standing of this company for respectability and responsibility is of the highest character.

I have no doubt, Mr. Speaker, that the company now representing the grant of land by Congress to aid in the construction of this road are as respectable as any gentlemen who ever associated themselves together in a public work. It would be a little curious to notice the geographical location of the gentlemen who oppose this measure. It will be noticed that they have made the discovery that this road is to start from Puget sound on the Pacific and end at Lake Superior. They have also discovered that it may have an eastern outlet across by the Straits of Mackinaw and down to Detroit, there connecting with roads leading south from that point. I want it understood by gentlemen who oppose this bill because Chicago has not been fixed upon as a point, that they can tap the road by their system and have a branch road from Lake Superior to Chicago. In the winter season until the road can be completed East, across the straits through Michigan, it will have to make its connection with the Wisconsin and Illinois railroads, so as to reach the eastern roads at Chicago, for it is known that the lakes can be navigated only for a portion of the year. It was my good fortune on visiting Boston to be the companion of Captain Mullin, who surveyed and has been associated with the Northern Pacific railroad from the commencement, and from him I learned some very interesting facts. The captain is a very practical man. He stated to me that by building a short road over a portage of some three hundred and fifty miles between the navigable head waters of the Yellowstone and Columbia rivers the entire connection between the Atlantic and Pacific can be effected, and goods and passengers transported from the Atlantic to the Pacific in ten days.

I have not the time to go into all the details of this proposition. I will say that I do not look upon this as a local work. Some of the gentlemen who oppose the bill are interested in the construction of the Central Pacific railroad for which a magnificent grant of land and money has been made, and now when the great Northwest seeks to secure an outlet to the Pacific, for local reasons these same gentlemen come in and oppose the measure.

When the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] was speaking on the details of the bill it did occur to me that some amendments in reference to the conveyance of the lands were necessary. By the amendment before the House I understand the title does not pass until the road is built. That obviates that difficulty. The next question is as to the liability of the Government. As the bill has been amended not one dollar is guaranteed until the road is built. I undertake to say even if every dollar of that money was lost it would be the cheapest sixty millions ever expended on a great national work. My friend from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] says very truly that not a dollar would be lost, and I indorse that declaration. We can get it back on account of the carriage of the United States mails, and by security for one half of the land, and in various other ways. The Government can hold securities until it gets back every dollar.

In the upper peninsula which I represent there are copper mines, and if the road be built it will open that region to commerce. But I regard it as a national work, and one of the greatest importance. No gentleman from New England, New York, New Jersey, Indiana, Ohio, or any of the other States should oppose it. For by connecting at Detroit, in the State of Michigan, with the southern system of roads and the roads leading to the Atlantic cities, they will all have the benefit of this Northern Pacific railroad, and the bill for the encouragement of the building of which I hope will pass, but as I promised to occupy but ten minutes of the time of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] I must close my remarks and yield the floor to him.

Mr. GRINNELL. I understand that the gentleman has but eight minutes of his time left, and I propose to occupy that time, yet too short to more than glance at the great question.

Mr. Speaker, I shall vote for this bill, and divest myself of all local prejudices as a western man. I happen to live on the line of the Central Pacific railroad; it passes by my door; but I am not to be bound to any locality. I believe this is a great national project, and as a monetary, as a business project, it is safe for this country and for Congress to adopt it.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DELANO] pursued a line of remark which led us to suppose that here was such a magnificent grant of land that any further aid was unnecessary. He seemed to think that the amount would be $100,000,000, and when I asked him whether he did not think that was too high, he expressed doubts about it, and finally concluded that it was so.

Now, I wish to call attention to the fact that gentlemen have not met the question. On the one hand they have said, "Here is such an immense grant of land that these men need nothing." On the other they have said, "You will lose if you become security for this company." Both statements cannot be true; the witnesses disagree. I have no hesitation in saying that these facts have never yet been met, and they never can be successfully.

Here is a great tract of land certainly, but what is it now worth? No more to this Government than so much moonshine, or so much clear sky, without a railroad. It is not worth one cent an acre without access to it. There is no man rich enough to own it and pay taxes on it in its present condition; nor will it for fifty years to come, without a railroad, have value.

What is the proposition? That this immense tract of land between Lake Superior and the Pacific shall be opened so that we shall have access to the gold mines and another highway to the Pacific ocean. This is what we can do; this is what we ought to do. We ought to lend to timid capital the aid, confidence, and surety of the Government in this enterprise; what the Government has before done, even by direct gifts; what Russia is doing in opening her wastes on a grand scale.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DELANO] talks about the West, and assumes to speak for it as if he were of that country. Why, sir, he should remember that he is not within a thousand miles of the starting-point of this road. He has to travel two hundred miles across his own State, the same distance across the State of Indiana, then three or four hundred more across the State of Illinois northwest, and then hundreds of miles, before he gets to the starting-point of this road. He cannot speak for the West, because he does not live there as a Representative; and though able, I cannot think he appreciates our distances or wants.

Gentlemen have undertaken to say that my colleague, the chairman of the committee, [Mr. PRICE], has not presented a report, only a bill, withholding the light. My colleague has been characterized by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] as a banker. Well, sir, it is true that my colleague has honorably and successfully discharged the duties of president of the State Bank of Iowa, by which no man has lost a dollar. But he is not merely a banker. While the gentleman from Illinois was laying out streets in the city of Chicago my colleague was surveying and planning a railroad westward, near the eastern connection of the Pacific railroad, to Council Bluffs. He is a railroad man of ten years' experience in the Prairie State, as well as an extensive farmer, having, I am informed, a larger number of acres than any man west of the Mississippi river under cultivation. And yet the two gentlemen from Illinois designate him as a banker simply.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Is he not president of a bank?

Mr. GRINNELL. He was president of the State Bank of Iowa. And I will here state that his word financially is regarded as good authority by all parties in that State, without regard to politics; and it is partly because he has examined this question financially, as well as its wide national bearings, that I give it my support. More than a banker. He was a railroad man for thirteen years, connected with the roads in Iowa and Illinois, and as a railroad director he gave his time and money. And now, when the chairman of a committee, cautious with experience and exact in figures, has examined into this project in a financial as well as a national point of view, comes to me and says it is sound and safe and necessary, I give great weight to his opinion. Certainly no side issues should detract from the authority.

Mr. Speaker, let us divest ourselves of these local prejudices. Let us rise to the grandeur of position that we should occupy in legislating for a continent. I never wish to see the two sections of the country alienated. I would have the East bound to the West by iron bands. Give us this railroad, and what cost twenty-five cents a pound to reach the gold mines can be carried to the far West at from five to eight cents a pound. There is economy in the measure. There is greatness and safety in it, and unless my colleague has been grossly deceived in regard to the figures, it is safe financially; and I repeat, although I live on the line of the great Central Pacific railroad, I am willing that we shall have two or three roads, or as many as we can find money to build.

And let it not be forgotten that these capitalists, these railroad men, these shrewd managers, must lose ten million dollars before we can lose one. Will they enter into this project without any prospect of receiving their money back? No; they are shrewd, intelligent, far-sighted men, as well as patriots, and they know the necessity of this connection, and they know that if we can have the head waters of the Missouri river connected with the Columbia, crossing this magnificent country, we shall have achieved what cannot possibly be achieved by the Central Pacific railroad in the same time. Hence, I conceive that, as far-seeing and intelligent men, we should support this measure, sustained, I observe, by the Boards of Trade, by the powerful press of the Northwest, by every miner in the West, by the dwellers on the Pacific, and ought to be, as I am confident, by every agriculturist on the wide, rich prairies of our western States.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, the bill before us proposes to part with the credit of the Government of the United States to a railroad company known as "the Northern Pacific Railroad Company," an association of gentlemen who carry on a private corporation for their own personal gain.

Before speaking of those features of the bill which to my mind render it objectionable, I call the attention of the House to the unfair manner in which this whole matter has been conducted. I do not believe that there is a single member of this House who has any objection to the completion of this road at the earliest practicable moment; but whether the road shall belong to the people or the Government of the United States rather than to private corporations is another question. That is one of the grounds of my opposition to this measure. We would like to see this country, vast as it is, and valuable as it is, speedily developed; its mineral treasures brought forth; its hills and valleys peopled and filled with grain and all other agricultural products which are necessary for the sustenance of man, and for the happiness of those who may dwell there. This is a question of humanity. It is a question of policy. But there is a question of legal right. This measure appears to be a sort of "gift enterprise," where much is promised and little performed. There is something under it. I confess that I have not sufficient intelligence to tell you where it is or what it is; but I feel that the measure is pregnant with mischief to our Government and to our institutions. When the Government becomes god-father to schemes of this description, being responsible for the acts of its god-child, there is danger.

In July, 1864, this Northern Pacific Railroad Company was chartered, and at that time it was presumed that we should never again be troubled with an application for additional assistance. The charter gave to them forty-seven million acres of land, and the company themselves, as we heard yesterday upon this floor, declared that they believed that with that grant of land from the Government they would be enabled to complete the road and have a surplus of $350,000,000. Less than two years have gone by and now they come here to ask, what we have no power to give, the credit of the Federal Government to an incorporation of private individuals for their own private speculative purposes.

Now, can we do that? Could we have done it in 1864? I ask gentlemen here (for the same principle is applicable to other measures as well as to this) to pause for a moment and reflect whether all of that land, lying in whatsoever State it may, is not the common property of all the States. I contend that the Government holds it only in trust for the people of all the States; and that it is, therefore, the trustee and custodian of these lands for the benefit of the States who are the cestui que trust; and you will never be able to get your discharge by accounting in the future if you take forty-seven million acres of that land and give it to one railroad company.

We gave away the other day two hundred thousand acres of land to build a ship-canal a mile and a half long. In a very short time the whole of this vast territory of ours will become the property of private individuals; and then, when we find our national debt pressing upon us severely, and turn to that as a source of revenue, we shall find that we have anticipated, and that it has gone into private pockets, and we shall be unable to make any headway in our efforts to pay our national indebtedness.

Now, let us consider this matter in another point of view. Suppose you have given away half of the land you possess, Pennsylvania, New York, and New Jersey, neither of them having any portion of that which has been given away, for I call it a gift without authority of law. Suppose that by and by a bill is brought in to divide the public lands remaining among the States. How can we account to Pennsylvania, New York, and New Jersey for the portion that you have given away? Have they not already been disposed of to railroad and canal companies and other corporations?

I think it is a matter that demands careful consideration on the part of this House. I have no special pleading to offer in a case of this kind. But I appeal to the good sense of members of this House to decide whether or not I am correct in saying that we are the trustees of this property, and have no right to dispose of it in this way; but we must account for it to the States who do not obtain their aliquot portion of it now or at some future day.

It has been urged here that this land possesses little or no value. I know the old saying, that drowning men will catch at straws; yet the shrewd men who come here and take such pains to get an act of incorporation might very properly be asked why they take this land if it is worth nothing. Now, it has become so valuable, after being in their possession not quite two years, that they speak about indemnifying the Government for guarantying the payment of interest on the bonds of this company, by offering us the half of what we gave them to secure $67,000,000.

This is not the first example in history where large offers have been made. If it will be any benefit to members of this House I will refer them to a somewhat celebrated example. On one occasion, as we are told, the devil took our Saviour up on a high mountain and showed him a great deal of land, and offered him a very large land grant, larger, if possible, than this is. But our Saviour knew the devil did not own it, and He replied to him, "Get behind me, Satan." Now, members of Congress offer to these railroad companies and canal companies these large grants of land that belong to the people; and these corporations not being quite so conscientious as our Saviour was will most generously and willingly accept the grants of land thus pressed upon them.

And it seems that these railroad corporations who came here last Congress and got this grant are acting as if their idea was that the people of the United States did not send Representatives here who possessed ordinary intelligence. Therefore they generously bestow their advice upon us here in our seats, and in this building, and at our hotels, telling us how we can best discharge our duty. All I can say is that we are very much obliged to them for their interest in our enlightenment, and we will act as we may deem best.

Now, has any measure of security been taken by the Government that the lands thus given away to this private corporation shall pay taxes in common with the property of other corporations? Have we guarded the matter in any way so that the United States will ever be the gainer by it? Sir, what is to happen at once upon the completion of this road? A division of the profits will be made, and the Government will get nothing. The private corporations no doubt will be very much obliged to the Government for having loaned its credit to them, which is equal to so much money; they will be very much obliged for the land that has been given to them, and when the road is done they will take all the profits to themselves, bid good bye to the Government, and having become wealthy they will go off and enjoy their otium cum dignitate.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Will the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. WRIGHT] yield to me a moment?

Mr. WRIGHT. Certainly.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I desire to say that I have been the victim of misplaced confidence, [laughter,] so far as the colleague [Mr. ROGERS] of the gentleman is concerned. I certainly understood him to say day before yesterday that he was against this bill, and he came to my desk and spoke to me about it. Yet I came into the Hall this afternoon and find him advocating it.

Mr. GRINNELL. I would suggest to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] that the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROGERS] is not in his seat.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I thought he was here.

Mr. STEVENS. That matter has nothing to do with this subject, and it is a thing which very few gentlemen would ever have mentioned.

Mr. WRIGHT. I ask members of this House whether they are making the best disposition of the money belonging to the Government in bestowing it upon such measures as these. It is said on the one hand that our Treasury is depleted, and on the other side that it is in no danger of a financial crisis of any sort.

Can we make a better disposition of this land? Once before on this floor, I invited the attention of members to the absolute necessity of doing speedy justice to our soldiers and sailors. Would it not be better to give some acres of this land to the institutions owned and controlled by the Government, so that the needy and deserving soldiers might enjoy the proceeds of this land as a common fund? Are we to allow the brave defenders of the Republic to go unprovided for. Destitution and beggary are stalking abroad throughout the land, because Congress has as yet made no proper provision for the soldiers.

If members of this House have greater regard for the Northern Pacific railroad than they have for the noble men who did so much for the salvation of the country during the recent rebellion, then let them vote to give the public lands to this company. For my part, I think that gross injustice would be done to our worthy volunteers if we should pledge the faith and credit of the Government as proposed by this bill; for a wise Government will always keep sufficient money in its Treasury to redeem its pledged faith. If this bill is to involve an expenditure in consequence of which the people of each congressional district in the United States will be subjected to an increased taxation to the amount of $300,000, then our constituents ought to know that fact; and this is the proper place to disseminate it. We should proclaim to them that there is no party feeling in this matter; that there can be none; that the question is one of legal right and impartial justice.

Sir, when I heard the eloquent remarks of gentlemen about the necessity of giving away our lands for works of public improvement, I felt disposed to send word to the Camden and Amboy Railroad Company to make application for a grant of land; I do not see why the House should not have its heart softened toward that corporation as well as any other.

Sir, however we may be bound by party feelings, it will not do for us to inaugurate a system by which we may wink at trifling errors and go on increasing our offenses until by their illegality they amount to absolute crimes, because it cannot be presumed that we could thus sin through ignorance. Sir, I desire that this road shall be built, and I am willing to do anything that I may lawfully and conscientiously do to assist in its construction. The great railroad of the State in which I live would form one of the connections of this road by way of the Atlantic and Great Western railroad. Sir, the opponents of this bill must not be misjudged. We do not desire to be understood as being other than favorable to the completion of the road. But we cannot approve the means by which the end is sought to be accomplished.

I think I am fully justified in saying that my constituents will approve the vote which I am about to give against this measure. I can cast that vote with a clear conscience, knowing that I have sought to do no injustice to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, but that I have endeavored to save the money of my constituents, that I have striven to prevent the depletion of the public Treasury. Sir, I find on my desk this morning a circular which the Secretary of the Treasury has sent us, stating that $350,000,000 is all that is necessary to be raised annually to pay off the interest of the public debt of England; and that during the past three quarters of the current fiscal year $405,000,000 have been paid in this country. But, sir, he says that the continuance of the present system of taxation on the necessities and comforts of life—articles that we eat and drink and wear—is required in order to meet the demands upon the Treasury. Sir, at such a time as this, how can we, with any regard to the interests or the welfare of the country, engage in a scheme to guaranty, by a pledge of the national credit, fifty or one hundred million dollars to a private corporation? The principle is wrong. Our duty as Representatives requires that we should oppose such schemes; and this I say with no unkind feeling toward those who advocate the bill.

I trust that the bill may yet be put in such a shape that those who are at present its opponents may become its friends; and that in the mean time we shall mature a measure which shall extend to our soldiers and sailors that generous care which they so well deserve from the country.

Mr. BROOMALL. I ask the gentleman to yield to me.

Mr. WRIGHT. I will yield to the gentleman for twenty minutes.

Mr. BROOMALL. Mr. Speaker, I received in the mail this morning a circular, which I hold in my hand, purporting to come from the Treasury Department, the reading of which has caused me a considerable amount of discomfort. The purport of this circular is that in consequence of the enormous indebtedness of the Government, in consequence of the immense amount of taxes now imposed upon the people, it is utterly impossible for the Government to equalize the bounties to our soldiers. Many of us have been sitting here with the fixed determination not to let this session go by without passing that most righteous measure, and to be told now that the thing is impossible is a declaration that must grieve the heart of every lover of the country in this House. I am not without hope that the prophecies of the Secretary of the Treasury may be found to be mistaken. I am not without hope that some means may yet be ascertained to equalize the bounties of our soldiers, but for one I will not allow myself to give a vote in this House so as to tie my hands from supporting that measure when it comes up.

You may be sure, Mr. Speaker, after reading that document, I came to this House by no manner of means disposed to vote away sixty millions of money which ought to go to this purpose.

Mr. HENDERSON. I ask the gentleman to yield to me.

Mr. BROOMALL. I cannot do it, I have but a little time myself.

I will not vote the money which ought to go to this righteous purpose into the pockets of a private corporation. I warn gentleman, if they vote for this bill and violate their promise to the soldiers, they cannot fall back upon the assertion of the Secretary of the Treasury that the thing was impossible, for their votes upon this measure will stare them in the face. They will be told they have given by one single act to a private corporation nearly one half as much as would be required to equalize the bounties of the soldiers.

I recollect very well when the original bill, to which this is an amendment, was brought into the House. It was not without reason that members were startled at the injustice of the proposition it contained of conveying in fee-simple to a private corporation, the stock of which might be held in India, England, or anywhere else, lands exceeding in amount the entire State of Indiana, and more than double the land contained in the States of New Jersey, Maryland, and Delaware. Such a proposition might well startle members of Congress and make them hesitate; but my powerful colleague, chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, [Mr. STEVENS,] with his usual persuasiveness almost forced us to depart from our accustomed propriety to sustain the bill. I regret that upon that occasion I did not make my voice heard in condemnation of the measure. I allowed myself good-naturedly and amiably to yield my judgment to that of others; but when I saw this bill here, I was reminded that I had been somewhat recreant to my duty. I voted against the bill, I grant, but then I contented myself with that vote. Such at least is my recollection at this time.

What were we then told? The opponents of the bill, I think the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] especially, pointed out the immense amount of lands proposed to be given to this people, and contrasted it with the land grants to other corporations. He earnestly remonstrated against the passage of the bill, and foretold that the demands of the company would not end there. He foretold truly. The eloquence of my colleague and others had such effect that the bill was suffered to pass, notwithstanding the warning of the gentleman from Illinois. It was passed upon the positive promise of these people that that would be the last demand by that company upon the Congress of the United States. Yet, sir, not a spade has been put into the ground, not a pole has been set, not a line has been run since the passage of that bill, and still the company is back here asking for money, money at a time when money is by no means plenty with the Government of the United States.

But it is said by gentlemen on the other side of the question that this money will be repaid. When? I would like to know when. If we commence this system of legislation we will find the bonds of the United States selling at fifty cents on the dollar long before we shall see a single cent of this money returned. The bill provides the means by which it is to be got out of the Treasury of the United States, but I see small chance of its being brought back.

The framers of the original bill—I mean the bill for which the pending substitute is moved—never intended that this money should be paid. They framed the bill so that it was never necessary for the company to repay the money.

They framed the very bill so that no part of the money that they proposed to take out of the Treasury should fall due to the Government until after the road was entirely completed. It is easy enough to leave ten miles of a road of eighteen hundred miles in length unfinished, so as to avoid the payment of the money.

The alterations that have been made by my colleague have not helped the bill much, very little indeed. They have only the better covered up, not the bad intentions of the House, not by any manner of means, but the bad intentions of somebody, I do not know who, for I inquired all day yesterday in this House of everybody I saw, "Who drafted this bill?" and was unable to find out who did it.

Now, the proposition of my colleague is, that we should take security for the money we lay out. What is the security? Why, the right to sell at double the price of our public land, and no less, the land lying on the south side of that road. Is that any security? And the bill proposes to vest all these lands in this company beforehand, so that they may sell them, and then the lands would be beyond our reach, in the hands of innocent third parties. For they take good care in this bill to make the grant of the land entirely free from all the conditions set out in the original act.

Mr. STEVENS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROOMALL. I am sorry I cannot yield.

Mr. STEVENS. I am sorry the gentleman will not allow me to make a correction.

Mr. BROOMALL. I think I have paid as much attention to this bill as we usually do. It may be my misfortune to be in error, but if I am, I am honestly so, and I shall have in vindication of myself at least the fact that I did not vote to a private corporation the money that should have gone to our soldiers.

Two of my colleagues from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY and Mr. STEVENS,] with extraordinary eloquence—extraordinary even for them—are urging the passage of this bill. Pennsylvania, ground down by local, State, and general taxation; Pennsylvania, that has had to resort to a means of raising money that never came within the knowledge, I suppose, of my friend the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. MORRILL,] Pennsylvania, that has had to resort by law to taxing her citizens upon their poverty instead of their wealth (because within two years that State, finding that the General Government wanted all the tax that could be raised from her property, actually passed a law compelling the debtor to pay a tax on his debt;) Pennsylvania comes here, ground down in that way by taxation, and asks, through her Representatives, to let this private corporation dip its hands sixty millions deep into the public Treasury.

My colleague from Philadelphia [Mr. KELLEY] tells this House that Sir Morton Peto would be very glad to take this job off our hands, would be very glad, if I understand him, to guaranty this stock upon the terms offered to us. Well, all I can say is, if Sir Morton Peto wants the job, as for me he can have it, and when he gets through this job I will hunt him up a good many others of the same sort. I dare say there are corporations within the district of my colleague whose stockholders would be very glad to have the Government of the United States guaranty the dividends upon their stock.

I know that there are such corporations in my district, and if my colleague will aid me to get an introduction to that distinguished English gentleman, when he gets through the job that he proposes for him, I will introduce to him some of my constituents for that purpose. Sir, let who will guaranty these bonds, I, as a member of this Congress, never will.

Mr. KELLEY. For correction I ask the gentleman to yield.

Mr. BROOMALL. I do not want it taken out of my time, but I will do it.

Mr. KELLEY. I have nowhere intimated that Sir Morton Peto would gladly construct this road if the United States would guaranty the bonds. I have said that he, with other Englishmen, would gladly give a guarantee for the sake of extending the British line down to the forty-second degree of latitude. I want no more British Provinces on our territory.

Mr. BROOMALL. The gentleman's explanation is precisely as I stated it. I did not state that he said that Sir Morton Peto would like to have the job if we would guaranty the bonds. What I said was, that that gentleman would gladly take the job that we are asked to undertake, would gladly take upon himself the guarantee of that stock upon the terms offered to us. It was in that view that I said that he or any other person on the other side of the Atlantic may do it so far as I am concerned.

It is time we began to retrench. The people are clamorous for a reduction of the taxes. Who of the members here present has not had letter after letter from his constituents asking when a bill reducing our taxation will be reported and acted on? Who is not glad to find that there is in the bill which has been reported a material reduction of taxation? But, if we are going to give away with one hand twice as much as we receive with the other, I want to know how we are to satisfy our constituents?

I believe, sir, that my time is very nearly exhausted, and I will only say further that upon this question I have paired with a gentleman from New York who has had to leave the Hall.

Mr. WRIGHT. I yield now to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HARDING.]

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. I am greatly indebted to the gentleman from New Jersey for his courtesy in allowing me a few minutes.

I felt more interested in this subject and am more ardently opposed to this bill than, perhaps, there is good ground for. I am anxious to preserve the financial credit of the Government. Perhaps I am more sensitive on that point than I ought to be.

I feel how much it has cost, both in blood and money. I feel how grinding and burdensome our present taxation is upon the people; and I am unwilling to add another dollar to our obligations unless it be for a measure of very great national importance.

It is asserted that this is a great national measure. I beg leave to deny it. It is but a great individual speculation. The nation is no more interested in the development of this region of country from Lake Superior to Puget sound than it is in the development of any other portion of the country. If the development of this country by the construction of a railroad is to be held to be a national business, why then I can only say that I have understood things differently. I do not understand that it is the business of this Government to engage in the general improvement of the country and the development of its resources, in the building of woolen and cotton factories, in the opening of canals, and in the construction of railroads in all directions. These are, in one sense, matters of national importance, but not in the sense that has ever been maintained by that great party to which I have had the honor to belong all my life, a party which has met opposition, but which in its construction of the power of Congress under the Constitution, to enter upon the improvement of the inland rivers and the harbors on our lakes, and to provide for the construction of other great national improvements, has never gone as far as this measure proposes to go. And no leadership shall lead me further than the position which that party assumed, and in which it was sustained in the past by the people of the country.

I have never understood that we had a Government here which could appropriate money from the public Treasury for the development of local interests.

In the limited time allotted to me I can, of course, say but little of what I would like to say upon this subject. I would like to show that this measure is not impelled by considerations of great national importance. If it be, then I ask why it is that members from particular localities are found, every one of them, "in" for it? Why is it that my friend from Portland, [Mr. LYNCH,] and all those who come from the line of latitude on which this road is to run, favor it? Why is it? Is it because they love this great country more than profit? Why is it that certain gentlemen from Pennsylvania, who are engaged in certain interests, are so deeply interested in this work? Of course it is because they look upon it as a national work; it is not because it would promote certain branches of business! Look at it. Your original bill gives in general terms a right to other roads to connect with this road. What is the connection? Is it the right to have the business of the New York Central, or the Michigan Central, or of any other road carried over this line? No such thing. The men who control the charter will make the business with the West go over the Grand Trunk railroad of Canada.

Let it go to Portland over the very roads that these distinguished and honorable public-spirited men from Vermont and New Hampshire represent. They, of course, are not influenced by any such considerations; not a whit of it. They are too honorable and high-minded to burden this nation with a view to local advantages and local benefits; I do not believe they would do it; not a word of it. And do gentlemen suppose that Boards of Trade, composed of the material that we know they are composed of, are ever influenced by any other consideration than love of country? Why, no, sir, never.

Men engaged in the iron interest are anxious, of course, to make railroad iron. But it is not in their special interest, of course, that a bill is introduced here to bind these railroad corporations to buy their iron of them. Yet this road is to be built of American iron, cost what it may, and however great may be the demand for it. But that of course will not weigh a straw in the estimation of my patriotic and truly honored friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] for I do honor him.

Now, I beg him to believe me when I say that this country does not want this increase of liabilities at this time. Whether we pay the money or not, it will stand against us on our books; it stands there as a mortgage, and he and others will find that when we have once committed ourselves to this thing they will so manage the business of the road that the quarter of the gross earnings which we are to receive will be very small. The great part of the earnings will be absorbed by the Grand Trunk road and the Vermont line; there will be very small earnings for the west end of the road, especially as that west end is eighteen hundred miles long. How many stations would there be on the western portion of the road? None, except on the Missouri river, until you get to the Pacific.

There is no population along the proposed line of road. I asked a friend what was the population, and he told me it was literally nothing. And there are but few villages on the Pacific coast. Now, what kind of freight can be carried eighteen hundred miles over a road that will pay for the carriage after it has reached the market? Not grain and corn, for it now takes three bushels of corn to pay for transporting one bushel from Illinois to Buffalo. I am proud of the railroad system of the United States; I am in favor of it; I have helped to build some, to my sorrow. And I have learned this: that there must be a large way business, a large population along the line of the road to make a road pay.

My friend from California [Mr. BIDWELL] says that they want competition to keep down the rates of freight to the Pacific. Now that is a beautiful idea; I will treat it more respectfully, and say that it is an honest idea. But you will find that where there are two parties to divide the profits, they will always manage to have a little higher rates of freight. I challenge gentlemen to show me an instance where competition has put down freights for any length of time. Those corporations will not compete long. If the men who manage them ever do carry on a competition from personal animosities for any length of time, those who are interested behind them will turn them out and put others in their places who will better attend to the interests of the parties.

Now, you may build another road to the Pacific; but by the time it is done the managers of the two roads will get together and drink champagne and conclude that rates of freight must be raised a little higher. That is so; I have tried it, and it has been tried on me.

Gentlemen argue, why not give this land, which is worth about as much as the blue sky? Sir, it is too good to give away to a set of corporators who will thus have eighteen hundred miles of monopoly through the best mining regions of America, I am told. Sir, all know how this thing works; there is not a mine there but what if I own the railroad I own the mine, and you know it. If you have a coal mine or an iron mine or a gold mine, and I control a railroad, I will take all the profits of the mine for transportation.

Sir, there is not in this bill a syllable which will enable the Government to control the manner in which this company shall do their business. The whole thing will be under the control of the corporation. Sir, when I conclude to vote for allowing Sir Morton Peto and his associates or any association or company eighteen hundred miles of the territory for which my countrymen have fought and bled, and many of them died, I will let you know. Sir, what do you suppose would be thought of such a vote among my constituents, who have sent here their petitions signed by thousands of names asking to be relieved from the oppression which they have suffered from railroads in Illinois? Why, sir, the railroads of Illinois have competing lines. How is it, then, that they oppress the people? Sir, it is, as I have said, through the medium of champagne.

So far as concerns the power which will be wielded by this company, it is immaterial whether we give them twenty miles or forty miles along the line of their road. I know that this is merely an entering wedge. They will eventually exercise a power which nothing but the building of a competing line can break. Sir, if this bill be passed it will be equivalent to a deed of cession to these corporators for all this land. They will own it. The strong man will keep the house, and you can go in and out only at his pleasure.

Mr. Speaker, I do not like to express my opinion upon financial questions. But I have always believed that so far as we can we should pay as we go. I have accepted as a tolerably good and sound principle the advice of the Bible, "Owe no man anything." There is, I believe, another passage of Scripture—but I am not freshly read—which says something about the impolicy of indorsing for others. [Laughter.]

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. It was Ben. Franklin, I believe, who said that.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. I believe it was. Now, sir, I have had some little experience in that matter of indorsing for others; and I have almost always had to pay the bill.

Sir, there is another consideration which has its influence with me in reference to this measure. I expect to vote, cost what it may, for equalizing the bounties of those brave men who in 1861 and 1862 volunteered in the military service of the country, receiving meager bounties or none at all, and served, many of them, through the war. Cost what it may, I am determined to vote in favor of paying them the money to which their noble services more than entitle them. They are the saviors of my country. We owe them a debt of gratitude. We owe them more than brilliant words and fine resolutions. This Congress has sat now for more than four months, engaged in great part in the discussion of questions pertaining to the interests of particular localities. We have as yet taken no action on that great measure designed to pay to the soldiers a part of the great debt we owe them. We are told that it will be a very hard job to get that measure through; and doubts are intimated whether it can be passed.

Sir, I receive letters from my constituents saying that they distrust the intentions of Congress. They rather begin to surmise that we intend to give that measure the go-by. For heaven's sake, gentlemen, do not ask me to go home and tell them that, in preference to voting for that measure, I gave my support to a scheme for a guarantee of the national faith to the amount of $57,000,000 for the benefit of some gentlemen who are engaged in railroading. In my section of country, I am sorry to say, the people have not a very high estimate of men of that character. I have suffered somewhat under the prejudice which they entertain for persons of that description. I am seeking to retrieve my reputation by a faithful, an inflexible, fidelity to the interests of the whole country, regardless of all personal considerations. I am going to die in that harness; and acting on that principle, I am to-day standing by the people of the West.

More than a million of these western people—men who have served the country as soldiers, as well as the widows of soldiers and the children of soldiers—are to-day looking about them anxiously to see how they shall get along in the world. They find taxes heavy, business dull; and I declare, Mr. Speaker, I cannot have the heart to impose any additional burdens upon them at this time.

Now, sir, when a railroad is needed west of Lake Superior it will be built. There is no trouble in getting a railroad constructed when there is really a necessity for it. This has been the experience all over the country. Hence, I believe that this railroad to the Pacific will be built without Government aid whenever the interests and wants of the country justify its construction.

I hope we will have all these lands back again. I believe that the company has forfeited its franchise because it has not complied with the condition upon which it was granted. Let us get it back by all means. As it stands now it is equivalent to the cession of that whole territory to this private corporation.

There are other views of this question to which I would be glad to allude if I had the time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has seven minutes left.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. Here is a railroad of eighteen hundred miles to be built from Lake Superior to Puget sound. It is to have this immense grant of lands and its stock is to be indorsed by the United States Government. It is to be controlled by these private corporations. Yet my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] talks about homes for the homeless. I think the people will understand who are for giving homes to the homeless. We do not give homes to the homeless by granting away in one act this enormous body of lands to a private corporation. Nor do I see any necessity of having a railroad from Lake Superior to transport the emigrants from Europe into those hyperborean regions where they would find it difficult for them to live without having the skins of wild animals upon their backs. I know that to develop the resources of the West we need population.

Now, sir, those who come from Europe need not go away off into the Rocky mountains to find homes, for they can be provided with homes upon the beautiful prairies of Illinois, and when those are overcrowded there is room for them in the lands beyond the Jordan of the Mississippi. It will be time enough for us to think of settling the land between Lake Superior and Puget sound when we have brought under cultivation the lands through which roads already pass. What would you think of a man who had only stock enough to work his own farm renting all the surrounding country? Yet such is the proposition we have here. Gentlemen are talking of populating millions and millions of acres of land at a remote distance, when we have millions of good land lying idle and uncultivated close at hand.

I say, let us wait until the country is partially settled before we talk about building this road.

Mr. GRINNELL. The Illinois Central railroad was built when there was nobody at some points within twenty miles of it.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. I was out there at the time and know all about the subject.

INTERNATIONAL OCEAN TELEGRAPH.

Mr. ELIOT. I understand that a message has come from the Senate asking for a committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on Senate bill No. 26, to encourage telegraphic communication between the United States and the island of Cuba and other West India islands, and the Bahamas. I move that the request be granted.

The motion was agreed to; and the Speaker appointed Messrs ELIOT, O'NEIL, and TAYLOR as managers of said conference on the part of the House.

NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD—AGAIN.

Mr. LONGYEAR. I ask the Clerk to read extracts from the original act of incorporation in reply to what has been said here, and to show that the pending bill does not make any change with the exception of granting an extension of the time.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That whenever said Northern Pacific Railroad Company shall have twenty-five consecutive miles of any portion of said railroad and telegraph line ready for the service contemplated, the President of the United States shall appoint three commissioners to examine the same, and if it shall appear that twenty-five consecutive miles of said road and telegraph line have been completed in a good, substantial, and workmanlike manner, as in all other respects required by this act, the commissioners shall so report to the President of the United States, and patents of lands as aforesaid shall be issued to said company, confining to said company the right and title to said lands, situated opposite to, and coterminous with, said completed section of said road; and from time to time, whenever twenty-five additional consecutive miles shall have been constructed, completed, and in readiness as aforesaid, and verified by said commissioners to the President of the United States, then patents shall be issued to said company conveying the additional sections of land as aforesaid.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That each and every grant, right, and privilege herein are so made, and given to, and accepted by said Northern Pacific Railroad Company, upon and subject to the following conditions, namely, that the said company shall commence the work on said road within two years from the approval of this act by the President, and shall complete not less than fifty miles per year after the second year, and shall construct, equip, furnish, and complete the whole road by the 4th day of July, anno Domini 1876.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker, this question, like all great national questions, ought not to be discussed and is not to be decided either by buffoonery or vulgar denunciation. There are times and places when such things are pertinent, but not in the grand council of the nation when considering a great question of national importance. There we ought to have the calm judgment operating upon well ascertained and not perverted facts.

There are large minds that can take in the whole of a nation. There are small minds that can see only the purlieus of Delaware county or other places. What does not affect them cannot affect the great questions of legislation. There are none such here of the latter kind. I refer to that simply as illustration. [Laughter.] Now, let us see how we can look over this whole nation, from the Pacific to the Atlantic ocean, and not inquire how this particular measure affects my village or my constituents alone, but how it affects this great nation and posterity; for this is a subject worthy to command a consideration of this kind; and when that is done, and the facts which have been grossly perverted by gentlemen who have made their speeches here shall be put right before this House, I shall willingly leave it to the cool and sober judgment and candid action of this American Congress, and whatever may be their decision upon the question I shall submit to with pleasure. I may regret a decision that is adverse to what I deem to be the interest of the nation, but I shall have no complaint to make against any. None who have fairly treated it can fairly be complained of, for they had a right so to treat it.

In the first place, therefore, let us consider the importance of this question. Is it as important as I have indicated? In the second place, let us consider the liability or the risk which this nation is to incur; whether we are to embarrass the finances of the country, as the heated imagination of some gentlemen seem to suppose by this measure. For if this is to take from other and more worthy objects, such as the compensation to our soldiers and sailors, and especially our one-legged soldiers, [laughter,] I certainly shall expect no man to vote for it.

In my judgment it is the most important measure ever presented to an American Congress, and it is one in which the most good can be conferred upon this nation and upon posterity with the least possible risk.

But before I enter upon that view I will take up a few of the preliminary objections, so that the brush being cleared away we may build more firmly upon a solid foundation.

Our distinguished friend from Illinois [Mr. WENTWORTH] thinks there are no records, no by-laws of this company. Now, I know that people as far out West as Chicago are not to be expected to enter into the light literature of the East, and read the matters connected with the great western railroads, and therefore I do not wonder that my friend had no knowledge that a book called "the Northern Pacific Railroad Company and its Charter and Organization," which I hold in my hand, containing the charter, the by-laws, and the original organization of the company, existed.

Mr. WENTWORTH. Will the gentleman allow me a word?

Mr. STEVENS. Certainly.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I appeal to every member present if I did not call for the records; if I did not ask gentlemen to send them to the Clerk's desk and have them read; and no one dared to offer any. No one has said to me that there were any, although I have repeatedly asked for them, and would be glad to read them.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker, I admit my delinquency in not immediately answering the gentleman, but I am very much opposed to interruption. If the gentlemen will allow me [presenting a copy] I will respectfully tender a copy to him now. [Laughter.]

Mr. WENTWORTH. Thank you, sir; much obliged. [Laughter.]

Mr. STEVENS. Now, Mr. Speaker, that little book in which there is grand reading for youthful minds, shows the original charter and by-laws of the company, and a subscription of $2,000,000, with the payment of ten per cent. The date of the organization of the company is December, 1864, in the village of Boston, [laughter,] and all the directors' names are there set down. As to these gentlemen, who are named as commissioners their duties were long ago discharged, my friend knows.

Mr. WENTWORTH. Will the gentleman, as he has sent me his book, allow me to quote it to him?

Mr. STEVENS. Certainly.

Mr. WENTWORTH. It has been publicly stated in this House that one of the Smiths living in Vermont was president of this road. This book which is sent to me as official authority ought to state the truth, and here I see that Mr. Perham is president.

Mr. STEVENS. Will the gentleman allow me to finish the record by comments?

Mr. WENTWORTH. You sent me this as the record.

Mr. STEVENS. I sent you the commencement of it.

Mr. WENTWORTH. Send me the true one, the last edition. [Laughter.]

Mr. STEVENS. That is the commencement of it, and that shows that there was a thorough organization of that company. A very ardent friend of this road, who had spent at least eight years of his life before he completed the grant by obtaining this charter, was made president of it—Mr. Perham, a man as honest as ever lived. He believed he was capable at the time of carrying it through without anything further, but his health failed him, or I believe verily he would have gone, like those who drummed up from house to house through New England, and obtained subscriptions enough to have built it. His health failed and he was obliged to give way. He found he could not attend to it. The time was passing round when he was obliged to commence it. He was applied to by a party of men for the purpose of purchasing the franchise, and if he had been what gentlemen suppose everybody connected with this institution is—a swindler, a robber, a speculator—he would have taken their bonus and given them the franchise; but, like an honest man, he refused it. And I sent to the Chair now a letter from the present president of the road in answer to a letter of mine.

The Clerk read the letter, as follows:

COMMISSIONER'S OFFICE,
NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD COMPANY,
No. 258 F STREET,
WASHINGTON, D. C., April 25, 1866.

DEAR SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge receipt of yours of this date inquiring:

1. Whether the Northern Pacific railroad has been legally organized, and when and whether any report has ever been published by the company.

2. Whether there has been any change in the board of directors since the first election, and when and who now constitute the board, and their residences.

3. Whether anything was paid or agreed to be paid by the new directors as a bonus or otherwise for the change of management.

4. Whether anything, and what, has been done by the present board toward obtaining funds to build the road.

1. In reply to the first inquiry I would state that on the 7th day of December, 1864, the company was organized in accordance with the provisions of its charter, as appears by the report of the company, which I send accompanying this. The record of this organization, before the gentlemen now composing the board of directors were elected, was submitted to the examination of gentlemen of high legal position in the city of Boston, and their opinion given that the proceedings were regular and the organization legal and complete.

2. In reply to the second inquiry, the following gentlemen compose the present board of directors: J. Gregory Smith, St. Albans, Vermont; Onslow Stearns, Concord, New Hampshire; George Stark, Nashua, New Hampshire; R. D. Rice, Augusta, Maine; Edward S. Foley, Boston, Massachusetts; George C. Richardson, Boston, Massachusetts; James C. Converse, Boston, Massachusetts; Benjamin P. Cheney, Boston, Massachusetts; George H. Gordon, Boston, Massachusetts; Frank Fuller, New York; George Briggs, New York; Philander Reed, New York; L. D. M. Swett, Portland, Maine.

The last three were members of the old board. The others were elected on the 5th day of January last.

3. In reply to the third inquiry I would say, the change in the board of directors was effected at the solicitation of the members of the old board. The charter had been held by them for over a year, and they had been unable to secure the confidence of capitalists, or to obtain the funds necessary to justify the commencement of the work by the time limited in the charter, July 2, 1866.

Finding themselves unable to enlist the confidence of capitalists in this country they opened negotiations in the autumn of 1865 with the president of a company representing a large foreign corporation, to become the purchasers of the franchise of this company, with a view to make it a portion of a line then existing, which should be extended across the continent. This proposition, as I have been informed, remained open till January, 1866, this company, however, retaining the right to adopt other measures in the mean time to insure the construction of the road.

Pending these negotiations with the representatives of this foreign corporation the subject was presented to the consideration of leading capitalists of New England and other parts of the country, and they were strongly urged to engage in the enterprise, and thus save it either from utter failure from want of funds or from passing into the control of foreign capitalists.

The subject received a favorable consideration at the hands of these gentlemen, and they manifested a willingness to become identified with the enterprise, provided the management of the company could be placed in the hands of gentlemen whom they might select, and in whom they had confidence.

The gentlemen now composing the new directors were selected by capitalists of Boston and elsewhere to take the management of the company.

The new board were asked to relieve the old board from the legal liabilities of the company, for some of which they had become personally holden, and to make immediate provision for the more pressing of these claims. An arrangement was accordingly made by which the new board stipulated to provide the means to pay such liabilities as were justly due from the company to an amount not exceeding $150,000.

This agreement has, so far as my knowledge extends, been faithfully executed. There was no bonus required, and none in any form paid, or agreed to be paid, for the surrender of the franchise, nor for any transfer of the management, nor for any purpose whatever.

4. In reply to the fourth inquiry, I would say that immediately after assuming the duties of their appointment, and with a view to save the charter and provide the means for the early prosecution of the work, the new directors conferred with leading capitalists and financial men of the country, asking their opinion as to the probable prospect of obtaining the necessary fund upon the stock of the company based upon the land grant.

The uniform opinion of financial men was, that with the amount of securities upon the market offering a more desirable investment, it would be impossible to obtain the funds necessary to justify undertaking the work. The result of this consultation was, that if the Government would lend its aid in some form of guarantee for a limited period, the stock would acquire a value, and capitalists would thereby be induced to invest, and the work might be undertaken with confidence in the ability of the company to prosecute it with vigor and economy.

To raise the funds for this purpose, and to afford a basis of credit with which the company may construct its road and thus develop not only its own resources but in a much higher degree the wealth of the country, we ask the temporary aid of the Government in the present form, confidently believing in the ability of the company to repay fully all that may be advanced by the Government, not only in kind but many fold in the incidental benefits which will result to our common country and to the world.

I have the honor to be, dear sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. GREGORY SMITH.

President Northern Pacific Railroad.

Hon. THADDEUS STEVENS, M. C.

Mr. WENTWORTH. Allow me to ask a question. I understand that there are two bills before us. This subject comes before us, therefore, in two shapes. The gentleman is speaking to one of these bills. If he means the substitute, that substitute says three-fourths of the directors shall be American citizens. Now, then, if the other quarter can be British capitalists they can own the whole of the stock. They can let Americans in as stool-pigeons and run it as an English institution.

Mr. STEVENS. I understand the gentleman's question to be an argument.

Mr. WENTWORTH. An argument based on which way you answer the question.

Mr. STEVENS. Well, if the gentleman cannot decide that for himself, I will take it into consideration and give him an answer at another time.

Mr. Speaker, that letter dispels most of the scandal, most of the fiery denunciation of the two gentlemen from Illinois, [Mr. WENTWORTH and Mr. WASHBURN], and still more that of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. DELANO.] It takes from them, I think, the whole of the basis of their remarks.

I desire, however, before I proceed further, to call upon the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] to say if he is acquainted with some of these men and what are their characters.

Mr. BANKS. I would rather not answer now. I propose to speak on the subject, and would like to say a few words at the close on that subject.

Mr. STEVENS. Very well. I will give the gentleman an opportunity before the expiration of my time.

Having shown who the present corporators are, men I will venture to say, from what I have learned from good authority, who are inferior to no set of men in the United States for energy and for skill in railroad, or for honor and integrity; having shown that this corporation is a true and vital corporation, let us proceed to inquire whether the object is worthy of the bill which we have before us.

I confess, sir, with some degree of humiliation that until it became my duty, two years ago, as chairman of the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, to examine thoroughly into this question, I was in a deplorable state of ignorance with regard to the great interests of the Northwest to be affected by this project.

I knew less about it if possible than some of these gentlemen who are now opposing the road. [Laughter.] But, sir, I did devote considerable labor; I waded through all I could find on the subject; the explorations of Lewis and Clark, the surveys of General Stevens, down to the latest and most interesting explorations of Captain Mullin.

I there learned, what I have hoped all know but what I was late in learning, that there was in those Territories land enough uninhabited, where scarcely a white man's foot had ever trod, to make eleven States, each equal in size to the State in which I reside, and that of those eleven States eight at least would each contain more arable land and land more fertile than the great State of Pennsylvania. It is true that in some of them there are many mountains, that there is much barren land; but not more in proportion to the whole area than there is in Pennsylvania and Virginia. And those very mountains, like the mountains of my own State, are the most interesting and valuable portions of the whole territory. My own State, filled with coal and other minerals, is very hilly and mountainous. Yet those very barren hills, every acre of them, are worth more than five times the number of acres in the grand valley in which I reside, and which is the most fertile and grain growing, I believe, of any in the Union.

And so it is with the very broken land, which is not arable, in the Territories to be traversed by this railroad. Those barren hills are filled with still more valuable minerals. Gold is yielded, not only in the sands of the rivers according to the Scriptures, but it is also found in the solid rock, and silver is found there in veins, pervading a larger portion of that territory than any other portion of the United States. And if I have not allowed my imagination to delude my judgment I declare to you that I believe this is the richest mineral region upon the face of the globe, and that it contains more solid acres of gold and silver and cinabar and the other precious metals than any other like portion not only of the United States but of the world. I may be mistaken, but I challenge those who have read and examined the authorities to contradict me by known facts, and not by any imaginary statement of facts.

Now, there is northward of the forty-fifth parallel of latitude, and south of the British-American line, territory sufficient to make more than eight States, each equal to Pennsylvania, more than an average portion of which, a great deal more than an average portion of which, compared with the State of Pennsylvania, is arable and fertile land. I had supposed that it was a barren waste until I had informed myself, as I supposed it to be my duty, by examining the subject. But I find that the soil is more fertile than that of the beautiful garden spot of my own county, although that is highly cultivated. Along the Red river settlements, wherever the country has been opened, to the Selkirk settlements, spring wheat will produce at the rate of sixty bushels to the acre, a thing unheard of in Pennsylvania and in most of the States of this Union. The smaller kind of corn will yield from sixty to ninety bushels to the acre, and in grass the country is not rivaled by any portion of this Union. Now, I assert I am giving no overdrawn picture, unless those who have dwelt there for years, and who are my guides, have misled me.

Now that is a country that is wholly unsettled. And that is the reason urged by my most respected friend from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] for not building this railroad; the country is not settled, is not developed. Hence, I suppose he thinks it never should be. Sir, it is because it is not settled that I am in favor of aiding the construction of this railroad. These very railroads are in modern times the great civilizers, the great means for promoting the population of a country.

And roads were used for this purpose in ancient times, though not railroads operated by steam. Rome built her solid roads which have stood until this day, her Appian and other ways, leading from her great city to her provinces so that people might be induced to settle there, because of the means afforded them to bring their products to market at small cost.

And what has really settled the great State of Illinois but her system of railroads, her means of communication with the Atlantic sea-board, where her people can find a market? Who would have gone there had their products been given no opening to market, her corn worth but ten cents per bushel, and cheaper to burn as fuel than to transport to market? When markets are opened where products will realize a fair price, people will settle there rapidly. And one of the main objects I have in moving this substitute is to settle this country along this road. Give to this railroad the means of living for a little while, of commencing to draw her breath until she reaches a vigorous youth, then she will go on herself and pay her parents all her expenses; and she will people this whole country.

Mr. Speaker, I happen to know the fact that a part of the scheme of this company is to bring into that region forthwith from Europe immigrants, first as laborers to build the railroad, and second as settlers on the land, which they will purchase as payment for their labor. A gentleman of Boston, one of the men named in this bill, one of the largest shipping merchants in the United States—I need not mention his name—informed me that he was along making preparations to send a line of vessels to the north of Europe, to bring from Germany, from Norway, from Scotland, this very season, a large number of immigrants to settle upon that land, the climate of which is congenial with that in which they were raised and which they prefer; so that if this bill should pass it would not only be the means of securing the construction of this railroad, but it would establish a line of packets which would populate that country with the hardy freemen of the north of Europe, men who will always be upon the side of freedom, who will always be ready to aid us in any rebellious outbreaks which may come upon us from other quarters. Sir, God grant that we may soon fill up that country with such a population that, with the people of the great North, may be a counterpoise to the rebellious South, whose representatives when they come here will never permit us to do anything which may interfere with their projects. Sir, you must carry out this grand measure now if you are to do it ever.

And, sir, when you thus fill up that grand country, what have you done? You have furnished for this nation the productive industry of millions. You have furnished for the products of the manufacturing portions of the country an outlet to that great region. God grant that men who represent here the great manufacturing States, such as my own, where the loom and the anvil and the spindle are heard, may fully realize the bearings of this question, and understand how by voting against this measure from merely captious and narrow considerations, they assist to crush their own people and the interests of the nation.

But sir, by the passage of this measure, we not only help to fill up that country with a population of which I doubt not we shall be proud, but we aid in establishing across this continent a great thoroughfare between India and Asia and the millions of Europe. None of the great thoroughfares of communication with Asia or India ever carried half the wealth that would be carried upon this grand thoroughfare, starting not simply from Boston or Portland, but starting from Philadelphia, from New York, and every enterprising sea-port of the country and extending in the direction I have mentioned.

By such a measure as this, sir, we bind together our nation, because by it the countless millions which would soon swarm into that western world would be united by bonds of interest—of affection I hope, but certainly of interest, which is stronger—with those of the East, so that in the next half century, when this country shall count its hundreds of millions of inhabitants, no man shall wish to break loose from this great nation, this brotherhood of freemen. Is there nothing in a consideration like this? Cannot my friends around me realize its force?

I know, sir, that some western people think there can be no western railroad unless it starts from Chicago. That is a narrow view. I do not expect this railroad to start from Lancaster or pass through Lancaster. I should be ashamed if any such motive should influence my vote upon this great question. But I do know that when this immense commerce comes upon those great inland lakes, a series of lakes more grand than the Baltic and the Black sea, it will distribute itself according to the enterprise and necessities of the different sections of the country. Some will go to Cleveland; some will go to Erie; some will go to Buffalo; some will pass on below; and what is left will go to Ogdensburg and thence find its way across New England. I perhaps ought not to speak thus loudly of a section of our country which some have threatened to "leave out in the cold." But it will affect them all. The far-seeing men of that region are willing to take their chance.

It extends the great thoroughfares from Erie, from Cleveland, from Chicago. We judge it will establish such a system of railroads as will be to the interest of the whole country.

Gentlemen talk about speculators and about particular sections. They would warp this down to a speculation for building up a particular section of the country. It is nothing of the kind.

Mr. Speaker, I am not well, and I am afraid that I have been somewhat diffuse. A man is always diffuse when he is feeble, and always feeble when he is diffuse. [Laughter.]

Now let me proceed with the consideration of this bill. Two years ago a munificent grant of uncultivated lands was made to this company. What did we grant? Nothing at all. By our general law any man could go and take up any one of those sections without paying a dollar. We only aggregated on the same terms what individuals might take up. We granted to this corporation what each individually could have taken for himself under our preemption laws. When we grant lands to railroad companies we are not granting anything the Government has, because the Government gives it to every man who goes there.

They say by this bill we are incurring great liabilities. What are they? The amendment of the bill provides that when they have twenty-five miles of the road built, and only then, shall the Government guaranty any money. When they have built twenty-five more we are to guaranty more. We only guaranty the payment of interest as the road is constructed. At the end of twenty years all liability is to cease. This road will pay every dollar of interest by tolls alone. If it does not the Secretary is authorized at the end of ninety days to sell the land.

The gentleman from Illinois caviled in reference to the section granting a relief from taxation for two years. In the substitute I have stricken it out. It provides that all the directors shall be citizens of the United States. The gentleman is afraid we will have foreign capital in it. I hope we will get capital from Frankfort, for by the contraction of currency which has been provided for at this session we may need it. It is provided in the amendment that the Government shall be called upon to guaranty for the first year fifty miles, for the second year one hundred and fifty, third year three hundred and fifty, and in 1870, five hundred and fifty. If they cannot be called upon faster than that, why no one will doubt that by 1870 the whole will be paid. The most that any moment can be charged is $1,000,000. Yet they talk of $60,000,000 or $70,000,000.

I know, from a distinguished source, of a wagon road from Sacramento to the valley of Nevada paying tolls on supplies from miners of over one million dollars. When this railroad gets into the valley of Nevada it will pay three times the amount suggested. Making one hundred miles off or two hundred miles off you strike the head waters of the Missouri, and I say that the carrying trade—not to speak of emigration—that the carrying trade to supply the miners of that country will pay twenty-five per cent. three times over. Gentlemen delude themselves, and try to delude others, when they talk of loss to the Government. It will be recollected all these things are in the amendment I have proposed.

This is a road which will run all the year unobstructed by snow. Among the information I obtained when I was chairman of the committee was that the buffalo went there to spend the winter to get away from the Black hills where they staid formerly. I learned that at Walla Walla, in forty-six degrees, the mean temperature was precisely like that of Washington. In the Willamette valley, in forty-eight degrees, it was precisely that of Philadelphia in forty degrees. And so on.

I am afraid that there is not time enough left for the gentleman from Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I left?

The SPEAKER. Ten minutes.

Mr. STEVENS. Now, sir, here is a road that certainly never can be obstructed by snow. It is a singular contrivance of nature that when you reach about the forty-seventh degree of north latitude there is a relaxation of cold, and a modification of climate. It is surprising, but it is a fact, that more than four or five degrees of latitude below that it is much colder than it is there. It is accounted for, as we all know, by the warm breezes from the Pacific ocean on that side of the mountains; and those extraordinary contrivances of nature, the hot springs, boiling at one hundred and twenty degrees during the whole year, some of them ten acres in surface, and heaped together for about one hundred miles, so that the snow never lies upon the ground there. There the buffalo finds a winter home. There the grass grows all winter; and there he lives and feeds when driven from other and more southern latitudes. These are strange facts to those who have not examined into this matter. A gentleman who has resided at the Dalles for seven years told me that last year from the mouth of Columbia river to his place, a distance of two hundred and fifty miles, there was no obstruction to the navigation of that river by ice. No wonder that my respectable colleague is afraid of rivalry with Philadelphia where the river is obstructed four or five times every year by ice. Sir, do not be afraid of such rivalry. You have a noble city if you have noble men. But I predict that when this road is built the city of Superior, at the head of Lake Superior, will be the great city of the West; for it will have behind it eight States of fertile land and noble and industrious freemen. I do not say that it will be grander, but it will be just as grand as other cities. Chicago will always be a noble and grand city; Philadelphia will be a grand city, but that also will be a great city.

Now, sir, I want the Central road built; but we have already appropriated largely for that; and I cannot understand how men who live along that route, and are to be benefited by it, can oppose this road. My friend from the Cleveland district [Mr. SPALDING] has made violent opposition to this bill on the ground of a want of funds. I thought I heard him the other day advocating an appropriation of $6,000,000 for the construction of a ship-canal around the falls of Niagara. Our funds have fallen off very much since that time, which was not a week ago. I find, also, that my friend from the Chicago district [Mr. WENTWORTH] is willing to take $13,000,000 from the Treasury for the Illinois canal. There is money enough for that purpose; and that was an absolute grant; whereas this is merely a grant of credit.

Mr. Speaker, my time is very nearly up, and

I will not pursue the subject. I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] will answer the question I put to him in regard to these incorporators, and for that purpose I yield to him the residue of my time.

Mr. BANKS. I did not exactly understand the question which the gentleman from Pennsylvania put to me.

Mr. STEVENS. The gentleman has heard read the names of the directors of this road, many of whom are from his own State. I wish to know the character and standing of those gentlemen in that community.

Mr. BANKS. They are certainly most excellent men, among the best representatives of the people of the East, and especially of the city of Boston. There are no more honorable men in this country; no men more interested in the welfare of the Government and of the people.

I could not, sir, in answering a question like this, express the views which I entertain of the interests of the eastern people in the completion of this work which has been under discussion; but if the House will allow me a little time, I should like to make some suggestions.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I hope the House will give the gentleman full time; and will also give time to some gentleman upon the other side to answer him.

Mr. PRICE. The only objection to that is, that we must take the vote on this question to-night.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. So I say. Let us vote now.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] has three minutes remaining of the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BANKS. I do not accept that. I desire to say to this House that both of my colleagues who represent the city of Boston are absent. Scarcely a speaker has discussed this question who has not more or less directly referred to the capitalists of Boston, and especially to the men who are officially or personally interested in this road. It would be a very unjust record to go to the country if no voice from that State should be heard in explanation of the position which those gentlemen occupy, and I think that the gentleman who has this measure in charge might at least allow time for that.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to extending the time of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Yes, sir; I object.

Mr. PRICE. I want to say to the House that after the previous question shall be sustained, if members are willing to remain here longer, I will yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] nearly the whole of the hour to which I shall be entitled. I have no disposition myself to discuss this matter further.

Mr. CONKLING. Has the gentleman any objection to allowing the gentleman from Massachusetts to proceed at his pleasure now, he having the floor when the gentleman concludes?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects to that.

Mr. CONKLING. It is not a point for objection. If the gentleman from Iowa does not claim the floor the gentleman from Massachusetts can be recognized and can speak at his pleasure.

Mr. PRICE. I do not wish to shield myself behind the objection of the gentleman from Illinois. There are fifty members upon this floor who have been urging me to bring this matter to a vote to-day. Now, when the previous question shall have been sustained, I shall have an hour in which to close the debate, and if members are willing to remain here I am perfectly willing to give the gentleman from Massachusetts nearly all my time. [Several MEMBERS, "That is right."] Then I now demand the previous question on the bill.

Mr. SPALDING. I move to lay the bill and the pending amendments upon the table, and upon that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PRICE] is entitled to one hour to close the debate upon this bill. The Digest says, "The right of the member reporting the pending measure is never denied him, even after the previous question is ordered." The gentleman from Iowa, having demanded the previous question, is about to close the debate after the previous question has been seconded and the main question ordered. But in the mean time the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] moves to lay the bill, with the pending amendments, upon the table.

Mr. PRICE. Is that motion in order?

The SPEAKER. It is, and it has priority of the demand for the previous question.

Mr. PRICE. Can he make that motion after the previous question has been demanded?

The SPEAKER. He can; but the gentleman from Iowa could have gone on and spoken his hour, if he had retained the floor, upon moving the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I submit that a motion to lay upon the table is not debatable.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not debatable; but the gentleman from Iowa stated distinctly to the House that he intended to move the previous question, and after it should be sustained to yield some of his time to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS,] whom many members of the House desired to hear. That was distinctly understood; and if the motion to lay on the table fail, he will have a right, after the previous question shall be sustained, to the floor for one hour to close the debate, and can then yield it.

The reason for this rule is, that during a debate, which the member who has charge of a bill allows to run on for hours, and sometimes days, so that all may be heard for and against the bill, some other member might move the previous question; and if the one in charge of the bill had not the right to close the debate, he would be cut off from making any reply to the arguments of those who were opposed to the bill; and therefore, under successive rulings of the Speakers of the House, the rule has grown up that, no matter by whom the previous question may be moved, the one in charge of the bill would still have the right to close the debate.

That, however, does not cut off the right of any member who may obtain the floor to move to lay the bill on the table, although it is not very often done under the circumstances, at the end of a debate, till the member reporting the bill, and who has allowed the debate on both sides, has made his closing speech.

Mr. PRICE. Have I the right to the floor for an hour, as the one who has charge of this bill, notwithstanding the motion to lay it on the table?

The SPEAKER. No, sir; the motion to lay on the table cuts off all debate.

The question was upon ordering the yeas and nays upon the motion of Mr. SPALDING to lay the bill and pending amendments on the table.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 76, nays 56, not voting 51; as follows:

Mr. ANCONA said: My colleague, Mr. DAWSON, is paired with Mr. HUBBARD, of New York.

Mr. INGERSOLL said: I am paired with Mr. WELKER; he is opposed to the bill, and I am in favor of it.

The result of the vote was announced as above.

Mr. SPALDING moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was laid on the table; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

Pending which,

Mr. DARLING moved that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 52, noes 69.

Before the result of the vote was announced, Mr. LYNCH called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 57, nays 70, not voting 56; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, Banks, Baxter, Beaman, Bergen, Bidwell, Bingham, Boutwell, Reader W. So the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

The question then recurring on the motion to lay on the table the motion to reconsider, it was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the Committee had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolution (S. R. No. 56) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to adjust the claims of Beals & Dixon against the United States; which was thereupon signed by the Speaker.

ORDER OF PROCEEDING TO-MORROW.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the session of to-morrow be devoted exclusively to debate as in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union upon the President's message.

The motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. HALE asked and obtained leave of absence for two weeks.

E. WOODWARD AND G. CHORPENNING.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs a joint resolution for the relief of Elizabeth Woodward and George Choppenning, and moved that the same be printed and recommitted.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa, moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was recommitted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REGULATION OF IMMIGRATION.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, reported, from the Committee on Commerce, a bill (H. R. No. 481) entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to encourage immigration,' approved July 4, 1864, and an act entitled 'An act to regulate the carriage of passengers in steamships and other vessels,' approved March 3, 1855, and for other purposes."

The question being on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time,

Mr. SPALDING moved that the House adjourn.

RECONSTRUCTION—TENNESSEE.

Mr. ROSS. I rise to a privileged motion. I understood the Chair to have decided the other day that we could get rid of and slough off this dead and putrid committee of fifteen, which has now become a stench in the nostrils of the nation. As the cholera is coming, and we should abate such nuisances—

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not made any such decision nor used any such language.

Mr. ROSS. Well, I desire to call up the motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution in reference to the State of Tennessee was recommitted to the committee of fifteen.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman cannot call up that motion now. In the first place, the pendency of the motion to adjourn; in the second place, the unfinished business, the bill just reported from the Committee on Commerce; and in the third place, the special order after the morning hour, the Army bill, all prevent that motion to reconsider being called up now.

Mr. ROSS. Well, then, I give notice that I shall call it up at some other time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SPALDING,] that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at ten minutes after five o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, April 28, 1866.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WENTWORTH. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. By order of the House, no business is in order to-day except debate as in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the President's message, on which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] is entitled to the floor. Does he yield to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WENTWORTH?]

Mr. SCOFIELD. Yes, sir, for a moment.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I ask leave of absence for three weeks, and I give notice that before leaving I wish to pair off upon the questions of liberty, economy, and keeping whisky out of the Senate. [Laughter.]

Leave was granted.

RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Mr. Speaker, what is the whole amount of disloyal population in the southern States? I do not include in this inquiry persons who have been stigmatized as "sympathizers" or "copperheads," much less any other portion of the Democratic party, but only those who sought to divide the country into two republics and who now regret the failure of their enterprise. The whole amount of white population in the eleven confederate States is 5,097,524. Deducting from this amount the estimated number of loyal people in those States, and adding the disloyal scattered through the other five slave States, will give the answer to my question. Making this deduction and addition from the most reliable data within my reach, I conclude that the disloyal population in the whole South will not exceed, if indeed it will equal, five million in all.

If the eleven confederate States were readmitted now (the Constitution and laws remaining unamended) what amount of representation in Congress and the Electoral College would this five million be entitled to claim? They would certainly have these eleven States. There could hardly be a doubt about Kentucky. For if the loyal men of that State, sustained by the power of the Federal Army and the persuasion of Federal patronage, with the young disunionists absent in the South and the old ones disfranchised at home, could scarcely hold their own, what could we expect them to do when these young men have returned, the disfranchising laws have been swept away, the Army removed or palsied by orders, and Federal patronage at least uncertain? This would give them twenty-four Senators. There are four more States that belonged to the slaveholding class, Delaware, Maryland, West Virginia, and Missouri. Is it any stretch of probabilities to suppose that two more Senators will be picked up somewhere in these four States by the confederate element? I fear there will be more. This will give them twenty-six Senators.

In the House of Representatives this population will have as large, if not larger, proportionate representation. By the apportionment of 1861, fifty-eight Representatives were assigned to the eleven confederate States. These States will be so districted by the hostile sentiment of their several Legislatures that not one true Union man can be elected. To the other five slaveholding States twenty-six were assigned by the act of 1861. If any one will take the trouble to look over these districts, I think he will come to the conclusion that even if the laws disfranchising rebels in Maryland, West Virginia, and Missouri remain in force, not less than half of these will be controlled by the influence and votes of the late secessionists. This gives them seventy-one Representatives in the House. But even this large number must soon be increased. The two fifths of the four million freedmen which were not counted in the representative basis of the last census must be counted in the census of 1870, and (other things remaining the same) add to that number thirteen members more; so that the five million disloyal population, as soon as their full power can be felt through the elections, will have at least twenty-six Senators and eighty-four Representatives and one hundred and ten votes in the Electoral College. This is a low calculation. When we consider the earnestness, or rather I should say the fierceness of these people, the ability, ambition, and courage of their leaders, we may well apprehend that the number will be even greater. But this number is their own—legitimate and certain under the laws as they stand. Supposing the entire population of the United States to be thirty-five million now, this five million will be just one seventh of the whole, but will have more than one third the representation in both Houses of Congress, and more than one third of the Electoral College. The same amount of loyal population at the North is represented by only about half that number. If by factions or party division among the loyalists of the country, they could contrive to secure one sixth more of the representation, they would have a majority of the whole, and be able to control Federal legislation, elect the President, and distribute his patronage.

When these States are admitted and these people come to have the unabridged control of this twofold representation, how will they desire to use it? I do not inquire how they possibly may use it, nor even how they now expect or intend to use it, but how, if unrestrained by a united North, it would be their interest and desire to use it. For the perpetuation of the Union? I fear not. They have come back to the Union, we should remember, only by coercion. To them it is a forced bridal. They submit to it, but they do not, because they cannot, embrace it in their hearts. The soldiers maimed, wives widowed, and children orphaned in their bad cause, appeal to their leaders for the promised support, but the Union has no pensions for them. The fortunes invested in confederate faith see no hope of realization in the Union. Hatred of the North and its anti-slavery majorities, the original motive for secession, is ten times stronger now than in 1861, and is backed up by $4,000,000,000 of debt, damages, and pensions, which, as they insist, could, in a separate government, be levied by an export duty upon the cotton-consuming world. The life-habits of these people, their love of ease and domination, their pride, aristocracy, wealth, and power were all the outgrowth of an institution which might possibly be revived in a separate republic, but which is forever gone in the Union. "Confederacy" is a word that must long be enshrined in their hearts by the tender memories of their fallen kindred, but it must live, as they well know, in the history, traditions, and ballads of the Union, associated with perjury, dishonorable crime, and cruel war. If they should profess to love the Union we could not believe them. It is so unnatural that it would be easier to believe they were hypocrites than that they were monsters.

But they are neither hypocrites nor monsters. They do not love the Union, and do not pretend to. It is untruthful men of our own section that prevaricate for them. The same class of men that misrepresented the feelings of the North before the war, and thus deceived the South and goaded them into rebellion, now misrepresent the feelings of the South to deceive the North and lure it into irretrievable surrender. Before the war they deceived the South and betrayed the North; but now it is reversed, they deceive the North and betray the loyal South. The same perfidious breath that carried South the untruthful story of northern hate, and thus prompted the war, comes back now with another story, equally untruthful, of southern love. They tell us that the disloyal South is a gentle bride, impatient for the nuptials, when they know that she submits to them with loathing. Have they not laid down their arms? Is the argumentative inquiry. No, sir; their arms were taken from them. Have they not submitted? No, sir; they were defeated in battle. There is nothing in their past conduct nor present attitude that justifies the use of the word submission. Prisoners of war have been taken, but they were released on parole; rebel armies have been dispersed, but they have been reorganized as State militia; rebel State governments have been overthrown, but again revived and restored to the old possessors; and forfeitures of life and estates have been remitted, but that is all. Call this clemency, privilege, triumph, victory, what you please, but do not call it submission, with which it has not one shade of meaning in common. We do not need to call witnesses to prove that these people are hostile to the Union and its interests. The history of the human race proves it. Whoever attempts to prove the contrary must first show that they are unlike any other people whose passions, struggles, and defeats are recorded in the annals of the world.

But witnesses have been called—Union generals and rebel generals, Union and rebel citizens, without distinction of party, condition, race, or color—and all support under oath the great historic truth, that a purpose imbibed in infancy, cherished and stimulated by the rostrum, press, and pulpit for a lifetime; upheld by large fortunes, wrung from the toil of slaves, and sanctified by the blood of sons and kindred, has not been and cannot be surrendered to military orders. Such a purpose surrenders only to time. I do not present this great truth now by way of reproof or condemnation of these misguided people, but only by way of caution and warning to ourselves. I come to the conclusion, therefore, that they do not desire the perpetuation of the Union. If we would remove all restraints and give them freedom of choice they would revive the confederacy at once. They would take advantage of a war with Great Britain or France to secure their independence, and they would take advantage of their double representation here to promote such a war. If no opportunity of escape should soon offer, would they not still live in hopes of it and in persistent hostility to the country's obligations to the soldiers, widows, orphans, and creditors of our war, and friendly to the assumption of similar obligations created by themselves in the interest of the rebellion? Even in advance of their own coming a portion of their vast claims have reached your files. When my colleague [Mr. RANDALL] from the Democratic side proposed that the national faith, pledged in war, should not be broken in peace, there was one voice from Kentucky against it—only one by count, but considering the quarter from which it came, multitudinous in omen. A bill has also been introduced by a gentleman, sometimes called the Democratic leader in this House, to repudiate in part the public debt under pretense of taxing it, in violation of the laws by which it was created. These cannot be regarded as the oddities of one or two men, but rather as impulsive confessions of imprudent scouts, too far in advance of the following army. The purpose will not be generally disclosed until the forces are arranged for its execution.

I am speaking now only of the dangers that will beset the Republic by the allowance of a representation unfriendly to its prosperity and even its existence in such disproportionate numbers. But we should not forget that this act is also a recognition as republican in form of constitutions, we have never seen (except that of Tennessee) and all, except those of Lincoln origin, under rebel supremacy. The white Unionists who have been looking through five dreary years of persecution, lynching, and confiscation to this as their hour of deliverance, will find themselves betrayed into the hands of their old, unhumbled, unrelenting tormentors. It also consigns the freedmen to the tyranny of old masters, not now as heretofore bribed to humanity by a moneyed interest in the preservation of their chattel estates. Twenty-five per cent., says an honorable gentleman who presents his back offensively to the North as he makes his low obeisance South, twenty-five per cent. have already perished. The wish no doubt was father to the thought with the masters in whose interest the declaration is made.

These, then, are my premises. I will repeat them:

1. There are only about five million disloyal population in the country.

2. This population when fully restored to the Union, the Constitution and laws remaining unamended, will hold more than one third of its representative power and the supreme control of at least thirteen States.

3. They will be interested to use that power for the division of the Union; and, failing in that, for the repudiation of its military and financial obligations.

Now, what is to be done? If these States are denied representation, it violates the fundamental principle of republican government. If allowed a double and hostile representation, the Union itself must be destroyed or preserved at the expense of another war.

Three remedies are proposed:

1. Disfranchise some portion of the rebels.

2. Allow all the rebels to vote, but neutralize their disunion sentiments by enfranchising the blacks in these States.

3. Equalize representation by taking as its basis either the number of voters or the population, minus the disfranchised classes; so that these States shall have no more representation in proportion to their represented people than the old free States have.

Either proposition would require an amendment to the Constitution, to be accepted by the rebel States as a condition precedent to their restoration. It is also proposed to couple with either proposition a second amendment, prohibiting the assumption of rebel debts and claims either by States or the United States.

The third proposition has commended itself to much the largest number of Union members, and the amendments to that effect have already passed this House by more than a two-thirds vote. This, then, so far as this House is concerned, is the congressional plan of reconstruction. All we ask of the rebel leaders who are wrongly charging us with having no policy at all, but designing to exclude them for an indefinite period, is a little time to put in form of fundamental law these pledges of future peace. For five years they have been out upon plague-infected seas. Can they not tarry at quarantine for a single session?

Stripped of all disguises, herein lies the main disagreement. Shall these States be recognized at once in their present temper, without guarantees of any kind and with a twofold representation? It is not whether they shall be represented at all; to that we all agree. There may be a little question of time; a difference of a few weeks or a few months, and that is all. Shall they be represented twice over, once in their own names and once in the name of the negroes? Shall they come in upon a representative basis that clothes a white man of the South with almost as much again political power as a northern man controls? That gives two white voters in South Carolina as much voice in the selection of a President and in the legislation of this House as five voters in Pennsylvania possess? That practically gives to one seventh of your population, disloyal at that, more than one third of your power? That, sir, is the great question before this House and the American public. It is an effort on the part of the Opposition to carry into the politics of the country the old problem by which sixteen is made the majority of forty-nine. In England it is called the system of "rotten boroughs." It has long been the subject of political strife between the free and slave-labor counties of Maryland, Virginia, and Tennessee. And when it is everywhere else abandoned as a pernicious and anti-republican theory of representation, we are asked to make it the basis of reconstruction in the model Republic.

The enactment of these two simple and brief amendments, or others similar in purpose, is so absolutely necessary for the preservation of the Republic and the discharge of its obligations to its soldiers and creditors, and is so just and even generous to the insurgents, that they ought to receive the assent of every Union man, especially of every northern Union man. The Opposition do not dare to discuss their merits. While some deny that we have any plan of reconstruction, others assail it with insidious and deceptive objections. Some of these I propose to notice here.

First of all, they complain of the consumption of time. Five months have passed, and not a rebel admitted, is the complaining accusation. The Opposition are impatient. They cannot wait. Come in at once, say they, to the "erring brethren." Do not wait to drop your side arms or exchange your disloyal garments. Bills to protect the loyal men of the South against your pretended violence are pending now, come and help defeat them. We will soon have bills to enlarge pensions and equalize bounties to the soldiers you have maimed and the widows you have made; your advice and votes will be needed. A bill to give bounty land to the "boys in blue" could not be defeated nor the "butternuts" included without you. A bill to lift the burdens of taxation from the industry of the country and place it upon your foreign confederates, through exported cotton, will need your attention. Hurry up your organizations. Do not wait to heal lips blistered with a double oath of broken fealty before you kiss the Holy Evangelists with another. We have buried our sons and are languishing to clasp the hands of their murderers.

When once admitted, deny that you ever tried to break up the Government, but swear on all occasions that the Lincoln party were and are the traitors.

The complainants have only themselves to blame for much of this delay. Except for their persistent opposition the amendments would have been submitted months ago to the Legislatures then in session in the loyal States, and been assented to, no doubt, by the constitutional number. Except for their own opposition they might now be welcoming back their long-mourned friends to seats in these Halls. But they would consent to nothing that did not return them greater in numbers, and more malevolent in purpose. Hence the delay. Hinc illæ lacrimæ.

Next we are told that it conflicts with the "President's policy." What is the President's policy? I aver, first, that the President, when last authoritatively heard from, was in favor of the principle embodied in each of the proposed amendments. Of the first one, because he required the confederate States to adopt it; of the second one, because he has repeatedly declared himself in favor of making the number of voters the basis of representation. I aver, second, that he does not consider the status of the States such, that their assent to constitutional amendments cannot be required as conditions precedent to their restoration, because he directed Mr. Seward to inform these States that their assent to the amendment proposed in the last Congress was "indispensable" to restoration; and because he has not himself dealt with them as if they were States already in the Union. When the confederacy fell they were in full operation under governments originally organized in the Union. Governors, Legislatures, judges, and a full set of county and township officers were at work under constitutions once declared to be republican in form by the United States. These governments were regular unless you assent to the doctrine of forfeiture, for they had political continuity, what the church people call apostolic succession. Yet they were destroyed by the President's order and new ones extemporized in their stead.

From that time to this, in these States, the breath of the President has been the law of the land. Mr. Johnson went much further in this direction than his predecessor. Mr. Lincoln established governments only in States where he found none existing before, but Mr. Johnson first destroyed existing governments and then supplied their places with those of his own creation. So, both by words, and actions which speak louder than words, the President assents to every principle involved in the congressional policy of reconstruction. Indeed, the two policies could not well conflict, because they relate to different subjects. The one creates or revives State organizations, the other renews their Federal relations. When these organizations were complete, and the States ready to apply to Congress for a return to the Union, the President's policy was ended. His work was all done. The rest was for Congress. So he directed his Secretary of State to inform Governor Sharkey, July 24, 1865; Governor Marvin, September 12, 1865, and so he informed us in his annual message. If he has changed his policy since then it is hardly worth while to inquire what it is now, for his principles are written in water.

I do not wish to disguise the fact that while he approves the two amendments and believes the power exists to require their adoption as conditions of return, he thinks it unnecessary to insist upon any terms additional to those imposed by himself. It is in this opinion that his old persecutors, the defeated enemies of the Union, the foiled plotters of his assassination, have taken heart, and with cruel malice conspired with northern sympathizers to pursue him with their unrelenting friendship. Their last hope for the destruction of this country lies in the seduction of its friends. War failed them, they resort to diplomacy.

The President was not much moved by their threats, will he be seduced by their flattery? If so, let me assure those of our friends who are disposed to suppress their own convictions in hope to detain him and his patronage in a little select court party, that they might as well exercise a reasonable liberty of opinion. For if he ever determines to trust his political future to anybody besides the great earnest, triumphant Union organization that elected him, he will have sense enough to put them aside as mere nobodies in popular strength, heartless friends and harmless enemies, as courtiers always are, and push straight for the "southern brothered," rebel-led opponents of a permanent and peaceful Union. In that event his children and friends may well rejoice that the past, at least, is secure. His patriotic thoughts of the last five years will still live, although only to reprove him.

Again, it is said by way of excuse, "Why not admit such Union men as Fowler, Stokes, and Maynard, of Tennessee?" Because it is not a question about men. Shall a disloyal district, while it is still in a disloyal spirit, be declared entitled to representation with only half as many represented people in it as we require for a district in the North? That is the question. Captain Semmes ran up the Union flag when he wished to decoy an unarmed merchant vessel under the power of his guns, but replaced it with the pirate emblem when he had secured his victim. The names of these patriots are hung out to-day to secure representation to a rebel constituency behind them, but they will be hauled down at the first election and rebels put up in their stead. You may think you are only recognizing the Union flag, but when it is too late you will find yourselves alongside the Alabama and in the power of its pirate crew.

But it is said in reply, "We will not admit disloyal men even if elected." How can you help yourselves? If a whole delegation from South Carolina, for instance, present themselves to the Clerk of the last House and ask to be placed on the roll, prior to organization, and tender him the certificate of their election signed by the Governor and sealed with the great seal of that most sovereign State, shall the Clerk say which is loyal and which not? I suppose not. After the organization, in which all have participated, and all have been qualified and taken their seats, will you get up an inquisitorial committee to explore the secret recesses of their consciences and be father confessors to their sins? "No, but the iron-clad oath will exclude them." Do you not know, sir, that almost every man who is in favor of admitting these States without conditions is also in favor of repealing that oath? They already denounce it as an odious and unconstitutional test. The Secretary of the Treasury and the Postmaster General, backed up by a message from the President, ask its repeal so far as regards their Departments, thus making rebels as eligible as Union soldiers to appointments here, and under such lead I expect to see it swept away, and so do most of the gentlemen who are now urging us to lay aside a real safeguard and trust to this cobweb of a morning.

But suppose we could in this way contrive to dictate to these people who they should and who they should not elect, what kind of representation would that be? We say to them, "you are free to select your representatives, but mind that you select such as suit us, not yourselves." You call that representation? I call it obedience. We propose to extract the envenomed fang of the serpent before he is uncaged, and you to bind him with test oaths afterward. Suppose, again, you could manage to exclude in this way those who had been engaged in the rebellion, do you not know that a rebel constituency could find a fit representation outside that list, and all the more dangerous on that account? If they had none at home they could colonize from the North.

Again, magnanimity is invoked as a shield of desertion. A great nation, it is said, can afford to be magnanimous. Of course it can; but let us see how this is. For four years these people made war upon us without cause or even plausible excuse. Before they began it, we begged them in great humility to withhold from the country this terrible desolation. In tears we warned them of the punishment that must follow. Our entreaties and warnings were received in the rebel capital, so their telegraph informed us, "with peals of laughter." They fired upon us while we were yet upon our knees begging for peace and union. The contest once begun, was conducted on our part with great forbearance and within the strictest military law. We even returned for awhile their fugitive slaves. On their part it was conducted not only with the condemned system of cruel guerrilla and piratical warfare, but with fire, poison, yellow fever, and assassination. The estates of Union men within their power were confiscated, and have never yet been restored, and Union men were hung for treason to their pretended government.

You tell us they have suffered. So have we. Peace has come at last; business prosperity will return; the insignia of mourning will be laid aside; but in the heart of every family there is an unspoken sorrow that will sadden life even to the grave. Now, we are admonished to be magnanimous to the authors of all this suffering. I accept the admonition, but I submit that we are so already. The law condemned them to death, and we have pardoned them. Their estates were forfeited, and we have restored them. Not a traitor has been hung; not one convicted; not one tried; not a dozen arrested; but many have been honored as rulers in States they only failed to ruin. The high-sounding eloquence of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. RAYMOND,] calling upon us to admire the "courage and devotion" with which these bad men prosecuted a cruel war against our kindred, our homes, and our country for four years, has scarcely subsided when our tears are invoked over their self-inflicted sufferings. Thus at this end of the avenue we are alternately called upon to admire and pity them, while at the other the green seal is kept hot with its work of clemency—clemency often unsolicited, sometimes contemned. We have even ordered historic inscriptions to be erased from captured cannon at West Point, that the boys educated at the expense of a Government their fathers could not quite destroy might not be irritated. What more can we do? What more can gentlemen ask in the name of magnanimity? "Give to this one seventh of your population more than one third of your political power?" Is that what you ask, and call it only magnanimity to the false men of the country? Call it rather treachery to the faithful, or if that sounds too harsh, call it submission, surrender, what you like, but for the sake of truth let no one call betrayal of country and friends magnanimity to enemies.

Again, sir, the effort to cut off the excess of this unpatriotic and sectional representation is ascribed to party motives. Is not the Opposition exposed to the same charge? Is not the Democratic party as anxious to secure friends as we are to avoid enemies? For the last five years they have been beaten everywhere. Every election has proved to them that they were growing small by large degrees. "Would to God that night or the rebels would come" has been their daily prayer. Does their haste to embrace the misguided brethren come solely from pure love and affection? Is it not possible that their passion is somewhat like that of—

"The immortal Captain Wottle,
Who was all for love and a little for the bottle?"

Is it not possible that they look a little to party, too? That they long not only for the alliance but the leadership of the South? They must remember that this leadership was generally able and always consistent, however unwise. It was not under that lead that they proclaimed both secession and coercion unconstitutional; that the war for the Union was constitutional, but there was no constitutional mode of conducting it; that an army should be raised, but volunteering was impracticable and drafting unconstitutional; that it was right to raise money, but wrong to tax or borrow; that they were opposed to emancipation, but not in favor of slavery. It was not under that lead that Andrew Johnson was denounced as Lincoln's satrap when he consented to be provisional governor of a State from which the old Governor and Legislature had run away, and cheered as a patriot when he drove out the Governors and Legislatures of half a dozen States and supplied their places with appointees of his own. Is it not probable that, tired of their contradictory and hypocritical position, they crave the undissembling leadership of Breckinridge and Hunter, Davis and Toombs, as much as we can possibly dread it?

As another excuse for opposition to this plan of restoration it is said there are other inequalities in representation that ought to be removed as well as this. An honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania complains that the six eastern States have each two Senators, while New York and other large States have no more. It is true that some of the eastern States are small; but the Constitution provides that each State, whether large or small, shall have two Senators; and it further provides that while that instrument may be amended in other respects, with the assent of three fourths of the States, in this respect it shall not be amended without the assent of all the States. But why point only to the eastern States to illustrate the inequality of senatorial representation? The best illustration of it is not to be found there. The population of these States is 3,135,223. In the South you can find a smaller population with a larger representation in the Senate. The population of Arkansas, Texas, Florida, South Carolina, West Virginia, Maryland, and Delaware is only 3,032,761. Here are seven States with more than 100,000 less population than the six eastern States, one third of that being negroes, with fourteen Senators, two more than New England. Why did not the gentleman make his point on these States? Was it because the eastern States are free and loyal and the others were slaveholding, and in part disloyal? And why, just in this connection, does he complain that bounties are paid for catching fish? He never complained when higher bounties were paid for catching men and women for the southern market. These are the old complaints of the South, warmed over, in anticipation of its return, groundless, no doubt, but if ever so just, furnishing no good excuse for allowing to the complainants a twofold representation in this House.

Once more we are reminded that taxation and representation should go together. True, sir, but that would not entitle them to a double representation, nor deprive Congress of a reasonable time for deliberation as to the extent of the right and the best mode of securing it. But if it is meant that they are entitled on the score of taxation to instantaneous, unconditional, and disproportionate representation, I must beg leave to inquire, where are the immense taxes paid by them, upon which to base such extraordinary claims? The loyal people of the country have been paying burdensome taxes, a million per day, imposed by their misconduct, but when and where have they paid taxes? For the last five years they have paid none, and the amount they are just now beginning to pay is too trifling for argument. If the right of representation could be acquired by imposing taxes upon others or by robbery of the Government, their claim would be indisputable. They robbed the southern post offices of money, stamps, and mails; the arsenals and military and naval depots of ammunition, arms, and clothing; the custom-houses and sub-Treasuries of goods, bonds, and money; and the New Orleans mint of $600,000 in gold, and have never made restitution. But they have paid very few taxes, and long before they will be called upon to do so a fair and adequate representation will be accorded them.

But they have still another argument—the one relied upon when all others fail, their refuge from discomfiture in every other field of debate—and that is what they call the constitutional argument. When they find themselves unable to maintain in discussion the propriety of allowing the disloyal population a twofold representation, the half to represent themselves and the other half to misrepresent the loyal people, white and black, in their midst; when they can no longer screen themselves behind the "President's policy," words of indefinite meaning; when their aspersion upon our motives is repelled by showing that they have as strong party interest in forming an alliance with the rebels as we possibly can have in trying to prevent it; when their taxation theory is demolished by a report from the Secretary of the Treasury, they fall back upon the constitutional right of States to representation. They will retreat no further. This is their last ditch in debate. And here,

"In Dixie's land
They take their stand,
To live or die for Dixie."

Mr. Speaker, we are in an anomalous condition. The Constitution does not especially provide for the difficulties with which we are surrounded. Our fathers could not believe that so large a portion of the American people could be so barbarized by slavery as to undertake such stupendous crime. They did not provide for what they could not foresee. There are no precedents on file to guide us. This is the first disunion rebellion. Ours will be the first precedent in reconstruction, and the last—only if it is justly and wisely made. There are objections, plausible or otherwise, to every theory that has been or can be advanced as to the status of these States. My colleague [Mr. STEVENS] suggested that their present position was very much like that of California after the Mexican war. A score or more of speeches have been made to show that there are objections to this theory. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHELLEBARGER] suggested that these State governments had perished in the rebellion, and that now new ones, republican in form, should be originated by Congress. Objections were raised to this theory. The gentleman from New York [Mr. RAYMOND] suggested that new governments must be originated and proper guarantees and conditions could be imposed, but these things should be done by the Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy as the terms of surrender. Objections have been raised to that theory also. Others still take the position that inasmuch as new constitutions and new governments have been established in these States originating in an irregular or revolutionary manner, that it is the duty of Congress, under the fourth article and fourth section of the Constitution, to see that they are republican in form, and in the discharge of that duty, require such conditions or guarantees as the safety of the Union, in their judgment, demands. This, too, is objected to.

An honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania at the other end of the Capitol, with some self-conceit, as it seems to me, sets down all these reconstruction suggestions or theories as mere whimsies. He has a plan of his own to restore the Union and get rid of traitors. It is simple in theory and cheap in execution. He will execute it himself with only the aid of a constable. Whenever a rebel shows his head, he and his constable will pounce upon him like a Buchanan marshal on a flying negro. He will put him where no rebel ever went before with his consent—in the old Capitol Prison. If the honorable gentleman really thinks that his plan is practicable, why does he not set about its execution? His intended victims swarm through the Capitol and the White House, and two or three dozen of them are asking admission to Congress. There are objections to this theory. Indeed it has been tried. It was Buchanan's plan for suppressing the rebellion, but it failed.

Now, sir, the theory of the Opposition, based upon the second and third sections of the first article of the Constitution, under which members from the rebel States are to be admitted to these Halls without our leave, is that the right of a State to representation cannot be forfeited or lost so long as these two sections remain unaltered. Is there no objection to this theory? Why, it concedes the right of representation during the whole war. Their members could have entered this Capitol at any time and voted as the interest of the confederacy required. If the war had lasted fifty years instead of four the right would have run through all that time. Nor would it have ceased if our armies had been overpowered and the confederacy left unmolested. After one hundred years of separation, they might still vote for President and send members to Congress. Unless you admit the doctrine of forfeiture, you cannot avoid this conclusion. Aside from this doctrine, nothing but an amendment of the Constitution could deprive them of this right. But the Constitution could not be amended, because these eleven States are more than one fourth of the whole, and the assent of some of them would be necessary for any amendment; and to deprive them of Senators the assent of every one would be necessary.

The advocates of this theory, to avoid this result, concede that the right of representation would be forfeited by success. But how? The Constitution is not changed by the result of a battle. There it is, just as it was before. If they lost nothing by defeat would they by success? They lost nothing by secession and unsuccessful war, you say, because these were unconstitutional. Can they lose anything, then, by victory? Would not that be unconstitutional also? "But we would acquiesce." Well, suppose we should; would not acquiescence be unconstitutional and void? Where in the Constitution are we authorized to acquiesce in a division of the Republic? If their ordinance of secession was void would not our consent to it be equally void? If the ordinance was void can it be rendered more so by defeat or less so by victory? Some of the advocates of this theory, to avoid this reasoning, concede that the right of representation is forfeited or suspended during "contumacy." This cruel word to characterize the great rebellion is not original with me. It is the word maliciously chosen by our conservative friends who are determined to make treason odious. I wish the printer to inclose it with inverted commas, that such severity of language may not be ascribed to me. But who is to decide when the suspension begins and when it ends? The State? If so, that is no suspension at all. A right that can be taken up and laid down at pleasure cannot be said to be suspended. Is Congress the judge? Then I submit that by secession from the United States, by the formation of a new confederacy, by four years of terrible war and five of scornful refusal, these States would become a little contumacious, and Congress would be justified in suspending their rights until the legislation necessary to make representation fair and equal could be agreed upon and passed. And that is all that anybody here proposes to do.

This appeal to the Constitution for authority to hand the Government over to the unrepentant plotters of its destruction, is but a continuation of the policy pursued by the Opposition for the last five years. During that period they have raised a cry about the Constitution many times, but always in opposition to good measures or in advocacy of bad ones. When it was first proposed to coerce the rebellion and save the Union, and at every following step toward apparent success, they cried, "unconstitutional." It was unconstitutional to raise an army or march it into the sacred soil of the South. It was unconstitutional to issue bills of credit to meet the expenses. It was unconstitutional to close a rebel port or arrest a rebel spy, to proclaim martial law in a rebel country, or to appoint a provisional governor for conquered Louisiana or abandoned Tennessee. Look back through the debates of the Opposition; there is nothing constitutional but slavery and rebellion, nothing so unconstitutional as coercion and emancipation. Judging from these debates, the Constitution was especially framed to repress liberty, punish fidelity to the Union, shield oppression, and honor treachery and great crime. These war measures are all constitutional now. Great light is thrown upon the Constitution by the surrender of Lee. The gleam of successful bayonets illumines the dark understanding of pro-slavery quibblers. But alas! the light of success shines only on the past. All the future is still unconstitutional. The "unconstitutional, disunion, abolition war" is rendered constitutional by the victory of our soldiers, but the effort to secure to the country the fruits of that victory by appropriate legislation is as unconstitutional as ever.

Here I close my defense of the Republican policy of restoration. Shall that policy be adopted? Not by this Congress, it is said, because enough conservative Republicans will unite with the Opposition to defeat it. Then, by falsely charging upon the Union party non-action and lack of purpose, it is hoped that a Congress can be elected next fall which will repeal the test oath and admit the rebel States without guarantees or conditions of any kind and with a representation always excessive and now enlarged by emancipation. Without the enlargement (which will not be attained until after the next census) the eleven confederate States will have eighty votes in the Electoral College, controlled entirely by the late insurgents, namely:

Alabama.....	8
Mississippi.....	7
Arkansas.....	5
Texas.....	6
Louisiana.....	7
Florida.....	3
Georgia.....	9
North Carolina.....	9
South Carolina.....	6
Virginia.....	10
Tennessee.....	10

They will need seventy-seven more to elect a President. Kentucky, Missouri, Maryland, and Delaware, States with strong confederate proclivities, will, it is claimed, furnish thirty-one, while the other forty-six can be made up by the Democrats of New Jersey, New York, and Connecticut. The classification of votes by which the President would thus be elected, would stand—confederates 80, semi-confederates 31, Democratic 46. This presidential scheme will undoubtedly fail, and yet it is the only one that has the slightest chance of success. If the Union party can be beaten at all, it must be by this or some similar combination. Suppose it successful, then, what would be the character of the new Administration? Four members of the Cabinet would belong to the eighty confederate votes and the other three to the seventy-seven from the northern and border States. All presidential appointments at home and abroad must be made on the same line of division.

If, as is alleged, this combination could also carry a majority of Congress, the confederates would have a majority of that majority, and in caucus (giving their allies the Clerk) would demand the Speaker and a majority of all committees, such as the Ways and Means, Claims, and Pensions, to which their peculiar interests might be referred. Pensions must then be surrendered or divided with confederate claimants; service in the Union Army would be an impediment to political success, and the Treasury, supplied by the industry and economy of the North, would be steadily absorbed in confederate damages. Then your creditors might count their worthless bonds and learn exactly how much it cost them to reclaim their fugitive masters. Then the pensionless widows and orphans of our valiant dead might bemoan in poverty and neglect the ingratitude of a Republic saved by a husband's and father's blood. And then our surviving soldiers must conceal their honorable scars to save a humble position in the capital they helped to preserve—for the enemy. Then, sir, we will all see, feel, and realize what the Opposition, in different phraseology, constantly assert, that the object of the war was to force the rebels to become our rulers.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, notifying the House that that body had passed Senate bill No. 220, for the relief of certain contractors for the construction of vessels of war and steam machinery.

RECONSTRUCTION—AGAIN.

Mr. HIGBY. Mr. Speaker, a large portion of the President's annual message was devoted to the question of the reunion of the loyal States and those which had been in rebellion. Congress was as deeply impressed with the subject which was coming before them as any other branch of this Government possibly could be at the commencement of the present session; and with a view to do as much and as speedily as possible to ascertain the condition of the States which had been in rebellion, and whether there was any possibility by which they could have representation here, a joint committee of both branches of Congress was appointed, to whom everything in connection with reconstruction was referred for their consideration. We have several times, sir, heard from that committee by way of amendments to the Constitution of the United States. They have also taken a large amount of testimony in reference to the condition of things in those States, and have from time to time reported that evidence to the House and Senate. But, Mr. Speaker, I propose for a few moments to give attention to the report made by the committee on reconstruction on the 6th of March last, and a joint resolution with reference to the State of Tennessee, introduced into the House at that time; and more particularly to dwell upon the principles involved, for the principles involved in that case will enter into the case of every one of the rebel States on the question of readmission.

Mr. Speaker, I suppose that every and any subject presented to the House pertinent to these great questions can be scrutinized and remarked upon. I do not wish to be deemed officious or captious if I should chance to differ with fifteen of the wisest men we have in Congress in some respects as to the report they made at that time.

I ask the Clerk to read the joint resolution. The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BINGHAM, from the committee on reconstruction, reported the following joint resolution: Joint resolution concerning the State of Tennessee. Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That whereas the people of Tennessee have made known to the Congress of the United States their desire that the constitutional relations heretofore existing between them and the United States may be fully established, and did, on the 22d day of February, 1865, by a large popular vote, adopt and ratify a constitution of government republican in form and not inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States, and a State government has been organized under the provisions thereof, which said provisions, and the laws passed in pursuance thereof, proclaim and denote loyalty to the Union; and whereas the people of Tennessee are found to be in a condition to exercise the functions of a State within this Union, and can only exercise the same by the consent of the law-making power of the United States. Therefore, the State of Tennessee is hereby declared to be one of the United States of America, on an equal footing with the other States, upon the express condition that the people of Tennessee will maintain and enforce, in good faith, their existing constitution and laws, excluding those who have been engaged in rebellion against the United States from the exercise of the elective franchise, for the respective periods of time therein provided for, and shall exclude the same persons for the like respective periods of time from eligibility to office; and the State of Tennessee shall never assume or pay any debt or obligation contracted or incurred in aid of the late rebellion; nor shall said State ever in any manner claim from the United States or make any allowance or compensation for slaves emancipated or liberated in any way whatever; which conditions shall be ratified by the Legislature of Tennessee, or the people thereof, as the Legislature may direct, before this act shall take effect.

Mr. HIGBY. Mr. Speaker, two propositions will be observed as embodied in that resolution; one is that it pronounces the constitution presented by Tennessee republican in form, and the other is that the only means by which the State can have any representation in Congress is to be through the "law-making power of the United States."

Together with the resolution came to this House a large amount of testimony which had been taken by the committee in reference to the condition of Tennessee. In this volume is embraced an act of the General Assembly of the State, in which they prescribe who shall exercise the elective franchise. It is as follows:

An act to limit the elective franchise.

Whereas the first article and first section of the declaration of rights in the constitution of the State of Tennessee declares, "That all power is inherent in the people, and all free governments are founded on their authority and instituted for their peace, safety, and happiness; for the advancement of these ends they have at all times an inalienable and indefeasible right to alter, reform, or abolish the government in such manner as they may think proper; and whereas a large and respectable convention of the free and loyal people of the State of Tennessee met in the city of Nashville on the 9th day of January, 1865, and proposed certain alterations and amendments to the constitution of the State of Tennessee, for rejection or ratification by the loyal people on the 22d of February following; and whereas said amendments and schedule were solemnly ratified with great unanimity by the authoritative voice of the people; and whereas the eighth section of said schedule provided for the election of a governor and members of the Legislature on the 4th day of March, 1865, and who, in accordance therewith, were elected by the ballots of the loyal people; and whereas the same authoritative voice, in section nine of the schedule, delegated to the General Assembly meeting first under this amended constitution, the right to fix the qualification of voters and the limitation of the elective franchise: Therefore, acting faithfully under and in accordance with this delegation of the supreme power,

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the State of Tennessee, That the following persons, to wit:

1. Every white man twenty-one years of age, a citizen of the United States and a citizen of the county wherein he may offer his vote six months next preceding the day of election, and publicly known to have entertained unconditional Union sentiments from the outbreak of the rebellion until the present time; and
2. Every white man, a citizen of the United States and a citizen of the county wherein he may offer his vote six months next preceding the day of election, having arrived at the age of twenty-one years since March 4, 1865: Provided, That he has not been engaged in armed rebellion against the authority of the United States voluntarily; and
3. Every white man of lawful age coming from another State, and being a citizen of the United States, on proof of loyalty to the United States, and being a citizen of the county wherein he may offer his vote six months next preceding the day of election; and
4. Every white man, a citizen of the United States and a citizen of this State, who has served as a soldier in the Army of the United States, and has been or may be hereafter honorably discharged therefrom; and
5. Every white man of lawful age, a citizen of the United States and a citizen of the county wherein he may offer his vote six months next preceding the day of election, who was conscripted by force into the so-called confederate army, and was known to be a Union man, on proof of loyalty to the United States, established by the testimony of two voters under the previous clauses of this section; and
6. Every white man who voted in this State at the presidential election in November, 1864, or voted on the 22d of February, 1865, or voted on the 4th of March, 1865, in this State, and all others who had taken the "oath of allegiance" to the United States, and may be known by the judges of election to have been true friends to the Government of the United States, and would have voted in said previously mentioned elections if the same had been held within their reach, shall be entitled to the privileges of the elective franchise.

SEC. 2. Be it further enacted, That all persons who are or shall have been civil or diplomatic officers or agents of the so-called confederate States of America, or who have left judicial stations under the United States or the State of Tennessee to aid, in any way, the existing or recent rebellion against the authority of the United States, or who are or shall have been military or naval officers of the so-called confederate States, above the rank of captain in the army or lieutenant in the navy; or who have left seats in the United States Congress or seats in the Legislature of the State of Tennessee to aid said rebellion, or have resigned commissions in the Army or Navy of the United States, and afterward have voluntarily given aid to said rebellion; or persons who have engaged in treating otherwise than lawfully, as prisoners of war, persons found in the United States service as officers, soldiers, seamen, or in any other capacities; or persons who have been or are absentees from the United States for the purpose of aiding the rebellion; or persons who held pretended offices under the government of States in insurrection against the United States; or persons who left their homes within the jurisdiction and protection of the United States, or fled before the approach of the national forces and passed beyond the Federal military lines into the so-called confederate States, for the purpose of aiding the rebellion, shall be denied and refused the privilege of the elective franchise in this State for the term of fifteen years from and after the passage of this act.

SEC. 3. Be it further enacted, That all other persons, except those mentioned in section one of this act, are hereby and henceforth excluded and denied the exercise of the privilege of the elective franchise in this State for the term of five years from and after the passage of this act.

SEC. 4. Be it further enacted, That all persons embraced in section three of this act, after the expiration of said five years, may be readmitted to the privilege of the elective franchise by petition to the circuit or chancery court, on proof of loyalty to the United States, in open court, upon the testimony of two or more loyal citizens of the United States.

SEC. 5. Be it further enacted, That so long as any of the white citizens of the State of Tennessee, who by this act are entitled to exercise the elective franchise, shall be connected with the Army of the United States, or with the military force of this State in actual service, the Governor shall issue writs of election to the commanding officers of such brigades, regiments, or detachments of Tennessee soldiers, wherever located, who shall open and hold the election, and receive the votes of their respective commands, and return the same to the secretary of state, and which shall be counted in the same way and manner as if said votes had been cast in any of the counties of the State to which the soldiers belonged.

It will be observed, in looking over this act, or the portion to which I direct your attention more particularly, that the elective franchise is to be limited to the white citizens of the State, those who have been loyal, as it disfranchises those who have been engaged in the rebellion. And further, this act is final upon the subject; as the constitution, as amended, "delegated to the General Assembly meeting first under this amended constitution, the right to fix the qualification of voters and the limitation of the elective franchise." So that further to amend the act from the reading of the schedule it would seem is not in the power of the General Assembly.

Now I wish to present a few facts immediately under this proposition. The resolution says that the constitution is republican in form. With the constitution comes this act of the Legislature upon the subject of the elective franchise. All the facts are embraced in the report which we received from the committee at the same time that this resolution was introduced. I have taken the trouble to make a little table from the census of 1860, which is as follows:

States.....	White.....	Colored.....	W. C.....
Virginia.....	1,047,411	548,907	Less than 2 to 1
Tennessee.....	826,782	283,019	Less than 3 to 1
North Carolina.....	631,100	361,522	Less than 2 to 1
South Carolina.....	291,388	412,320	Less than 3 to 4
Georgia.....	501,588	465,698	Less than 3 to 2
Florida.....	77,748	62,677	Less than 5 to 4
Alabama.....	526,481	437,770	Less than 5 to 4
Mississippi.....	353,901	437,404	Less than 1 to 1
Louisiana.....	357,629	350,373	Nearly equal.
Texas.....	421,204	182,921	Less than 3 to 1
Arkansas.....	324,191	111,259	Nearly 3 to 1
Total.....	5,449,463	3,053,870	Less than 5 to 3

In which I have united together in one sum the slave population in each State with the free population of the same, because since the slaves have become free they belong to the free colored population of the State, and I find this to be the fact with reference to Tennessee: white population, 826,782; free colored population, 283,019.

The proportion is less than three white citizens to one colored. In other words, the colored population in 1860 was more than one fourth of the population of the State.

It is but a few days since a law passed this Congress more dignified than legislative enactments usually are, for the reason that it passed, notwithstanding the veto of the President, by more than a two-thirds vote of each House. What did that law declare? I do not consider that we made the native-born colored man a citizen by it, for I believe that without that enactment he was a citizen of the United States; and I believe that a majority of the people so believe. The most eminent men of the nation for wisdom and learning so construed the Constitution of the United States. But we declared it thus solemnly that native-born inhabitants, no matter of what race or color, were citizens of the United States.

Now, then, what is the simple fact presented by the figures? We have some means of arriving at the measure of loyalty or disloyalty in the State of Tennessee. It is said that that State furnished thirty thousand Union soldiers to help fight the battles against the rebels. It is said on the other hand that Tennessee furnished one hundred thousand men for the rebel army. But, sir, supposing it was fifty thousand Union soldiers to one hundred thousand rebel. Of course we cannot arrive definitely at the true proportion. The Legislature of that State has disfranchised those who were engaged in the rebellion; so that the voting population of the State is reduced to those who remained loyal to the Government during the whole struggle. I am speaking of the white population.

What, then, do we have presented? It comes down to the simple fact that a white population no greater than the colored population of a State are to have the entire control of the administration of the government of the State.

Mr. Speaker, I want to read a few words from the Declaration of Independence upon this question of bestowing civil rights and political rights. I think the definition is conclusive:

"We hold these truths to be self-evident: that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights: that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; that to secure these rights governments are instituted among men deriving their just power from the consent of the governed."

There is, then, according to this language, no security of "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness" unless those who are seeking these ends have the power of government in their hands. That is the logic of the language.

What, then, do we bestow upon men by attempting to secure to them civil or political rights? Why simply this: that they shall have the power of administering the Government. It is conclusive, therefore, that nothing is effected by simply declaring that you extend to them civil rights if in a republican government in which the power rests with the people they cannot, together with others, possess the political power to protect themselves in these rights.

Sir, I do not know where the power lies to take away the privilege of the elective franchise from a citizen of the United States. As a citizen of this country that privilege is one which belongs to him of right. Such is the definition and such is the logical and just conclusion.

I find this definition given by our great lexicographer, Worcester:

"Citizen. An inhabitant of a republic who enjoys the rights of a citizen or a freeman, and who has a right to vote for public officers; as, 'a citizen of the United States.'"

The great lexicographer, Webster, uses about the same language in his definition of a citizen. Then, sir, I quote another authority that is looked upon as very good in this country:

"The article in the Constitution of the United States declaring that citizens of each State were entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States applies only to natural-born or duly naturalized citizens; and if they remove from one State to another they are entitled to the privileges that persons of the same description are entitled to in the State to which the removal is made, and to none other. The laws and usages of one State cannot be permitted to prescribe qualifications for citizens to be claimed and exercised in other States in contravention to their local policy."

It was declared, in Coryell vs. Coryell, that the privileges and immunities conceded by the Constitution of the United States to citizens in the several States were to be confined to those which were in their nature fundamental, and belonged of right to the citizens of all free Governments. Such are the rights of protection of life and liberty, and to acquire and enjoy property, and to pay no higher impositions than other citizens, and to pass through or reside in the State at pleasure, and to enjoy the elective franchise according to the regulations of the law of the State."

That is from Kent's Commentaries. Some may contend that this regulation may go to the extent of prohibition. But, sir, prohibition is not regulation. The language is plain and explicit. The citizen has a right to vote; and there is no power under the Government to exclude him from that right. I do not care what may be the race or color of a man, if he is a citizen of the United States, that is a right of his—a paramount right.

It is true that States may have their regulations on the subject of suffrage. A State may provide that a citizen coming from another State must reside within its limits a certain length of time before he can vote. It may prescribe that a citizen must have attained a certain age before being allowed to exercise the elective franchise. But this is no such exclusion as that on account of race or color.

But, sir; what is the extent of this resolution? It proposes to admit the State of Tennessee, coming here upon the basis I have named—only a very small proportion of the white population, taking the same number that it had in 1860. Sir, without meaning to be captious, I say that such a proposition has no element of republicanism in it. Let me state a case which may arise, and let us see how members of this House are willing to meet it. You will have some of the eleven seceded States coming here and asking to be admitted whose colored population is in excess of the white population. In the State of South Carolina, for instance, a large majority of the population are colored people, now citizens. Suppose the colored people of the State of South Carolina should come here with a constitution asking to be admitted. They have been loyal through all this struggle. They are citizens of the United States. They present to Congress a constitution more generous and more liberal, if you please. They make no distinction of race or color. If you admit them with such a constitution you violate the principles contained in this report.

There are some stubborn facts which we must meet and face, and we had better face them in the beginning. It is not so hard to do right if we will trample prejudices beneath our feet and come up to great principles and stand by them. It is far better, sir, that we should come up and meet the question now, than wait until time forces us to do so.

I find, in footing up columns in the table presented, that in 1860 there were 5,449,463 of white population, and 3,653,870 of colored people in the eleven States. More than three fifths of the population now are colored people. Deduct from the computation those men who have been disloyal to the Government through this rebellion and what proportion would the white population of those States bear to the colored people? You would then have five of the colored to three of the white entitled to the privileges of the elective franchise.

If the principles proposed now to be adopted in the case of Tennessee should be accepted, they must be followed in the case of every other of the eleven States that may ask to be admitted, and we shall find in the end that we have ignored as citizens the majority and given the government to the minority, and by so doing will have trampled under foot the great and vital principle that lies at the foundation of our institutions.

Mr. Speaker, it is urged that we have no right to say who shall vote and who shall not vote. It is even said by some of the members on this side of the House, the Union members of Congress. It is said, you cannot go into the States and dictate to them who shall vote and who may not vote. Well, I grant this is true under the present condition of things, so far as regards the States that have never been in rebellion. The Government of the United States does not propose or attempt to go into any one of the States now in close fellowship with the Government and represented here, and say to them that all classes of citizens without distinction of race or color shall vote. It is true that the general principle has been to leave that question to each of the States. Sir, if Tennessee and Virginia are to-day States in the Union, possessing the same rights as Pennsylvania and Massachusetts, we have nothing to say upon this subject one way or the other.

But if, as is declared in this resolution, the law-making power of the United States is to settle now the question of the representation of the eleven States that have been in rebellion, and at the same time to examine the constitution of each of these States to see whether it be republican in form, then at the same time the law-making power of the United States has the right and the power to settle the question whether the State has allowed the citizens of the State to vote or not in organizing and establishing the new State government; and further, the resolution imposes terms and declares the condition of the citizen entitled to vote.

It may be said that what constitutes a government republican in form depends upon the opinion of individuals. But the general principle, I presume, will be admitted, that a government is not republican in form if it excludes a large portion of the citizens from participation in the government; I mean without any contingency whatever—an absolute and unconditional exclusion from such participation. We, sir, have the control. We are acting as the law-making power with reference to the condition of each of these States; and it is our duty to declare that no constitution of government is republican in form that unconditionally excludes from the elective franchise any portion of its citizens for any reason whatever. Sir, there will be no difficulty in the settlement of the question when we get ready to yield our prejudices to right and justice.

Mr. Speaker, there are two very important questions involved in the present admission of any one of those States. Of one of those I have spoken; that is, the exclusion of a portion of the citizens of any one of the States from the elective franchise. There is another point, which when closely scrutinized is a little startling in its character. The proposition in this resolution is to admit Tennessee as a State of the Union. The presumption is that if readmitted, she will be entitled to at least the same number of Representatives that she had when the rebellion commenced. And, sir, the principle will hold true in the case of each of the eleven States that took part in the rebellion, whenever they shall be in as fit a condition to be received as Tennessee is said to be now. If the other ten States disfranchise the same class that Tennessee has disfranchised, the whole eleven States, while having the same number of Representatives as they had at the commencement of the rebellion, will possess a voting population less than half what it was at that time.

If we adopt this resolution we establish these two points: in the first place we permit the white citizen to participate in the government to the exclusion of the colored citizen; and secondly, we allow an undiminished number of Representatives to less than half the voting population at the commencement of the rebellion. I cannot believe that the people of the loyal States are ready to submit to such a sacrifice.

Further than that, Mr. Speaker, it would seem to be rewarding rebellion if we should allow these States to come here with the same number of Representatives that they had previously to the rebellion. While the white population who have remained loyal all through this struggle would have a double representation in these Halls, the colored population, who have been loyal, obedient, and devoted to the Government throughout the rebellion, would be ignored and excluded.

Sir, this act of disfranchisement is to expire after a certain time with reference to a certain class. After a period specified, the rebels are to become again citizens and voters. But no provision is made for admitting to the elective franchise that other class of citizens of whom I have spoken.

I am aware, sir, of what is urged with reference to the claims of the State of Tennessee. I am aware at an early period that State sought to bring itself into loyal relations with the Government. It established a new constitution. The Legislature ratified the constitutional amendment forever prohibiting slavery, and adopted other legislation with reference to reorganization. The people of that State have elected persons to be Representatives in this House, and the Legislature has chosen Senators.

But, sir, as has been iterated and reiterated here, the excellence of the character of the men who come here as Representatives is not the question. The question is as to the basis of representation, the character of the people represented, their condition, and their relationship to this Government. No man can be a Representative here without a constituency; and the character of that constituency is the prime element in the investigation of a question of this kind.

Mr. Speaker, if every Representative in this Hall who professes to be a Union man—I speak of those Representatives who have acted together on this side of the House during the Thirty-Seventh and Thirty-Eighth Congresses, and are acting together now, and those of the same class at the other end of the Capitol—would upon this question take a distinct and definite position on the side of the great principle which I have indicated, acting upon it and sustaining it with all their powers of mind and heart, there would be no difficulty about this question of reconstruction. The great mass of the loyal people of this Union are ready to sustain their Representatives upon this proposition. There is no other way to settle the question.

It is the decree of the providence of God that those men who have been in rebellion shall be offensive to the instincts of every loyal man; and it is His will that keeps alive in our hearts and our memories their true condition, which renders them unfit to be represented in these Halls. Why, sir, if we can read the acts of a Being superior to ourselves, it may be reasonable to suppose that the object of the divine purpose is to hold us back from the work of hasty reconstruction and to delay that work until the prejudices of members in these Halls shall be so far removed as to enable them to act justly upon this great question, when they do act, and settle it upon a basis of equal justice to all and of permanent peace and prosperity to the country.

Sir, some people talk about a "policy" of reconstruction. It is said that there is a policy with one branch of the Government. I am glad, sir, to be able to say that there is no distinct policy with Congress. I declare, sir, that it is not within the wisdom of man to devise a plain, definite policy by which all these questions are to be settled. The question as to the proper course to be pursued with reference to those men who have been in rebellion is decidedly the most troublesome question with which legislators were ever called to deal. But, sir, we cannot dispose of that question until we place ourselves upon the principle that they who are loyal to this Government shall, without distinction of race or color, participate in the administration of it. When we are ready to act upon that principle we shall then the more readily and easily undertake the solution of the other great question, which is always bound to be far more difficult until we take the right position upon the first.

A "policy!" Why, sir, there is one policy, if it can be called such, which is easy to understand and easy to act upon. It is to trample right and justice under foot. It is to receive into our breasts the poison whose fatal influence has been so fully demonstrated. It is to inoculate upon our Government a branch from that foul Upas which has in the days of the past cast its deadly blight upon this nation. Sir, it would be a very easy thing to incorporate again into the Government the evils under which we have suffered in the past, and which did so much to bring upon us the horrors of the recent rebellion.

Sir, in the healing art there are two classes of physicians. Those of the one class are able to heal the outward symptoms of a wound, to give it a healthy surface, and remove the corruption which meets the eye, while the virulent and deep-seated disease still lingers in a latent form to break forth soon again with increased severity. But, sir, a physician of the other class, with the skill of the wisest surgery cuts deeply and eradicates the festering mass, and thus by a merciful severity restores lasting health.

Mr. Speaker, when we are ready to act on principles right and just we will then find we will have far less difficulty in the way. A policy will in time begin to shape itself sufficient for all practical purposes. We will then finally settle a question the like of which we have never before had in our history, and the like of which I think the history of no nation on earth has ever exhibited. It was impossible for man alone to grapple with the condition of things all through the rebellion. There did seem to be a superior Power that was directing all things, and that same Power will lead us on, if we move with care, wisdom, and justice, to a right and a proper conclusion.

RESTORATION OF THE UNION.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, for more than four years past it has been my settled conviction, and I so declared in a speech in this House as early as December, 1861, and again in January, 1863, that there were two rebellions, one in the North as well as one in the South; and though seeming to differ widely on some points, yet in reality "leagued together and unitedly warring" to overthrow the Constitution and dissolve the Union. The only hope, therefore, of saving the Government and restoring the Union rested on the Conservatives and Democrats standing equally opposed to both extremes. The Herculean task that devolved on them was not merely to suppress and control one, but two rebellions; because the success of either was the destruction of the Government.

President Johnson, in a speech delivered in the Senate in February 1861, uttered a great truth when he said—

"There are two parties in this country that want to break up the Government. Who are they? The nullifiers proper of the South, the secessionists, or disunionists, for I use them all as synonymous terms."
 * * * "Who else is for breaking up the Government? I refer to some bad men in the North. There is a set of men called abolitionists, and they want to break up the Government. They are disunionists; they are secessionists; they are nullifiers."
 * * * "Whose allies are the abolitionists of the North, if they are not the allies of the secessionists and disunionists of the South? Are they not all laboring and toiling to accomplish the same great end, the overthrow of this great nation of ours? Their object is the same."
 * * * "We find first the run-mad abolitionists of the North—they are secessionists; they are for disunion; they are for dissolution. When we turn to the South, we see the red-hot disunionists and secessionists at the same work."

Mr. Speaker, the people of the South have abandoned and repudiated secession. They have returned to their allegiance, yield obedience to the Constitution and laws, and anxiously desire the restoration of the Union. The war is over. The southern rebellion is wholly suppressed. But, sir, the northern rebellion is still rampant and defiant, and there is no hope of the restoration of the Union until that rebellion is also subdued, or at least reduced to a controllable minority. We had four years of terrible and exhausting war to keep eleven States of the South from going out of the Union. And now we have had four months, and are threatened with four years of political and congressional war, to drive these eleven States out, and prevent the restoration of the Union.

These northern disunionists, the better to disguise their real object and deceive the loyal people of the North, have at different times assumed different names. First they are known as Radical Abolitionists, and then Republicans; next they claim to be Unionists, and then to belong to the Unconditional Union party. Now, their friends in Congress claim to be Reconstructionists, and have their reconstruction committee, composed of master workmen, deeply skilled in the art of breaking up the old Union, clearing away the rubbish, and building a new one. There can be no such thing as rebuilding or reconstructing the Union unless it has been broken up and dissolved. The basis, therefore, and central idea of this revolutionary movement, called reconstruction, is disunion. It rests on the assumption that the Union has been dissolved. It has no other foundation or support. They claim that the eleven States of the South are out of the Union.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] has repeatedly declared in speeches in this House that the war between the North and the South has—

"Severed their original compacts, and broke all the ties that bound them together. The future condition of the conquered Power depends on the will of the conqueror. They must come in as new States or remain as conquered provinces."

That gentleman also said—

"I cannot doubt that the late confederate States are out of the Union to all intents and purposes for which the conqueror may choose so to consider them."

And again, the same gentleman said in regard to the late confederate States:

"To prove that they are and for four years have been out of the Union for all legal purposes, and being now conquered, subject to the absolute disposal of Congress, I will suggest a few ideas and adduce a few authorities."

That gentleman clearly saw the logical necessity of boldly assuming that these States are out of the Union. He knew that upon any other theory it was impossible to frame even a plausible defense of the action of his party in regard to the southern States. Some of his followers, with more timidity, but with less clearness of perception than himself, have ventured to dispute his premises, while they agree with him in his conclusions and action. But all such involve themselves in a web of contradictions. Some of that party say these States "are neither in the Union nor exactly out of it, the territory at least is in the Union." That is, the people of the South are out of the Union, but the lands on which they live are in it. Others say "these States are out of the Union for practical purposes." That is, for all the purposes of self-government and representation in Congress they are out of the Union. But for the purpose of obeying laws enacted by others, and paying taxes, they are in the Union. All this is absurd. They are either in or out of the Union. There is no middle ground.

Mr. Speaker, if the States of the South are out of the Union, how did they get out? Certainly it must have been either by secession or by revolution; no other answer has been or can be given. Will any one at this day contend that the Constitution of the United States gives any countenance to the doctrine of secession? Does the Constitution provide for its own destruction? Does it arm each separate State with the power of withdrawing at pleasure, thus rising above the Constitution, dissolving the Union, and at once bringing to an end the Government formed by that very Constitution? No, sir, no; the great men who formed that Constitution furnished it with ample powers of self-preservation. They intended and provided for its perpetuity; so that, in the language of President Johnson's message, "no room is allowed even for the thought of a possibility of its coming to an end." If, then, as all admit, the Constitution is the supreme law of the land, every ordinance of secession in the South being opposed to the Constitution and seeking its overthrow of necessity must have been absolutely null and void; and being void must be regarded as wholly inoperative, and therefore could not work any change in the constitutional relations of the States to the Federal Government. But, sir, it is not necessary to argue this question at length. It is well known that during the whole period of the war, President Lincoln, with all the supporters of his Administration, scouted the idea that any resolution or ordinance of secession could take any State out of the Union, and even the men who now show themselves to be practical secessionists then professed to hold that opinion.

Let us next inquire whether the revolution—the war—took these States out of the Union. The States, as such, could not commit treason, could not be indicted and prosecuted. There is no authority in the Constitution, and none has been claimed, to make war upon the States, as such; and there has been no war against them. A portion of the people in all the southern States remained loyal and true to the Union during the war. They were not guilty of treason and incurred no forfeiture of any kind. All the proclamations of the President in regard to insurrection applied not to the States, nor to the loyal people, but to that portion only of the inhabitants of the States who were in armed rebellion against the Federal Government. The insurgents in the South made war for the purpose of taking their States out of the Union, and establishing a separate and independent government over them. That was the issue tendered by them; that was the issue accepted by the Federal Government. On the 22d of July, 1861, both Houses of Congress passed a resolution by almost unanimous votes in which they declared that the war was not waged on our part—

"For any purpose of conquest or subjugation, nor purpose of overthrowing or interfering with the rights or established institutions of the States, but to defend and maintain the supremacy of the Constitution, and to preserve the Union with all the dignity, equality, and rights of the several States unimpaired."

The Federal arms were triumphantly successful. No one will have the hardihood to deny that every issue involved in the war thus waged was gained to the Federal Government by the successful result of the war. This alone would seem sufficient to close all debate on this question.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STREVEN] says the States of the South are out of the Union. But we answer, the war was waged to keep them from going out, and the war was successful. That gentleman holds that the war between the North and the South "severed all compacts and broke all ties that bound them together." But the answer is, the Constitution was the tie that bound them together. The war was waged on our part "to defend and maintain the supremacy of the Constitution," and the war was successful.

He holds that the people of the South have been subjugated, conquered, and are subject to the will of the conqueror, "or to the absolute disposal of Congress." But nothing of the kind could possibly result from the war, because we have seen "that the war was not waged for any purpose of conquest or subjugation."

That gentleman, and others of the same party, contend that the war has destroyed the States of the South and reduced them to mere Territories or conquered provinces. But the war on the part of the Federal Government was waged, as we have seen, not to destroy or overthrow, but to "preserve the States with all their dignity, equality, and rights unimpaired," and the war was successful. How preposterous it is for gentlemen to claim, as the result of successful war on our part, exactly what would have resulted if the South had been successful on their part.

The war waged by the insurgents in the South to take their States out of the Union was a failure, yet gentlemen say these States are out. The war on our part to keep these States in the Union was a success, yet gentlemen say they are out of the Union. That is saying that the success of the Federal Government was its failure; and the failure of the southern rebellion was its success. This important discovery has been made by the superior wisdom of the northern rebellion. It was wholly unknown in the South.

Mr. Speaker, what has been the public sentiment of the country on this question? When the confederate armies all surrendered, and the war closed, the whole country throughout the northern States was filled with bonfires, illuminations, and public rejoicings. Was it because the war had severed all ties between the North and the South, and separated eleven States from the rest? Did the people rejoice over a dissevered Union? If so, then was the nation drunk. Instead of demonstrations of joy there was the deepest cause of sorrow; the whole country should have been draped in mourning, while all the bells in the land sounded the knell of the Union. But no, sir, the people were not drunk, they rejoiced in the full assurance that all the States were saved, the supremacy of the Constitution maintained, and the Union preserved.

Mr. Speaker, during the whole period of the war Congress, by its action, declared the States of the South were still in the Union. The Constitution provides that—

"Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union according to their respective numbers."

Under that provision of the Constitution Congress, by law passed during the war, imposed direct taxes upon each of the States in the South as States in the Union. Under the same clause of the Constitution Congress also apportioned to each of the States in the South as well as to those of the North its proper number of Representatives in Congress. And in fact nearly every law of a general character passed during the war extended to and included the States of the South as States in the Union. Members of Congress from Tennessee and Louisiana, representing portions of those States, were received and acted and voted in Congress during the war; and at no period of the war has there been less than three members of Congress here acting with us representing the western portion of Virginia. Congress has thus, by its recorded action, treated, acknowledged, and recognized those States as States in the Union, and is now estopped to deny its own record. The action of the other departments of the Government has been to the same effect.

The late proclamation of President Johnson declares the war ended, and those States restored to the constitutional rights, now withheld from them by Congress. By the proclamations of President Lincoln, and of President Johnson, and indeed by the action generally of the executive branch of the Government, those States have been recognized as States in the Union at all times during and since the war. The Supreme Court of the United States ordered that causes brought up from the southern States should be docketed, regularly called, and tried; thus, in effect, deciding that those States are still in the Union. So that at every period of the war, and by every department of the Government, legislative, executive, and judicial, there has been the fullest recognition of the fact that those States are still in the Union.

Mr. Speaker, suppose it to be true, as gentlemen contend, that the eleven States of the South are out of the Union, what is the consequence? What does it mean? If it be true that all ties between the North and the South were broken, that the States of the South "now are and for four years past have been out of the Union," a separate and foreign Power, then the moment that separation took place the allegiance of the people of those States was transferred to their own confederate government. They could no longer claim protection from the Government of the United States, because they did not belong to it, and for the same reason owed no allegiance to it. They could claim protection from the confederate government, they were citizens of it, and therefore owed allegiance to it. It follows, therefore, that after the separation those called Union men in the South, who took up arms in favor of the United States, then a foreign Government to them, were deserters and traitors, and guilty of treason against the confederate government, to which alone their allegiance was due. But for the same reason all in the South who fought against the United States and to sustain the confederate government, were heroes and patriots. It follows, moreover, that during the same period, neither Jefferson Davis, nor any officer or soldier who fought under him, could possibly have been guilty of treason against the Government of the United States; it was to them a foreign Government, and they owed no allegiance to it. Upon these principles, is not the long incarceration of Jefferson Davis in prison, after the war is over, an act of cruelty that admits of no justification?

And again, sir, upon this theory, it follows that after the separation "and for four years past," the war on our part was not to keep the States of the South in the Union, for they were already out; but was a war for mere conquest and subjugation. Who will justify for such a purpose the millions of treasure expended and the rivers of blood that has been shed? And, sir, was it not a base and criminal fraud for gentlemen holding such sentiments to induce thousands of soldiers to join the Army and pour out their blood to keep States in the Union that were already out, as such gentlemen knew, or at least believed? How will such gentlemen answer to the thousands of bereaved widows and stricken orphans all over the land who have been thus robbed of husbands and fathers? And will not the blood of slaughtered thousands rise in judgment and call for vengeance on those who deceived and betrayed them?

Mr. Speaker, the Union was formed by the Constitution, and so long as it continues the Union of the States must continue. The Constitution, like a band of iron, encircles, binds, and holds the States together. It is not possible for any State to get out of the Union while the Constitution lasts. If it be true, then, as gentlemen contend, that the States of the South are out of the Union, then the Constitution is overthrown, and the States of the North are also out of the Union; the Constitution holds all or none. If the logic of the gentleman from Pennsylvania proves South Carolina or Georgia to be out of the Union, it must of necessity prove that Pennsylvania is also out of the Union; and then it follows that the Constitution is overthrown and the Union dissolved; and this being the case, Congress has no authority, all its action is usurpation, an unlawful assembly, and the sooner broken up and dispersed the better. All the consequences I have mentioned, and more, necessarily result from the assumption that the States of the South are out of the Union. The theory of the reconstruction party means disunion and revolution, and it means nothing else.

Mr. Speaker, when we discard the pestilent heresies of northern disunionists, and turn to the sound constitutional theory held by loyal men, that, by the successful result of the war the rebellion in the South has been subdued, the supremacy of the Constitution maintained, and the Union with all the constitutional rights of the States preserved, we find not the shadow of a legal or constitutional difficulty in the way of complete restoration, harmony, and peace. When the rebellion in the South was subdued, and the insurgents yielded obedience to the Constitution and laws, then the States were in law restored to all their constitutional rights in the Union. And they would have been in fact restored months ago, and the whole machinery of national and State governments moving in harmony, but for the fact that the northern rebellion has thrown itself like a lion across the pathway of restoration, and arrested every movement in that direction.
